to a case which occurred in the last war in which a man lost both his hands, and he was allowed a pension of forty dollars a month.

Mr. TURNEY.—I have no doubt that this man was a very gallant soldier, but it seems to me that the question ought to be whether the general law on the subject of pensions should be modified. I know a man who lost his arms at Monterey, and who is receiving only the ordinary pension, and I will venture to say there is no difference in point of gallantry or bravery between the two individuals. I can see no reason for departure from the established rate of pension in the one case more than in the other. I see no reason why one should have forty dollars a month, and the other only eight or ten. I think that the law should be uniform in its operation; and if you are going to act upon such principles as this bill proposes, your entire revenue will be hardly sufficient to supply the pension list. I am entirely opposed to it. The individual was unfortunate in losing his arms, but not more unfortunate than many others are, and not entitled to more compensation than others who have been equally unfortunate, and who rendered equally important services. I can see no ground for making a distinction, and I am opposed to adopting a rule which will give to one a higher pension than another.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—My attention was called to this case yesterday by a very gallant and distinguished officer who has served not only in the present war, but in former wars. I mean Colonel Harney, who was himself conversant with the facts attending this case. I agree with the honorable Senator from Tennessee, that the pension laws ought to be uniform, but there must be exceptions to all general rules. The ordinary pension of ten dollars a month is sufficient in almost all ordinary cases of wounds, but here is an extraordinary case. This man is incapable of dressing or undressing himself. He is unable to feed himself. He is compelled to have the constant attendance of a servant, and the wages of that servant alone, would be equal in amount to an ordinary pension. As was stated by the Senator from Louisiana, he lost both his arms at the battle of Churubusco. A cannon ball in the first place, carried off his right arm; his captain turned to him, and seeing his mutilated condition, told him to retire. He replied heroically, disregarding his wound—"this gun must be served—I can still do service—I will remain." Scarcely had he spoken, when his other hand was carried away. If ever there was a case which appealed directly to the government to support the individual who is a sufferer in its service, this, I think, is such a case.

Mr. PHELPS.—As one of the Committee on Pensions, I supported this bill on the ground that it was a very unusual case, and such a one as justified special legislation. I imagine that another case of a soldier having been so utterly incapacitated to take care of himself—I do not mean to earn his subsistence, but to supply his ordinary wants—cannot be found. Why should we alter the general pension law for a case that is not likely again to occur? The committee might have reportad a bill for amending the pension law so as to provide for cases in which men had lost both their arms, but in all human probability, such a case will not occur again in fifty years. How is this man to exist on eight dollars a month? He cannot carry a particle of food to his mouth. He cannot put on his clothes, or pull them off. I conceive that if there be a case in which the gratitude and generosity of the government can properly be exerted, it is such a case as this.

Mr. ATHERTON.—I move that this bill be laid upon the table for the present.

Mr. PHELPS.—I hope that the vote will be taken on the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON.—The committee were unanimous in recommending the passage of the bill.

Mr. ATHERTON withdrew his motion.

Mr. TURNEY.—I would like to know upon what principle it is, that we propose to give forty dollars a month to this individual. It is said that he has no relation or friends. This is certainly very strange. He must have lived in a strange community. It is stated that he must have a servant, and that it will take at least thirty dollars a month to pay the expenses of a servant. I believe that one may be procured for five dollars a month. I want to know what is to become of your Treasury if you are going to pay thirty dollars a month to a servant to attend upon pensioners. This principle of making distinctions, is to my mind extremely odious. The distinction in this case is, that the man has been brought here and exhibited in order to excite the sympathy of Senators. There are thousands of individuals at their homes who have been wounded, who do not seek to obtain an extraordinary pension. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. JOHNSON.—This is a solitary case; probably there has not been such another during the whole war. During the last war with Great Britain there was but one such case, and the man was allowed forty dollars a month by a special enactment. The Senator from Tennessee says that a servant can be hired for five dollars a month. I imagine he is mistaken in this, but he does not recollect that the servant must also be boarded and clothed as well as the pensioner himself.

Mr. MOOR.—The pensioner named in this bill entered the army from Maine. He resided in the immediate neighborhood of my colleague, who has taken a deep interest in his relief. As he is not now in his seat, but is engaged on a committee of the Senate, I should move to pass it by informally until he could be present, if I apprehended any danger to its passage.

SEVERAL SENATORS.—Yes, yes, let the vote be taken.

Mr. MOOR.—I will occupy but a single moment. I think I cannot be mistaken in the indications of the Senate. A case of more merit cannot come before us. A soldier returning from the war, with one arm shot off and the other mutilated and rendered useless, and asks for the relief which your general pension laws do not grant for such disabilities. A gallant General of the army informs me that he received these wounds whilst standing at his post and manfully doing his duty in battle; that his disability is beyond that of any man who has come from the field. It is a disability which would very seldom occur. No general law would meet the case. It is not merely a case of absolute inability to earn a subsistence. He is even incapacitated from putting on his apparel without assistance. Only one similar case occurred during the last war with Great Britain, for which the same pension was granted that is provided in this bill. I will not delay the action of the Senate by offering any further reasons.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi.—I am very unwilling to say anything on this subject, but it strikes me as highly necessary that we should pause before we enter upon this career of granting pensions. If you are to give this class of pensions for total disability, you must extend it to those who are disabled from other causes than the loss of their hands. You must extend it to those who are disabled by wounds of the spine, and such cases are numerous. I think we ought to establish some principle which shall be followed in the granting of pensions. If we are not to have an asylum for disabled soldiers—if we intend to adhere to the pension system as the only means of supporting them—we should make a provision for granting a higher pension to those who are totally disabled, in whatever manner their wounds may have been received. I object to special legislation for individual cases, when there are so many of a similar character requiring our aid.

No amendment being made, the bill was reported to the Senate.

The question being upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time, the yeas and nays were ordered and taken with the following result:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Atchison, Badger, Bagby, Benton, Bradbury, Calhoun, Clayton, Crittenden, Dix, Fitzgerald, Mangum, Mason, Miller, Moor, Phelps, Rusk, Spruance, Underwood, and Upham—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Ashley, Atherton, Davis, of Mississippi, Dix, Hale, Hunter, Lewis, Niles, and Turney—10.

So it was Ordered, That the bill be engrossed and read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That the bill pass, and that the title thereof be as aforesaid

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives in this bill.

THE DEFICIENCY BILL.

On motion by Mr. ATHERTON, the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill further to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th June, 1848.

The question recurred; upon the motion to recede from the first amendment of the Senate, which had been disagreed to by the House, striking out the proviso to the item for the pay of two keepers of the public archives in Florida; and it was determined in the affirmative.

Mr. ATHERTON subsequently moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the Senate agreed to recede from this amendment in order to afford the Senators from Florida, who were absent when the vote was taken, an opportunity to vote upon it.

Messrs. WESTCOTT and YULEE strenuously advocated the amendment of the Senate; and insisted that the Senate should adhere to it.

Messrs. HALE, PHELPS, ATHERTON, DAVIS, of Massachusetts, and CRITTENDEN opposed the amendment.

The motion to reconsider was determined in the negative.

THE LOAN BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill from the House of Representatives to authorize a loan not to exceed the sum of sixteen millions of dollars.

The question pending was upon ordering the amendments to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

Mr. ATHERTON moved to amend the bill, immediately after the clause requiring the bids to be opened publicly, by adding "and no proposals shall be withdrawn after the same shall have been received at the Department," and explained that the object was to impose upon bidders the obligation of a contract, and thus to prevent the withdrawal of the higher bids in favor of the lower, to the loss of the government, by a combination between the bidders. He remarked that the amendment had been suggested by the honorable Senator from Vermont, [Mr. PHELPS,] and had the approbation of the Senator from Massachusetts, then absent, [Mr. WEBSTER.]

PUBLIC LANDS IN ALABAMA.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. BAGBY asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to cede to the State of Alabama the lands unsold in that State, belonging to the United States, and remaining unsold after the first day of May, 1848, and for other purposes.

Mr. BAGBY said that in bringing forward this bill, he had two objects in view. The first was to terminate the unpleasant and embarrassing relation of landlord and tenant, between the State of Alabama and the government of the United States. The first section of the bill proposes to cede to the State of Alabama, all the public lands lying in that State, and remaining unsold, on the first day of May next, exempting from the operation of the bill, pre-emption rights, the right to reservations under the Indian treaties, and grants under treaties with foreign nations. The records of the treasury show, that the proceeds of the sales of the public lands in Alabama, exceed by several millions of dollars, the amount paid for the territory lying within the limits of that State to foreign nations, for the extinguishment of the Indian title, and all the expenses of surveying and selling the land.

The second section cedes to the States all the land lying within their respective limits so soon as it is ascertained from the returns in the Treasury Department, that the proceeds of the sales of the lands in such States has re-imbursed the general government all the expenses, as indicated in the first section of the bill. Thus, the Senate will perceive, that the ground upon which this system for the extinction of the title of the United States, in the public land lying in the different States of the Union, is, that the government shall have been reimbursed the purchase money and all the expenses incident to the public those states.

This in itself, is, in my judgment, a consideration of very great weight, entirely sufficient not only to authorize, but to demand the passage of this bill. In addition to this high and weighty consideration of a general nature, there is another, but little inferior in importance; and that is the constant practice of making appropriations of the public land to purposes of internal improvement, in violation of the constitutional power of Congress, and in direct conflict with the rights of the States, and as I believe, the true interest of the people. I do not propose to go at length into these views now, I ask, that the bill may be twice read, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and upon the coming in of their report, I shall with the permission of the Senate, perhaps, give my views at more length.

The bill was read the first and second times by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The following message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. WALKER, his Secretary :

To the Senate of the United States :

I transmit herewith a report of the Secretary of State with accompanying documents, in compliance with the resolution of the Senate, of the 17th inst., requesting the President to communicate to that body "copies of the correspondence between the minister of the United States at London and any authorities of the British government, in relation to a postal arrangement between the two countries."

JAMES K. POLK.

Washington, March 27, 1848.

On motion by Mr. NILES, it was Ordered, That it be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and be printed.

CALIFORNIA CLAIMS.

Mr. CASS gave notice that on to-morrow, during the morning hour, he should move to proceed to the consideration of the bill for ascertaining and paying the California claims.

GRANT OF LAND TO LOUISIANA.

On motion by Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, the prior orders were suspended and the Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to grant to the State of Louisiana certain lands for internal improvement.

Mr. JOHNSON remarked, that as he would be compelled to leave the city to-morrow in consequence of a domestic calamity, he trusted that the Senate would oblige him by allowing the bill to be acted upon at once.

Mr. BAGBY was sorry that he could not yield to the request of the honorable Senator. The bill contained, as he apprehended, a principle to which he entertained decided hostility. He could not consent that the bill should be allowed to pass without expressing his opposition to it; much less could he suffer it to pass without the usual forms of legislation. It was an attempt to do indirectly that which he had contended throughout his whole public life could not be done directly. Entertaining such views, it would be perceived that he could not assent to the request of the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. DIX inquired whether the bill had been taken up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER replied that the bill was before the Senate and was open to amendment.

Mr. DIX then remarked that he had not heard the question put on taking up the bill.

Mr. DICKINSON said that it might be all right, but he thought the procedure somewhat singular.

Mr. ASHLEY observed that the bill had been submitted to the Committee on Public Lands at the session before last, and had been amended. The evidence before the committee was quite conclusive that the land was of little or no value, and that great public interests would be subserved by making the grant. The committee unanimously concurred in reporting the bill: and he believed that there was no substantial reason against its passage.

Mr. BAGBY said that to his mind the objections were at all events fundamental and conclusive. The honorable Senator from Louisiana put the bill on the ground that the land was in the first instance to be appropriated to the State and afterwards to the Railroad company for the purpose of constructing their road. Where then was the difference in interposing the State as the conduit through which the grant was to be given, and making it directly? It was remarked by the Senator from Arkansas that the land was of little or no value. How had it happened then that it was sought by the State and afterwards by the railroad company? How could it contribute to the construction of the road? He denied that any benefit had ever resulted to the treasury from these grants of land, and asked those who thought otherwise to point to any statistics which presented to the contrary.

Mr. DOWNS said he believed it had been customary to make such grants of lands in other States, and if his recollection was correct a series of resolutions had been offered which would come up hereafter for discussion, and it would then be a more favorable time to discuss the subject than at present. He hoped, then, that as this was a matter in which so many interests were involved there would be no further opposition to the passage of the bill. There was, as gentlemen had said, a plan for a railroad from New Orleans to the Gulf to facilitate the communication with the sea, and the company had obtained the privilege of running their road through the property of private individuals, but they had no authority for passing through the domain belonging to the United States. It was a matter of small value to this government but of much importance to that part of the country; and he hoped, therefore, that all objection would be withdrawn.

Mr. ASHLEY remarked, that when he had characterized the public lands there as being of no value he meant by it, that they were of no value unimproved. According to the evidence before the committee, it appeared that the lands were situated in a swamp and that there was no settlement in the neighborhood; that the location was desirable as the termination of this railroad, and that this improvement might make them valuable. When this bill was originally introduced it proposed to make the grant to the railroad company. The committee, however, were not disposed to make the grant to the company, but they were disposed to make the grant to the State as a portion of the land the State was rightfully entitled to, and inasmuch as other States had received similar grants. All sovereignties were equal, and he could not conceive how it could be just and proper for Ohio and Indiana to receive four or five times as much as other States of the Union out of the public domain. It seemed to him that if the government adopted the principle of making grants of lands to States, these grants should be equal. It was not proposed that the government should construct works of internal improvement, it was merely proposed to make a grant to the State to aid her in making works for internal improvement, as other States had received similar grants. This was the view which had influenced the committee.

Mr. ATHERTON moved that the bill be laid on the table for the present, in order to proceed to the consideration of the special order of the day.

The question was taken, and on a division was decided in the affirmative.—Ayes 29—Noes 12.

MOTION TO RECONSIDER.

Mr. BAGBY moved to reconsider the vote of the Senate, on Friday last, on the passage of a bill granting a pension to Patrick Walker.

Ordered, That the consideration of the motion be postponed until to-morrow.

THE LOAN BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill from the House of Representatives, to authorize a loan not to exceed the sum of sixteen millions of dollars.

Mr. NILES.—There seems to be a desire to hurry this bill through, and although under the circumstances I have no disposition to delay its progress, yet I do not know that I shall have a more fitting occasion to say something—as I desire to do—in regard to our revenue system, and in regard to the present state of our finances. I shall take leave therefore to present to the Senate, for a very short time, some considerations on these subjects. I am very well aware, sir, that this is at best but a dry subject, consisting of details and figures, and that I can hardly expect to command the attention of this body to any thing that I may be disposed to suggest; and especially at a time when the whole subject of the revenue and of the finances of the country—in time of war usually considered of the first and highest importance—seems to be regarded now, and to have been regarded at the last session of Congress, as deserving of no attention at our hands. Sir, my honorable friend, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, in opening his Treasury budget here the other day, introduced his remarks by observing that it would be a great descent to come down from considering the state of those countries in Europe which had been brought under consideration, with their new-born and rising liberty, to the examination of the state of our finances. Well, I concur with my honorable friend, that even without assuming any unusual elevation of thought or imagination, but standing here on the footstool of the Senate, it will, I apprehend, be something of a descent, it will be penetrating into a place of obscurity, if not dreariness, to look into the present state of our finances. At the same time, sir, I think it is a duty which we owe to the country to do so, and although this body has no power to originate revenue bills; yet it is not the less a duty which it owes to the country to examine into the state of the revenue and see whether it is in as sound a condition as it ought to be; and if we find it not sound, to look ahead for a few years and see what condition it may be in at the end of one or two more fiscal years.

In regard to this bill I shall vote for it, not because it is such a bill as I could desire to vote for, but because it is the best I can hope to obtain. I suppose we are to have no other. And now, I wish to enquire of the honorable Senator, who is the representative of the Treasury here, whether he is informed that any other financial measure is to be brought before the Senate?

Mr. ATHERTON.—I will say in reply to the Senator, that I do not know of any, but I beg him to recollect that as far as regards the original revenue bills they do not belong to the Senate.

Mr. NILES.—I am aware that it is not the province of the Finance Committee of this body to bring forward revenue measures; but the chairman of that committee is supposed to know the wishes of the Treasury, where, latterly, measures of revenue seem to have their origin, and my inquiry was designed to obtain information from that source if the honorable chairman could furnish it. I presume then, that we are to have no other measure than this, and that this must be regarded as the measure of the session for supplying the wants of the Treasury. This is a bill to supply the Treasury by a loan, and we are to have no other. I shall vote for it, because the Treasury must be provided for, and I have no reason to believe that this bill will more than supply the wants of the Treasury; indeed my belief is, that it will fall short of furnishing enough for all the wants of the Treasury.

I am not disposed to go over the whole of the reports and estimates of the Treasury-Department, for I think probably we may have reason to believe, from all we have seen of them, that they are not entitled to the utmost confidence. We are called on to pass this bill, to supply the deficiencies of the treasury for the present fiscal year—sixteen millions of dollars; twelve millions and a half that are actually wanted for disbursements, and the additional sum as a convenient surplus to facilitate the operations of the treasury. Well, now, sir, I have not forgotten that in January a year ago we had a bill before us for a loan, or the issue of treasury notes, to the amount of twenty-three millions of dollars, with the authority to renew the act of the previous session authorizing the issue of treasury notes to the amount of five millions; and we were then told that that supply would meet the demands of the treasury for the then fiscal year and for the present fiscal year, carrying on the operations of the government until the first of July next. I know it was said then by some gentlemen that they apprehended it would be found insufficient; but such was the estimate from the treasury, such was the view presented here, and under this view the bill was passed. We are now told that twelve millions and a half more is wanted to complete the present year, showing that there was an error in the estimates to that amount, and according to the estimates made at the commencement of the present session, the deficiency was represented to be about eighteen millions of dollars.—Afterwards a mistake to the amount of nearly seven millions was discovered, from which it was claimed that the treasury was to that amount in a better condition than had been supposed; but since then a new mistake has been discovered on the other side, showing that the treasury is not in so good a condition by at least a million and half, as it was supposed to be after the discovery of the first mistake.

Now, sir, these large errors in the reports from the department are not calculated to inspire much confidence in what may come from the treasury on this subject. But it is not my purpose in making an examination to go behind the reports that we get from the treasury. I take them as we find them, and I shall vote for this bill, because I am satisfied that the amount it proposes to supply is at least required. The only question, then, that can be made in regard to this bill, it be ng admitted that this money is wanted, and that there is to be no other proposition for supplying the treasury in a different form by increasing our revenue, or in any other way—the only question that can remain, is, as to the form and mode of supplying this deficiency by way of loan; whether in the form proposed by this bill or by treasury notes, or compounded of the two forms, as was the character of the bill of last year. I did not know but we should have a proposition to amend this bill, by an authority to issue treasury notes. I am satisfied, however, with the bill as it is, though I believe the commercial community will be of opinion that treasury notes would be more favorable to the financial condition of the country—more likely to promote the commercial and financial interests of the country—still I am not sure but a direct loan is on the whole a better mode.

Whilst the condition of our revenue is by no means such as it ought to be in my judgment, and wholly inadequate to the demands of the treasury in time of war, it is gratifying to perceive that our finances in a more limited sense, considered independently of the state of our revenue, are, and have been, in a very satisfactory condition. I think that our finances in this view, are, and have been in a state of soundness, that is unexampled during a period of war in this country or in any other; for the almost necessary operation of a state of war in any country, is to derange its currency, and more or less to effect its commercial and financial interests of every description. This has generally arisen from the unusual use of its credit by the government in one of two forms, and sometimes in both. Either by direct use of the credit of the government in the form of treasury notes, exchequer bills, or whatever they may be called, or by loans, which are merely the use of the credit of banks, or paper issued in some form, which is not money, nor the real representative of specie. We all know very well that during the last war with Great Britain the financial operations of this government were in both of these forms—that treasury notes were issued to a very large amount—that the loans that were made were mere loans of credit, loans made of banks, or capitalists, all of which were satisfied by bank notes; and those notes having a great depreciation in value at the time. These measures, sir, were productive of a great loss to the government, in its direct operations by receiving as money depreciated paper, and indirectly by inflating the currency, and increasing the value of everything which the government had to purchase during a state of war, so that during the whole of the war the value received for the loans made by the government, though nominally eighty per cent., were probably not over fifty per cent. But we have experienced during the present war nothing of this; we have been able to negotiate loans at par, and have, of course, received full value; and by not interfering with the paper currency of the country in any form, we have avoided any dangerous or pernicious inflation of the currency. And these results, permit me to say, are mainly attributable to one great measure, which I feel proud, sir, in having had some little agency after a long struggle in getting through this body, that is to say, the independent treasury law. I believe that law, sir, has had a most salutary effect every way, both upon the finances of the government, the finances of the country, and upon the commerce of the country. It has been tested at a very important period, a period of war, when this government has been called upon to collect and disburse sixty millions of dollars a year, and all this has been conducted by bringing into operation the specie principle without disturbing even in a moderate degree the currency of the country. I should like to know how any measure could be more fully, more satisfactorily tested than this great measure has been during the past two years? And suppose these sixty millions had gone into your banks what would have been the inevitable consequence to all our interests—to the government directly—to the commercial interests of the country; and above all, sir, permit me to say to the manufacturing interests. I avow myself the friend of that interest, yet not more than others. This law has proved a great conservative principle, for though it may not be sufficient, with a very defective system of revenue to sustain that interest; still it has done much towards maintaining it in that state of prosperity which it has experienced for the last two years. If we had received and disbursed paper, what would have been the necessary—the inevitable result? It would have been that the whole revenue, part of it in specie, and the twenty-two millions of specie imported, would have gone into the banks, and it would have been substituted in circulation by the paper of the banks, the result of which must have been an inflation of the whole currency of the country, probably to the extent of fifty per cent at least. This we all know. It is not a state of things to which the country is a stranger. We know the consequence would have been to have given an artificial value to everything, and that the financial result would have been distress in the highest degree, and all the evils and sacrifices of a depreciated currency and ruinous speculation. And on the return of peace under circumstances like these—always hailed with joy—always looked forward to by the commercial classes, as a point of new departure—as the commencement of new and more active enterprises in business—would have been found a period of a terrible re-action; and the high state of prices to which everything had been carried would have had to come down, bringing with it ruinous sacrifices. Instead of that happy period which the country would have a right to expect on the return of peace, there would have been a long ordeal of two years at least, to be passed before the commerce of the country would have resumed a healthful state. The effects of this period of excitement during the war, on the one hand, and the depression after its close, on the other, we have avoided by the adoption of the great principle of separating the funds of the government from those of the banks, and by restricting our transactions, both as regards the receipts and the disbursements of the finances of the government to specie. I know my friends over the way have condemned this measure very strenuously. It has been made, as is almost every other, a party measure; and if they could get into power, I am very apprehensive that they would, as they did on a former occasion, repeal the law, without being able to substitute any other in its place, and thus revive the deposit system. If I supposed they would regard anything that I might say, I would warn them against a course like this—against doing so foolish a thing. I would warn them against disregarding the results of the experience which we have had upon this subject. I would warn them against reviving a disastrous connection between the treasury and the banking system of this country—bad enough at best, defective enough in any view—but rendered infinitely more so by its connection with the financial affairs of the government. Even Mr Biddle, who is good authority with the other side of the chamber, after his large experience, said that the breaking up of this connection was a good thing both for the country and the banks, for that the connection had always been injurious to both.

Although I think that our finances are sound at this time, and that the affairs of the treasury are going along very well, that it is enabled to perform all its necessary functions: at the same time, I must say, that I think it is a short sighted and unwise policy, to go on as we have done, depending for all the extraordinary demands of the treasury, on a system of loans. I consider this as being a mistaken policy; certainly it is a new policy, new in this country, new I believe, in every other. It necessarily results in creating a large public debt; and that will be the result of that debt, when this war shall be brought to a close, is a question which I believe is involved in some obscurity at present. Still we are all aware that the whole amount of the expenses of the war, have gone to swell the amount of the debt, as the revenue has hardly been equal to the ordinary demands upon the treasury. We have provided no revenue for the war; no war taxes, or revenue of any kind. I believe it is not claimed in any quarter that we have. We have made no provision for the extraordinary expenses of the war. We have a revenue from customs and public lands. Our revenue from customs has not been increased with a view to provide for the expenses of the war, but on the contrary, the law was modified after the commencement of the war, as I supposed at the time, and and as was generally believed, with a view to a reduction of revenue. I know it has since been claimed, that the new system has increased the revenue, that we get more revenue under the present law, than we did under the act of 1842. I think the fact is not so, sir, but however this may be, if it is a consequence, it certainly was not the design or purpose at the time. It was introduced and carried through Congress, as a measure for reducing duties, and thus lightening the burthen upon commerce, and upon the country. Well, sir, I did not concur in that measure. I did not concur in it even as a measure adapted to the condition of the country in time of peace. I believed it was a measure not the best calculated, not the most efficient for revenue, and though many, perhaps a great portion of the people, have been taught to believe that it has proved itself to be a most efficient revenue measure, still I am of the same opinion as I was at that time, that the measure is hardly sufficient for the wants of the treasury, even in time of peace; of course it was altogether insufficient for a state of war, and has forced upon us the necessity of providing for the extraordinary expenses of the war by loans.

Mr. President, before looking into the present state of the finances, I have a few remarks to make in relation to our revenue system for some years back. I believe that the country has been under a very great mistake, in regard to the efficiency of our revenue system, for a long series of years. I remember when we were troubled very much with a surplus revenue, when we had, as was supposed, so much that we did not know what to do with it. I recollect very well at that time, that the honorable Senator from Missouri, told us that we had no surplus. I thought differently, and I voted with the majority. We had an actual surplus; still that surplus was, as the result proved, a mere anticipation of the revenue of future years, and experience has proved that the Senator from Missouri was correct, that we had no surplus, because to judge of the efficiency of your revenue system, you must not take a single year, but a series of years, and if during that series you find a surplus, you will establish a fact to act upon, when you proceed to provide such a state of things. I find on looking back to 1833, when the system of reduction commenced, and tracing it down to 1842, a period of ten years, there was an actual deficiency of revenue from customs, taken in connection with the ordinary land revenue, of about fifty millions of dollars. This was at the very period when Congress was disposing of a surplus revenue, and such has been the irregular action of our revenue system. The revenue from customs during the period to which I have alluded averaged about fifteen millions and a half, while the expenses of the government were not less than from twenty-three to twenty-four millions. If you add then to the revenue from customs, the only remaining revenue, which is that from public lands, say two millions and a half a year, you have a total revenue of eighteen millions, with an average expenditure of between twenty-three or twenty-four millions annually—making a deficiency in the course of the ten years of more than fifty millions. This deficiency was provided for, in the first place by the very extraordinary speculations which took place in the public lands swelling the revenue from that source, in three years, 1835, '36, and '37, to nearly fifty millions of dollars. Twenty-eight millions of this was distributed among the States, leaving, however, a large surplus in the Treasury. But, in addition to this, we had at that time a large fund, the result of former revenues in the stock of the bank of the United States to the amount of seven millions and a half. In addition to these extensive sources of supply, we had to issue Treasury notes during that session, in three years, 1835, '36, and '37, to nearly fifty millions of dollars. Twenty-eight millions of this was distributed among the States, leaving, however, a large surplus in the Treasury. But, in addition to this, we had at that time a large fund, the result of former revenues in the stock of the bank of the United States to the amount of seven millions and a half. In addition to these extensive sources of supply, we had to issue Treasury notes during the administration of Mr. Van Buren, leaving at the close of this administration about six millions outstanding, and the administration coming in immediately after finding the finances in a low state was obliged to have recourse to loans immediately—thus increasing the public debt—until in 1842, before the act of that year went into operation to about twenty-three millions. These facts being so, it is very evident that we have had a deficient revenue from customs for a long period of time. During the three years which followed the passage of the act of 1842, the revenue was something more than the expenditures of the government, making a reduction of the public debt, and leaving at the commencement of the war a debt of about seventeen millions.

During this long period we see that so deficient has been our revenue from customs, that we have been obliged to contract debts in time of peace, to expend the revenues which had been accumulated in former years, all the extraordinary revenues from public lands, and yet leaving us in debt at the commencement of this war, to the amount of seventeen millions.

There is no country in the world that has more ample and reliable sources of revenue than the United States, and still, sir, there are perhaps few in which the revenue has been more unstable, has fluctuated more—at times being suffered to be more than sufficient, and at others, for a long period of years, greatly below the wants of the Treasury. This, sir, has been owing to the instability of our legislation. The Treasury may be compared with a patient, who would be well enough if his kind friends would let him alone; who has naturally a good constitution and good health, but whom, his kind friends persuade, that he is always in a very dangerous situation; that he is actually in a state of disease, or that there is a redundancy in the system—a surplus of health—and that he is threatened with apoplexy or some shock that will suddenly take him off, notwithstanding he is in perfect health; and that he must have medical assistance. But he is not only under the necessity of calling in professional assistance at all times, but the kind of practice which is applied to the case, has undergone such violent changes, as has produced very severe shocks upon the system. For many years he was under the care of what might be called the stimulating school of the profession. They gave him drugs, bark, wine and brandy; but when he arrived at a high state of health apparently, it was said he was in great danger of an attack of apoplexy, and a new course of treatment must be introduced. The patient must be reduced; depletion must be resorted to. Well, this system was commenced, and after going on with it for about ten years, then it was changed; and a stimulating practice again adopted. And what is remarkable, the same distinguished physician who had prescribed the stimulating remedies, suddenly changed his course, and recommended the reducing practice, and followed it for about ten years. Well, after a time—in about three years or so—the patient was fast improving; a new set of physicians were called in—for this patient had a great many friends, and they were all anxious about him—they said that the stimulating practice would not do, and that it would be necessary to go back to the reducing practice. They put the patient upon this new system, and he is there now. This system, when carried into extremes, I think may be called the homœpathic practice; but that system, however valuable in medicine, I think does not succeed in financial matters. The principle of that practice, I believe is expressed by the phrase—which being freely translated means, "the hair of the same dog will cure." That may do in medicine, but it will not do in finance; for if you apply it to finance, it must be in this way: whatever creates a disease, will serve to remove it, and hence the remedy for a public debt will be to incre ase the debt; the remedy for public burdens will be to increase them; and the way to pay off one loan will be to create another.

The method for paying off one debt will be to create a new debt. Now, there is another principle in this system which is called the principle of attenuation, which is, as I understand it, that the less creates the greater power; the less the substance the greater the efficacy; the less the cause the greater the effect. This may do very well in medicine, but I do not think it will work in finance. I am not one of those who believe that the way to meet increased demands upon the treasury is to reduce your revenue; nor do I believe that the way to increase your revenue is to reduce the duties. I believe you may attenuate a little too far. I am not in favor of extreme measures in revenue, or in anything else. I believe that the truth lies between extremes.

I have to call the attention of the Senate, after these introductory remarks, to a few statistics, showing the present state of our finances. I think that the statement of the Senator from New Hampshire, connected as it was with loans and treasury notes, reimbursed and re-issued, is calculated to confuse and embarrass very much. I wish to look at the subject independently of every thing of that kind. I wish to look at two simple ideas, that is to say, the income or revenue of the country, and the expenditures of the country. These two statements will show what our condition is, for whenever expenditures have exceeded the income, there must necessarily be a debt in some form. Sir, there is no avoiding this conclusion. I shall look back, then, to the operation of our revenue system for a few years, commencing with the year ending June 30, '45, when the revenue was $29,769,133, and the expenditures were $29,966,206. We have no certain knowledge, I believe, from the reports from the Treasury Department, of the actual expenses of any given year. What are reported as the expenditures, are the disbursements of the year, and the disbursements of the year may vary very much from the actual expenditures. The expenditures of the last quarter, or a considerable portion of them, are not paid until the first quarter of the next year and part of the expenditures of one year go into the disbursements of the next year. In ordinary times, this may make no great difference; but it is evident, that the difference may be very material, when there is a change from peace to war.

In the expenditures of the year 1845 are included, for the redemption of treasury notes and the loan of 1841 and '43 the sum of $7,527,137, which leaves the actual disbursements for current expenditures $22,430,069. This is considerably less than the expenditure for preceding years, and it is quite possible that there is some error in the statement connected with the issuing and the redemption of treasury notes, as such errors we see have occurred the past year. In the year ending the 30th June, 1846, the treasury report is as follows:

Total receipts,	$29,891,245
Total expenditures,	29,931,111

In the expenditures of this year are included $365,095 for the redemption of loans and treasury notes, making the actual expenditures for current liabilities $27,646,032. The breaking out of the Mexican war, near the close of this year, contributed to swell the expenditures perhaps several millions, although the war was not declared but little more than one month before the close of the fiscal year.

In the year ending June 30, 1847, the receipts and expenditures were—

Total receipts,	$26,346,736
Total expenditures,	59,151,177

Of this sum there was included for the redemption of treasury notes and loans $2,372,398, leaving the actual expenditures of the year $57,078,879, from which deduct the receipts of the year and we find that the excess of expenditure is $30,732,143. This is the result of the first year of the war, according to the reports from the Treasury Department. The revenue was nearly four millions less than had been estimated the year before, and the expenditures some two or three millions more.

I now come to the present fiscal year. The expenditures for this year were estimated in the Treasury report, at the commencement of the last session of Congress, at about forty-five millions. By the report of December last they are estimated at $58,615,660, of which $16,469,194 were for the first quarter, which had been settled at the treasury. Since that report there has been an additional estimate of deficiencies to the amount of four millions, making the whole estimates for the year $62,615,660. If the three last quarters should, on an average, equal the first already ascertained, the expenditures will amount to the sum of $65,874,656. The receipts of the year are estimated:

For Customs,	$31,000,000
Public Lands,	2,900,000
Miscellaneous,	100,000
Total,	$34,000,000

Whether these estimates will be sustained I am not prepared to say. I am not disposed to go into that question, it is a very large sum, however, for us to receive in any condition of our financial system. We have never at any period received as nett revenue a sum equal to this, even in the most excited and inflated state of our trade. I am inclined to think that the estimate is two millions too high; the revenue from customs may possibly amount to twenty-nine millions. I think that the land revenue is estimated too high because it is a million beyond the usual revenue from that source, though there may be more land thrown into the market still there are drawbacks from the soldiers' scrip and land warrants. In regard to the expenditures I cannot speak with confidence, but where the expenditure is so large the estimates would be more likely to be below than above the mark. I am inclined to think, therefore, that the result this year will vary from these estimates some five or six millions, taking the excess of estimated revenue and the increase of expenditures.

Well, sir, taking it as it is, it leaves us at the end of the present fiscal year with a deficiency incurred in two years, of fifty-eight million and a half of dollars.

I have estimated the outstanding war claims at five millions, the land bounties excluded, which will make five millions more, and the expenses under the treaty at twenty millions which will make altogether ninety-eight millions.

Deduct the receipts, $34,900,000, from the estimated expenditure of 62,615,660, and the deficiency is found to be $27,715,660.

Deficiency for the year ending June 30, 1847,	$30,732,143
Deficiency for the year ending June 30, 1848,	27,715,660
Total for the two years	$58,447,803

This statement shows the actual deficiency for the two years of the war, leaving the receipts for Treasury notes and loans, and the disbursement on that account out of the calculation. I now exhibit a statement to show what will be the whole public debt on the first of July next, provided the treaty of peace with Mexico shall be ratified:

Deficiencies for the two years of the war	$58,447,803
Debt existing at the commencement of the war	17,000,000
Outstanding claims growing out of the war, estimated at	5,000,000
Soldiers' scrip and land warrants, estimated at	5,000,000
To be expended under the treaty	20,000,000
Total	$105,447,803
Deduct for the balance in the Treasury, July 1, 1846, which was 9,100,000, leaving in the Treasury as necessary to its action 2,100,000	7,000,000
	$98,447,803

The result, I fear, will not be so favorable as this by several millions. The public debt at the end of the present fiscal year can hardly be less than one hundred millions. And should the war continue, it must be much more. So far as this statement depends on estimates, I apprehend that the revenue is over-stated, and the expenditures and unliquidated liabilities under-estimated. The revenue for the present year, I think, is over-estimated, but not to the extent stated by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. PHELPS,] who supposed it would fall short seven millions.

Mr. President, I wish now to call the attention of the Senate to the next fiscal year ending on the first of July, 1849: This would be the first year after the peace, should we get peace, and it is important to see what our financial condition will then be under our present revenue system. The Secretary of the Treasury has estimated the revenue of that year at over thirty-five millions, thirty-two of it being for customs. But this estimate is in my judgment altogether too high. It is founded upon the assumption that our exports and imports were to continue to increase; whereas the exports have for the last six months fallen off largely, probably more than twenty millions compared with the corresponding period of last year. This must be followed by a rapid decline of the importations which has already commenced. As the ground on which his estimate was made has failed, the estimate must fall with it.

I assume for the receipts for the next fiscal year, the revenue of the last year, which was a prosperous one for our trade; more so than we have any reason to expect the coming year. I then assume as the basis of the expenditure that of the year ending in June 1846, the last year preceding the war:

Estimated amount for the year ending June 30, 1849.	$26,346,736
Estimated expenditure on the basis of the year 1846.	27,646,032
Add for additional interest on public debt,	5,000,000
Total,	$32,646,032
Deduct revenue,	26,346,736
Deficiency,	$6,319,296

It is true, as I have already stated, that the expenditures of that year embrace two or three millions growing out of the war, yet we can hardly hope to reduce our expenditures, next year or probably any year after the termination of the war, below this estimate as long as the public debt remains. The war must necessarily leave us with increased expenditures which we cannot get rid of. To what point will the army be reduced with our extended frontier? It must be greatly above the former peace establishment. The navy is also increased, the pension list greatly extended, and almost every branch of expenditure considerably enlarged. If there is any correctness in this statement, there must be a deficiency the next fiscal year of more than six millions, and it may reach ten millions.

Now, the great question is, what is to be done in future? We get through the present period very well, but what is to be done in future? And I think this is a question which deserves the serious consideration of Congress and the country. What are we to do if we get peace? We are looking and hoping for peace, while here we are, upon the verge of its attainment with a public debt of ninety-eight millions of dollars, or it may be called a hundred. Now the question is, whether our condition is such that we can in safety go on as we have been going; if we can, then it may be all very well. Our extraordinary expenditures will be stopped and we should know how to provide, for the new peace establishment, somewhat augmented, certainly by the necessity of paying the interest upon the public debt. This is a very grave question, and in my humble judgment no time should be lost in looking at it. We should look it full in the face, and with the courage and determination which is always necessary in cases of this kind; we should set about providing for it immediately. What will be our condition at the end of the next fiscal year? What can we expect to receive from customs? and what from public lands? Can we hope to do better than the result of the last fiscal year?—that is to say, the year ending 30th June last? I know that the Secretary of the Treasury looks for results far more favorable. He has some idea—though it is one in which I cannot concur—that in a state of excited and extraordinary trade the amount received for customs is not to be regarded as an extraordinary revenue, but as a starting point, and that we are to go on increasing our trade; taking the flood-tide of our commerce and revenue, we are to go on from that point increasing from year to year. But this is contrary to all experience in this country, and, indeed, it is contrary to absolute truth, because this extraordinary state of trade, this unusual amount of importations, going beyond the ability of the country, in some degree, and beyond its exports, which is its ability to pay, must unavoidably be followed by a reaction and a falling off of importation, and consequently of revenue.

From these facts it necessarily follows, that instead of going on in a corresponding ratio of increase, you have got to descend in subsequent years. It is true, that during the last fiscal year the balance of trade was in our favor, but how is it at this time? Our difficulties do not arise out of the last fiscal year, but out of the present. And this large revenue of—say twenty-nine millions—the present year is, in part the returns from the exports of last year, and in part is creating a balance against us. Is it not an anticipation of a part of the revenue of subsequent years? Is it not founded in part on an excess of importations beyond the amount of your exports? If so, does it not follow as a necessary consequence, that instead of this increase continuing, there must be a falling off? because your exports of the subsequent year must go to pay for the imports of the preceding year. Take the last year, which was a year remarkable for its import and export trade, and for unusual commercial prosperity, and more than ordinarily free from a spirit of speculation. I was prepared to expect a very large increase in the importations of the year, but large as the importations were, they were less than I expected, considering the amount of our exports, and the result is creditable to the sagacity and judgment of our merchants.

Now, this is an unfavorable state of things. Unfavorable at least upon the revenue of next year. This balance must be paid, and it must be paid out of the revenue of the next year. I have a document here which will show the condition of our exports for the last six months, and for a corresponding period last year. It was received from a commercial friend in New York.

Statement of the exports of breadstuffs, from this country to Great Britain, from September 1, 1847, to March 4, 1848

	Flour, bbls	Meal, bbls	Wheat, bush.	Corn, bush.
From New York	137,062	20,913	177,934	751,170
New Orleans to Feb. 26	13,554	30,166	33,195	282,280
Philadelphia	1,535	19,639		76,149
Baltimore	770	1,596	4,000	88,478
Boston	504	3,100		77,094
Other ports to Feb. 26				21,184
Total	153,445	76,104	215,139	1,337,204
The exports for the same period a year ago, were	1,258,876	249,852	1,273,892	6,931,640
Decrease	1,105,431	173,748	1,058,743	5,594,436

I have computed the value of these exports for cash period in New York, assuming for last years prices, $8 50 for flour; $2 25 for wheat; $5 50 for meal; and $1 12½ for corn; and for the last period the prices ruling at the present time. The total value of the exports for the first period exceeds 22,000,000, and those of the last period a little more than 2,000,000, showing a difference of over 20,000,000 of dollars. The freights for the first period exceeds three millions of dollars, and for the last are less than two hundred thousand, so that the loss on the freights, had it all gone to American citizens, exceeds the whole amount of the exports and freights for the last six months. The facts in this statement were taken from the commercial shipping list, and are presumed to be substantially correct.

This astonishing decline in our exports does not afford a very encouraging prospect for our trade the coming year. The balance against us the present year will be large, probably from twenty to thirty millions. It is ascertained to amount to twelve millions the first quarter.

This diminution does not correspond very well with the idea of the Secretary of the Treasury. He seems to suppose that the very favorable state of trade which prevailed last year was the result almost entirely of the modified state of our revenue laws, and from this he drew the conclusion, that our trade would go on increasing. Now, whether influenced by the modification of the revenue laws may have had, I believe it is generally understood that the increase of trade was owing to other causes, principally to the increased demand for our exports from the failure of the harvest in Europe. This demand having ceased, or greatly declined, our trade must also decline. We have not only lost a large amount in quantity of our exports, but there is also a great decline in their value or price—on many of our staples, at least forty per cent. While the quantity of breadstuffs we have than eighty yer cent., we have lost in price forty per cent. The demand for our breadstuffs in Europe has declined almost to nothing, and in regard to the great staple, cotton, it has fallen off in value about thirty per cent., they having the entire control of the market as far as that article is concerned. I do not see the distinguished Senator from South Carolina, but I would like to call his attention to that great interest of the South, and I think the time will come when he and others at the South, who deem it their duty, as they ought, to take care of that interest, will change their views somewhat. How is it, I would ask, that this great staple has been so suddenly reduced in its value throughout the world? What causes have produced this result? We know the cause which has brought down the price of breadstuffs; it is owing to the fact, that the cause, a short crop, which enhanced the price, has ceased to exist. But what has brought down the price of cotton? Has the world ceased to use the article? It is very apparent that the market for our cotton is Liverpool, and it is there that the price is regulated. The bank of England, and the large capitalists of that country know how to use the power they possess; they use it for various purposes; sometimes for the purpose of drawing specie from other parts of the world to sustain the bank. They can make money scarce, and raise its value at any time; and thus check the demand for cotton, and suddenly strike down the price from the highest point. This they can do in regard to cotton, and the balance of trade is thereby turned against us. The bank and a dozen capitalists can produce a state of things in the money market, which in thirty days will reduce the price of this great staple twenty-five or thirty per cent. I am looking at this matter more particularly as to its bearing on our trade, upon our imports for another year. Our staple articles being greatly diminished both in quantity and in value, of course our imports must be small in amount. Now, if I am asked what remedy for this evil, I answer, the only remedy is, to get, in a greater degree than we now have, the control of this staple ourselves. When we are able to check this absolute control over the market, we can resist combinations of the monied power in England, to strike down the price of this great staple of our country. We now manufacture about one quarter of all the cotton that we raise; if we manufactured one half of it, then the control would be here, or sufficiently so to counteract the monied power of England. We could then hold on to our cotton, manufacture it ourselves and supply a great many of the markets that are now supplied by Great Britain, one half of whose exports are cotton, most of it ours, in a manufactured state. It is not the way to avoid an evil of a like kind in future, to try to shut our eyes to that which stares us in the face.

Sir, it is a fact that the prosperous condition of our trade has been arrested within the last eight months, in a more sudden and more extraordinary manner than it ever was before in the whole course of our history, without any apparent cause on our part. Every interest of the country is arrested, and those very sanguine hopes and anticipations which existed eight months ago, seemed to have entirely vanished; and instead of looking forward to those results which were then anticipated, the men of business are now carefully considering how they can get along, and save themselves from greater embarrassments and difficulties. Sir, what is the condition of our navigating interests? Never was there so great a change in so short a period. It was last year producing an income of a hundred per cent or more, it now produces probably not more than six per cent. And what is the condition of our commercial interest? It was prosperous last year, now it is pretty much at a stand, and the future is full of doubt and uncertainty. And what is the condition of the manufacturing interest, which was thought to be too prosperous a few years ago? It is struggling against great difficulties. Well, how is it with that greatest of all interests, the agricultural, that is the interest which I would like to cherish above all others, the farming, the planting interest? Where are those golden dreams that we were indulging in a few months ago? They are all vanished. And what is the loss in the aggregate to the country? And what will it be another year? Take three cents a pound off your cotton crop, of eleven hundred millions of pounds, and the reduction in its value is thirty three millions of dollars. Take your wheat crop at 114,000,000 bushels, supposing one half of it to be disposable, and take fifty cents from each bushel and you lose about thirty millionsof dollars. Take your corn crop of about 500,0000,000, or more of bushels supposing one-half of it to be disposable and the decline of price at least forty cents a bushel, shows a loss of a hundred millions of dollars. Thus it is with all your interests, they are all in a low and depressed condition; prices low and declining. And if this state of things continues, must not labor, if it does not already, soon feel its paralyzing effect? How sudden and great the change in all the great interests of the country! And where are we to look for the cause? At home or abroad? It is not my purpose to examine into it. There is no interest now producing more than six per cent. Well, here is an immense diminution of the ability of the country to purchase and consume foreign goods, and yet we are told by the Secretary that this consumption is to go on increasing. Why it cannot go on. The people cannot buy if they have nothing to buy with. It is a state of things that cannot continue.

Now, in regard to the future; what is the situation in which we shall be placed at the end of the next fiscal year? We shall have a debt of one hundred millions of dollars to be provided for, the interest of which must be paid, with the current expenses of the government, from a declining revenue. If the ideas of the Secretary of the Treasury could be realized, if this prosperous state of our trade were to go on increasing, we might possibly get along without looking to any new sources for revenue. But if the views which I have taken are at all well founded, and I fear they are but too well founded, the period of reaction is coming, and we are to have a diminished revenue and great embarrassments in our finances. We will have this debt upon our hands with a failing and sinking revenue. The Secretary says that the results of last year were produced by the modification of the revenue laws, and that the cause remaining, the same prosperity of trade will continue. He has carried his imagination to a high pitch. He has extended his calculations to the year 1849, and supposes that our exports will then amount to three hundred and twenty-nine millions, and that our imports will equal, if not exceed that amount. He thinks that the amount of our imports now is very small compared with our domestic exchanges. His theory is that foreign commerce is an exchange of imports for exports. Now, the facts that I have referred to in regard to the extraordinary decline of our exports while our importations are going on, is entirely at variance with any such idea. And, indeed, our whole commercial history is in conflict with this idea. His theory is not only unsupported by fact, but is opposed to our whole commercial experience. We know that at all times, when we have had large importations, this excess has been followed by a re-action and diminution of exports, carrying them below the ordinary amount. But the calculation of the Secretary is founded on the idea that our trade is to go on increasing—that our imports are to increase—and, of course, that our revenue is to increase in a corresponding degree. But, if what I have stated be true, instead of increasing it will diminish. It must necessarily take this course. Imports cannot be increased without a corresponding increase of exports.

The idea that our imports control our exports is wholly at variance with what we see existing at the present time. They have gone on greatly beyond our exports. The large importations for months past, are the returns for exports of preceding years in part, and in part the result of the crisis in England being sent on British account; and will produce a balance against us, and this balance must soon occasion a re-action in our foreign trade. And there is another circumstance that is operating unfavorably upon our revenue. The price of imports of every kind is reduced twenty-five per cent. In order then to reach the ordinary amount in value, you have to increase the quantity. But the increase of quantity must depend on the ability of the country to consume. This will operate against us, because we must get the amount in value, in order to obtain the revenue, for revenue is founded on value. The country has been told that the present revenue system is more efficient and productive than the one it superseded. But the fact is not so; we ought not to deceive ourselves, or the country. It has been tried under the most favorable circumstances, and found insufficient as a revenue measure. The revenue has fallen off nearly four millions the first year, although a year of unusual commercial prosperity. There is no getting away from this fact; no reasoning nor sophistry can get round it. The Secretary attempts to do so, by selecting a certain period, breaking up the regular fiscal year. He takes the period from December '46 to December '47; a period of extraordinary trade, and the first quarter of which, embracing several millions of revenue belonging to the preceding year, which was occasioned by the change in the revenue laws. You can often select one quarter of a year in which the revenue is double that of another quarter. The result of a limited period amounts to nothing. You must take a series of years, you cannot determine from any one year. The year from December '46 to December '47, was a very remarkable year for trade; and to assume that as a standard, and to hope for an increase from that high point under our new system, is to suppose a result that is contrary to the fact so far, contrary to all sound reasoning, and to the whole past experience of the country.

If the view I have taken be correct, that our revenue must diminish, and that our expenditures cannot by any possibility be reduced below thirty-three millions, it follows that there must be a deficiency of from six to ten millions of dollars for the fiscal year ending the 30th June 1849; and as there will be a debt upon our hands of about a hundred millions, and we are going on with a revenue falling below the annual expenditures, in this state of things, it may be asked when is our condition to be any better. If putting an end to the war expenses is not to help us, what is to help us out of this difficulty? When is this debt to be paid? It certainly cannot be paid by a deficient revenue. How is it to be paid? Sir, this subject does not seem to receive the attention which it deserves. We do not look at it. I do not know but that we are in the condition of Abel Handy in the play. His house happened to take fire, and he was asked why he did not put it out. He said he was thinking about it, but he was waiting to see if it would not go out of itself. Now I think that our Treasury is in a consuming state, if not on fire. And this fire will not go out of itself. This debt will not be paid by a declining and deficient revenue. This is not a result that ever has or ever can follow. What then ought to be done? We can borrow to be sure. I believe the credit of the government is good. But borrowing will not pay our debts. Borrowing will not extricate a country when its finances become embarrassed, and a public debt has accumulated, and when it is in the unfortunate condition of having a revenue that is below its expenditures.

My honorable friend from New Hampshire, on introducing this measure, seemed to think that by procuring a loan, the deficiency could be supplied. I do not know what consolation to give my honorable friend, unless it is what may be derived from the old maxim that "misery loves company," and by referring him to a distinguished functionary of another country, who seems to be in the same dilemma. I observe that the first minister of the crown in England had the same unpleasant duty to perform in Parliament that the honorable Senator has had to perform here. He had to exhibit a budget showing a deficient revenue in a state of peace, though he did not exhibit so great a deficiency as we have here. Still there was a deficiency, and that in time of peace. The statement was received very coldly, even by the friends of the noble Lord. Well, sir, he did not propose a loan, nor did he propose to meet the deficiency by reduction or retrenchment; but he asked for an increase of taxes. He proposed an increase of the income tax. That was received rather coldly, though, between the two, I would prefer to have a tax rather than to drag on depending on loans. And therefore, I think the noble Lord occupied higher ground than my friend from New Hamnshire, the representative of the treasury here, who has brought forward no proposition to give life or vigor to our revenue, but has proposed to drag along under this old system of borrowing with an increasing deficit from year to year, until the credit of the government must eventually be broken down. There is where the thing must end. As with private individuals, so it is with the public; there is no stopping point when relying on a system of loans for supplying public wants. There is no end to it, but you are constantly sinking into debt deeper and deeper. I wish my honorable friend, or those who have the care of the finances of the government, would have imitated the example of the first Lord of the treasury in another country, and have come forward with some measure that would afford some sort of stability, relief, or hope for the future, that we might see some deliverance ahead, from this wretched system of dragging on with a deficient revenue, and helping it out by loans.—A revenue known to be deficient—admitted to be deficient—deficient in time of peace, but still more deficient in time of war. And yet, we go on depending on borrowing, and thus rapidly increasing the public debt, without any provision for its redemption, even on the return of peace. This is a state of things unprecedented in this country. It is plunging headlong, recklessly, unnecessarily, into a public debt. I cannot approve of any such policy as this. I protest against it in every view which can be taken of it. I hold that it is no more justifiable to run up a debt unnecessarily in time of war than it is to do so in time of peace. I protest still more against remaining with a deficient revenue whilst that debt is accumulating. My honorable friend did allude to one source of relief. I wish there was more substance in it. He says this debt is not enormous or alarming, because our population and consequently our resources are increasing, and that our wealth quadruples in twenty years. But will our revenue increase faster than our expenditures?—that is the question for us to consider. Whatever may be the increase of our population—whatever may be the augmentation of the trade of the country—whatever may be the increase of our revenue—if our expenses go on increasing in a corresponding ratio, we get no relief from that source. That this has been the case hitherto, every one, I believe, must be aware. The results of this war must necessarily add greatly to our expenses after its termination, and were it not for the increasing ability of the country, we should be entirely unable to sustain ourselves for a single year. The resource to which the Senator alludes affords no further encouragement than this, that as fast as our expenses increase our ability also increases. But it does not help us out of the existing difficulty.

I prefer taxation to debt. Taxes before debts, I think is a sound maxim. It is, I think, a democratic doctrine. But it does not seem to be the democratic policy of the present day. On the contrary, the maxim seems to be, debts and loans for the present; taxes for the future. This is the policy apparently; unless indeed the debt is to be paid off by repudiation, taxes must follow. Is it not the part of wisdom to provide promptly and in season for these difficulties which are not far distant, but already upon us? We have had, as I have said, a deficient revenue from customs for the last fifteen years. Although the opinion has been prevalent in the country that we could get along more satisfactorily and receive more revenue with a low rate of duty than with higher duties, yet this is a mistake; our experience does not support this doctrine. We have tried it. It is no new experiment. And I can say in regard to the act of 1846, that it is much less an act of low duties than it was represented to be when it was passed. I now think much better of it than I did then. We have tried extreme measures. We have tried fifteen and a half per cent. duties, but we did not find that they filled our treasury to overflowing. It is no new idea, it has been thoroughly tried. We cannot supply the wants of our treasury even in an ordinary state of demands upon it for a peace establishment, with anything short of about thirty per cent. of gross revenue, or twenty-five per cent. nett revenue. And yet we are going on, with this debt on our hands, and that debt accumulating, with a nett revenue system of only twenty-one per cent. We must have recourse to some other expedient than loans before a great while, and the sooner the better. It is our duty not to contribute to delude the public, for I believe a gross delusion has gone abroad that all is well, and that when this war is ended our finances will be in a sound state, while the fact is not so. They will be in a deficient, embarrassed condition, and we shall have a debt upon our hands without any means for its liquidation.

I say, give us something—some resource besides loans. Give us an income tax. A tax upon playing cards, and billiard tables, and fancy stocks. We have tried this method in Mexico, why not try it at home? A very considerable sum might be collected in that way. As it is now, we cannot get along. It is idle to deceive ourselves and the country, or silently acquiesce in a state of things which will tend to embarrassment, difficulty, and finally will result in establishing the most obnoxious high tariff measures that we have ever had in this country. That will be the result.—I wish this remark to be remembered. Our credit might probably fail in a year or two more, and especially if the war should continue, for we seem determined to destroy it, and if that be the policy perhaps the sooner it is destroyed the better. We know there are individuals in the world who cannot, so long as they have any credit, restrain from abusing it, and their only safety is in destroying it. It is so with all the governments of Europe; they have used their credit to the very verge of bankruptcy. England, the wealthiest nation in the world, has used up her credit so entirely that she is now paralyzed, when a great crisis is coming on in Europe. It may perhaps be fortunate for the cause of liberty and the rights of nations, but still it must be mortifying to her pride that she is paralyzed with a national debt. Sir, it was said by one of her most eminent men a few years ago, [Mr. Haskinson,] that the minister who would dare to involve the country in an unnecessary war, and to increase the burdens of the people by increasing the public debt, would deserve to answer for it with his head. What a spectacle is this great nation, now struggling under an immense debt, with no resource that an expert and able minister can devise, but to increase the most odious tax that can be laid on that or any other country; and to be levied after the people have been taxed in every possible way, for what they consume, and wear, and for the very light of heaven. Over and above all the rest, they are now to be called upon to pay fifty dollars out of every thousand of their private income. This is the consequence of a public debt, which we seem to regard as no great matter, and to suppose that it can be paid off very easily. But experience does not support this idea. We had a little, paltry debt, beginning in Mr. Van Buren's administration, and we have gone on adding to it during a time of peace, some ten or twelve millions, so that when this war commenced we had a debt of seventeen millions.

Sir, is the present a time when we should suffer our revenue to get into a low and prostrate condition? We have received intelligence across the Atlantic, that there has been an astounding explosion in the political state of one of the great countries in Europe, and all Europe will probably be drawn in to the great movement that is going on there. We have commercial and other relations with all those powers. Are we quite sure, that we shall not be involved in difficulty in regard to our commercial, or some other interests in consequence of this universal disturbance, in the countries of the old world? How was it in 1789? Were we not then involved in difficulty; and narrowly escaped being involved in war. The only advantage in our condition over the nations of Europe seems to be, that whilst they are thus weakened and paralyzed—whilst their taxation is as great as the people can bear—whilst they have exhausted their whole power of taxation, in every way that the ingenuity of man can devise, such is not our condition, as our resources are ample. There would be no difficulty in raising a revenue adapted to our condition and wants, if we were disposed to do it. But we have neglected to do it, and probably we shall go on in this same way until the burden of the public debt becomes so great that it can be borne no longer. Would it not be the part of wisdom then, to look the difficulty in the face, and provide some remedy, knowing as we do, that we may be called upon for new and extraordinary expenditures, at a time when we are wholly unable to provide for the ordinary wants of the treasury?

Mr. ATHERTON.—The Senator from Connecticut has intimated that I have been obliged to perform a very unpleasant duty. To be sure it is always somewhat unpleasant to me to be obliged to obtrude myself on the attention of the Senate. But I assure my honorable friend from Connecticut that there has been nothing more unpleasant to me in the discharge of the duties to find myself obliged, in many respects, to differ from one for whose opinions, in past times, I have been taught to cherish so much respect. The honorable Senator says that he believes that the people of this country are at present laboring under delusion with regard to their real condition—that they fancy themselves to be in a state of prosperity, when it is not so. This, sir, reminds me of an anecdote I once heard of two politicians in Glasgow who were engaged in conversation about the national affairs. One was endeavoring to show that every thing was going to ruin—that the public were in great distress, but the other merely replied that really he could not perceive it. To this the former very indignantly retorted that if "he would only read the Glasgow Chronicle he would soon find out how miserable he was!"

Mr. NILES.—I did not say that the people were deluded in supposing that they were in a prosperous condition, for there can be very little delusion on that subject. But I said that delusion prevailed with regard to the condition of the finances.

Mr. ATHERTON.—I certainly did not intend to misrepresent the honorable Senator; but certainly if any delusion prevails with regard to the dreadful condition of the finances, or the prosperity of the country, amongst the people at large, it is not from want of diligent efforts to enlighten them as to their distress. We have heard a great many lamentations on the ruin that was about to overtake the country in its business relations; although it has happened, somehow that from the time these notes were first raised here during this session, the business of the country has been gradually improving, so that we might almost say that "wisdom cries aloud in the streets, yet no man regards her!"

My honorable friend has alluded to what he regarded as some confusion in my statements, and he said that he would give a plain, intelligible view of the subject. I believe that the statement of the honorable Senator was based on the same principles as those on which one of the statement which I had the honor to submit to the Senate was founded. I stated that for the two years the whole expenditures were $117,589,165 72; that the means of the two years aside from Treasury notes and loans, were $70,373,229 45, making the deficiency to be supplied $47,215,936 27. The avails of treasury notes and loans $34,401,900 00, making the deficiency, according to the official reports of the Secretary of the Treasury, $12,814,036 27. But to this must be added $1,401,900 00 for the error which I endeavored to explain in the estimates contained in the treasury report, so that the whole deficiency is $14,215,936 27. Now, sir, the honorable Senator has alluded to the debt which will exist at the end of this fiscal year and he makes it $98,000,000. I cannot account for the manner in which he arrives at that conclusion. Some years ago, I recollect, an imputation was made against an administration of which that honorable gentleman formed a very distinguished part, that it had created a debt of forty millions. I do not suppose that the Senator was very well pleased with the manner in which it was attempted to arrive at that result. How can a debt of ninety-eight millions exist at the close of the present fiscal year? It was impossible to arrive at such a conclusion by any rules of arithmetic. The whole amount of debt created during the existence of the war is thirty-three millions—the amount to be raised by this bill is sixteen millions of dollars, to supply the deficiencies of the present fiscal year; add to this seventeen millions, the amount at commencement of the war, and the result is as clear as any result in mathematics can be, that the debt will be sixty-six millions of dollars. The Senator says that the disbursements of the year are different from the expenditures of the year; and he brings, it seems, within the latter, the expenses which may arise hereafter on account of the transactions of the present year. It is certainly a novel mode of settling the debt of the current year to crowd into it part of the expenditure of last year, and also anticipate future expenditures; and that is the only way in which the Senator can arrive at his conclusion. The Senator, in speaking of the receipts from customs, said that he saw no reason why the estimates of the Secretary should be sustained. So far as returns have been received, there is every prospect that the estimates of the Secretary will not only be fully realized, but be exceeded. The Senator, however, appears to think that the receipts of the custom house during the first year of the operation of the present tariff, afford no satisfactory basis for calculations with respect to the future. Quite as much so it would seem as to take the last fiscal year, five months of which were under the operation of the tariff of '42, and only seven months under that of the tariff of '46! The Senator says that there were two or three millions thrown over into the revenue of the first year of the present tariff, as goods were kept back in the store-house before the first of December, 1846, for the sake of having them returned afterwards when the revenue tariff should go into operation. Now, this tariff had a double effect. Some goods were crowded in, and others kept back. I know that if we can ascertain the amount in store on the first December, 1846; and the amount on the first of December, 1847, it seems to me that taking the difference, we shall arrive at the amount derivable from the considerations mentioned by the honorable Senator during the year. I believe it will be found that there were only about $111,000 worth of duty in the store on the 1st December, 1846, over the amount on the 1st December, 1847. So that, as it seems to me, it follows that the gain from the sources alluded to by the Senator, could have risen only to that trifling amount.

I trust that the Senator did not intend, as his words might seem to imply, to impute blame to me because some measure has not been brought forward in the shape of taxation. He did not vouchsafe his aid by extending any light with regard to his own views on the subject. He did not say whether there should be a tax on tea and coffee, as the Secretary of the Treasury has recommended; or whether he wished us to go back to his favorite system of high duties, in order to raise more revenue. I should have been very happy to have heard from the Senator on that subject. I believe the only articles on which the Senator recommended a tax were billiard-tables and playing cards. Now, I do not know how the Senator might have acted, had the duty of bringing forward this bill devolved upon him; but really, it does not occur to me that he could find any method by which to introduce into the Senate a bill for raising revenue and laying duties, for the sake of enabling us to pay the interest and principal of this loan. The constitution forbids it. Does he hold that it could be properly introduced as an amendment to this loan bill? It seems to me that that would come equally in conflict with the provisions of the constitution. Aside from the constitutional objection, what success could be anticipated for such an attempt when a proposition for a tax introduced as an amendment to this bill has been voted out of order in the other House as irrelevant. Therefore, I think that the Committee on Finance cannot be justly subjected to any blame on this subject.

Mr. NILES.—I spoke of the Senator as the representative of the Treasury Department. He says that he is at a loss to know how I made out the public debt to amount to ninety-eight millions of dollars. The regular debt, according to my calculation, amounts to sixty-eight millions, but to that I added other items; five millions for outstanding claims arising out of the war; one and a half millions for California claims; five millions which must be assumed as debt or be cut off the revenue, which is the same thing, on account of military land warrants; and twenty millions to be paid under the treaty. That is my calculation, and I have no doubt it is below instead of being over the mark.

The Senator asks why I do not propose some financial measure. Well, sir, I do not even suggest my opinion as to what ought to be done. I have only felt it to be my duty to call the attention of the Senate and the country—if anything that I say can reach the public mind—to the real state of our financial affairs. I look for remedies that are to come probably through public sentiment. I complain that when the Treasury takes it in hand, it does not propose something; nay farther, I complain that the Treasury Department now stands in the way of the country doing anything. The department has a system which it will not relinquish. I contend that that system is inadequate; and if the department does not propose another, and throws obstacles in the way of any other, it is not for me to introduce the question, except incidentally, whether a higher rate of duties would produce more revenue. That question, I believe, does not require discussion. It is a self-evident proposition, and whether it ought to be done or not, is, I think, equally self-evident. Certainly we cannot get along with the present system of finance. But I do not go into that question. I have merely endeavored to point out the state in which we now are, and the prospect which is ahead. From the present condition of things and its results I can see no deliverance whilst the present system is retained—a system of revenue inadequate for a time of peace yet adhered to in a time of war. I do not rise here to propose remedies. That would be idle. I do not complain of the honorable Senator. But I say that there are faults somewhere—a heavy responsibility to fall somewhere, for continuing this state of things. There was an error at the outset. What we ought to have done, is now known to every gentleman. When we incurred our expenditures, we ought to have provided, within the reasonable ability of the country, an additional revenue. I endeavored to call the attention of the Senate to this subject at the last session, but I hardly succeeded. I alluded to it incidentally on one or two occasions, but I met no response. Our honorable friends on the other side, do not, I suppose, sympathize greatly with us, when we get into difficulty—it does not trouble them much; and as to the friends on this side, they seem to be inspired with such confidence in the officer at the head of the finances, that without looking into his calculations very closely, as I apprehend, so long as he says "all is well—and will be better," they rest satisfied. Now I felt it to be my duty, to look into his calculations and his speculations, for such they are, and I have found them wholly unsustained by our experience or by the facts on which they affect to rest. They are, in my judgment, idle speculations.

Mr. ATHERTON.—The Senator has remarked that he did not know how I made out my estimate. I will tell him.

The expenditures for the year beginning July 1, 1846, were	$57,259,477 65
For the current fiscal year, they are	60,905,688 07
Whole expenditures of the two years of the war,	$117,589,165 72
The receipts of the 1st year including balance in Treasury,	$35,473,229 45
Estimated receipts of 2d year, i. e. current fiscal year,	34,900,000 00
Means of the two years aside from Treasury notes and loans,	$70,373,229 45
Deficiency of the two years supplied by Treasury notes and loans,	$47,215,936 27
Whole amount of Treasury notes and loans authorized in the two years,	33,000,000 00
Deficiency to be now provided for,	$14,215,936 27

I have examined the subject with care, and if the statements of my honorable friend from Connecticut differ from mine, I am confident his are incorrect.

Mr. DAVIS of Massachusetts.—I have a question to ask of the honorable Senator who is at the head of the Committee on Finance. Is it his opinion, if the financial affairs of the government were closed up, that the public debt would be less than one hundred millions?

Mr. ATHERTON.—That must of necessity be a matter of speculation.

Mr. DAVIS.—But you have the finances in charge, and if it be your pleasure to state it, I should like to hear your opinion.

Mr. ATHERTON.—The amount of the public liability depends on so many contingencies, that it is impossible to say what it may amount to prospectively. I cannot say how much may be required by a treaty to which the Senator from Connecticut alluded. But I can say that the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury have been sustained so far as the present year goes, notwithstanding the predictions of gentlemen who averred that we should have only twenty-four millions of revenue, and it seems to me that this should give us some confidence in the estimates for the next fiscal year. If the estimates of revenue for the next fiscal year be sustained, and the expenditures shall not exceed the estimates, (and there is no reason apparent why they should, to any great amount since they are placed at fifty-five millions of dollars,) and supposing the war to continue until a year from the first of July next, only twenty millions of dollars will be required to supply the deficiency of the next fiscal year. The debt authorized since the war began is thirty-three millions of dollars. This bill authorizes a loan of sixteen millions. The debt at the beginning of the war was less than seventeen millions, making at the close of this fiscal year sixty-six millions. The Senator can add for himself the amount of twenty millions for the next fiscal year, and he will arrive at the amount at the close of that year.

Mr. CLAYTON moved to amend the bill by adding at the end of the 4th section, the following words:

"And the principal sum borrowed under the provisions of this act shall be paid thereon as the same shall from time to time become due and payable, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

This amendment, the honorable Senator remarked, was necessary in order to remedy an important defect in the bill, which had, he presumed, originated in the process of amendment in the other House. As originally drafted the bill did contain a provision for the payment of principal and interest. As it now stood, however, the appropriation clause was wanting. His amendment was to supply the defect.

The amendment was agreed to.

The question being on ordering the bill to a third reading—

Mr. PHELPS remarked that he desired to address the Senate on the bill, but as the hour was late, he would defer his remarks till to-morrow, if it were agreable to the Senate.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion by Mr. HANNEGAN, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business, and after some time spent therein,

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, MARCH 28, 1848.

RESOLUTION OF THE LEGISLATURE OF MARYLAND.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, presented a resolution passed by the Legislature of the State of Maryland, requesting the Senators and Representatives of that State in Congress to urge an appropriation for the improvement of the harbor at Havre de Grace, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS.

Mr. BENTON presented the memorial of Henry H. Sibley and others, citizens of the United States, residing within the limits of the proposed Territory of Minnesota, remonstrating against a contemplated change in the northern boundary of Wisconsin, and praying the passage of a law for the organization of the Territory of Minnesota; which was referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CAMERON presented the petition of Elizabeth McDougall, heir of Samuel Canstin, deceased, an officer in the Revolutionary army, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DIX presented the petition of Mehitable Gibbs, widow of a deceased Revolutionary soldier, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, presented the memorial of Charles Lee Jones, praying an investigation by Congress of alleged causes of complaint in the military discipline of certain companies of volunteers, from the District of Columbia, now in the service of the United States in Mexico; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. DIX presented a petition of citizens of Livingston county, New York, praying an investigation of the conduct of the officer discharging the duties of military governor at Jalapa in Mexico, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WESTCOTT submitted documents relating to the claim of Gilbert Dudley; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PUBLICATION OF CONFIDENTIAL DOCUMENTS.

Mr. TURNEY submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the punishment of any person, as may improperly obtain and make public any of the confidential communications made by the President of the United States to the Senate, or such of the confidential communications as, in the opinion of

COLT'S FIRE ARMS.

Mr. RUSK submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to furnish the Senate with any information in his possession relative to the experiments now progressing for the purpose of ascertaining the practicability of discharging fire arms invented by Samuel Colt, and that he be requested to give his opinion as to the propriety of providing by law for the manufacture of the above named arms for the United States; together with such other information on the subject as may, in his opinion, be necessary to enable the Senate to form a correct judgment of the propriety of the right to allow the above named arms to be used in the public service.

RELATIONS WITH BRAZIL.

Mr. CAMERON submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate a copy or copies of the correspondence between the Minister of Foreign Relations of Brazil and Mr. Leal, the Brazilian charge d'affaires at Washington, under date of the 23d May last, and by him communicated to the Department of State; of the notes of Mr. Buchanan to Mr. Leal of the 3d August and the 15th November last; and of the diplomatic correspondence between the said parties, in relation to the claim of citizens of the United States against the Brazilian government, which may be necessary to enable the Senate to form an opinion as to the propriety of the ratification of the convention between the United States and Brazil, signed at Rio de Janeiro on the 27th January last, and which may be made compatible with the public interests.

GILBERT DUDLEY.

Mr. WESTCOTT submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the propriety and expediency of granting to Mr. Gilbert Dudley, late a soldier in the United States Army, and honorably discharged therefrom,

Mr. WESTCOTT observed that the case of Gilbert Dudley was one of peculiarly a meritorious character. While a mere boy he enlisted at Newark, New Jersey, as a musician, for five years. His term of service expired February 24, 1847, nine days before the bounty land law was passed. He served under Gen. Taylor on the Rio Grande, and was wounded at Palo Alto, and was promoted to a sergeantcy for his gallant conduct in capturing two armed musicians, and carrying them into camp. A lithograph of this feat is among the papers now presented with the resolution. He was unarmed, but discovered them at a little distance from their arms—seized their arms—levelled a gun at them and forced them to march before him as his prisoners. I learn that there are other cases of meritorious soldiers, who were in the battles prior to the passage of this law, but because of their discharge before the law was passed, they are denied bounty lands. I have had some conversation with two members of the Military Committee, the Senator from New York, (Mr. DIX) and the Senator from Mississippi, (Mr. DAVIS,) on the propriety of a general remedial law to meet those cases, and I trust the attention of the Military Committee will be directed to the subject.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

MILITARY ASYLUM.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill to provide for a Military Asylum for the relief and support of invalid soldiers of the army of the United States; which was read and passed to the second reading.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. RUSK, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of David Wilkinson, submitted a report accompanied by a bill for his relief.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

Mr. WESTCOTT, from the Committee of Claims, to whom were referred the bills from the House of Representatives for the relief of Bennett M. Dell; for the relief of Stalker and Hill; and for the relief of Reuben Perry and Thomas P. Ligon, reported them without amendment.

REPORT FROM THE COMMITTEE ON PRINTING.

Mr. CAMERON, from the Committee on Printing, to whom were referred the motions to print the memorial of Samuel C. Reid, and the memorial of Robert C. Rogers, reported against printing the same.

RECONSIDERATION.

Mr. BENTON moved to reconsider the vote of yesterday agreeing to the resolution authorizing Mr. Palmer to make certain alterations and additions in his memoir, ordered to be printed; which was agreed to.

On motion by Mr. BENTON, it was Ordered, That the resolution be referred to the Committee on the Library.

RECOMMITTAL.

On motion by Mr. DIX, it was Ordered, That the report of the Committee on Pensions on the memorial of Francis O. Dorr and Andrew C. Dorr, be recommitted to said Committee.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their clerk:

Mr. President: The President of the United States has officially notified the House of Representatives that he has approved and signed the joint resolution relative to the evidence which shall be satisfactory on application for bounty land.

The Speaker of the House of Representatives having signed two enrolled bills, I am directed to bring them to the Senate for the signature of their President.

SIGNING OF BILLS.

The VICE PRESIDENT signed the enrolled bill entitled "An act to remit the duties on books, maps, and charts imported for the use of the Library of Congress," and "An act in addition to an act for the relief of Walter Loomis and Abel Gay, approved July 2d, 1836."

CALIFORNIA CLAIMS.

On motion by Mr. CASS, the prior orders were postponed, and the bill for ascertaining and paying the California claims, was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CASS.—The facts connected with this subject have long been before the Senate. A detailed report containing them has been laid before us, consisting of evidence collected from persons now here, who resided in California at the time when the transactions out of which these claims grew were taking place, and some of them performing important parts in those transactions. You will recollect that a very small military and naval force at the commencement of the war took possession of and overran the country;

Commodore Stockton having the command of the naval forces, and Lieutenant Colonel Fremont of the military. By the most prompt, patriotic and brave acts the whole country was taken possession of, acts highly creditable to the American name. The forces employed were small but they received efficient aid from the American citizens who resided there. It was all done without authority from the government by our forces, with the conscientious co-operation of the Americans residing there. These claims embrace several very distinct heads and the payment of some of them has been guaranteed by Col. Fremont. Only twenty-two thousand dollars of the funds of the government were disbursed during the period of all these transactions, for all the rest the government is personally responsible. The whole amount payable to these patriotic Americas who enrolled themselves under our banners and took part in the proceedings remains due. Besides this, for the monies due for supplies furnished, for horses and for ammunition, the United States still remain indebted. That country is distant and the people who hold these claims have acted in the most patriotic manner Such claims should not be allowed to remain unsatisfied. But there is at present no law upon the subject, and the only way in which the case can be provided for is to send a commission to ascertain the amount of the claims, and in the next place to make compensation. Independently of the circumstances which led to the conquest and possession of the country, facts have been developed relating to land grants—those which are vastly important. It will be seen by looking over the documents that they were about to grant away their whole country to keep it, as they said, from the Methodist wolves. I do not know that it is necessary for me to detain the Senate by entering into particulars. There has been a very minute investigation by the committee, and as many as twenty witnesses have been examined, all of whom were conversant with the transactions and who have revealed every fact connected with them. And really it will be found that some of the bravest exploits that have ever been performed, have been achieved there. As to Colonel Fremont, some of his achievements have been of the most romantic character, and characterized by the utmost promptitude and bravery.

On motion by Mr. DIX, it was Ordered, That the further consideration of the bill be postponed until to-morrow.

THE LOAN BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to authorize a loan not to exceed the sum of sixteen millions of dollars.

Mr. PHELPS.—There are three aspects in which this subject of the finances may be regarded, three propositions to be answered, three different results to be ascertained. One inquiry is, how do our expenditures compare with our income? Secondly, what is the condition of the treasury with reference to all its obligations and all its resources? And thirdly, what are the available means of the treasury to meet the current expenditures?

In endeavoring to answer these various questions, calculations are made which are apparently inconsistent with each other, and hence frequently, difficulty and embarrassment arise in the investigation of the subject. I shall not enter into a general examination of the subject, but shall confine myself to the points which have been presented by my honorable friend, the chairman of the Committee on Finance.

Amongst the suggestions presented is this: what now is the amount of the national debt? The subject was discussed to some extent yesterday by my honorable friend from Connecticut, and the honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance. I beg leave to remark in the outset, that this is a point not susceptible of being precisely ascertained. The amount of our public debt is uncertain. We can only approximate to the amount. We may, indeed, ascertain its minimum, but its maximum must be determined hereafter. I have made some calculations on this subject, and I ask the attention of the Senate whilst I present them as briefly and clearly as may be in my power. I have made two calculations, very simple, and easily comprehended. In the first place I set down the balance in the treasury on the 1st of July, 1846, regarding that period as the commencement of the war, and taking no notice of any war expenses anterior to that date. The balance amounted to $9,126,239 08. I find that in the fiscal year, 1846 and 1847, the secretary reports that he derived from loans $25,679,199 45. In the year 1847 and 1848, he derives from the same source $13,200,372 55. Thus, then, we have the balance in the treasury at the commencement of the war, and the loan for the two years between June 1846, and June 1848, to which I add the amount to be raised by the present bill of sixteen millions, and also the million and a half which was explained to the Senate as a deficiency originating in consequence of an error in the estimate of the department. The public debt existing previous to the commencement of the Mexican war, amounted to sixteen and a half millions. We have thus run behind hand, to use a homely phrase, to the amount of $32,000,000 To this I add the sum of twenty millions on the supposition that the prosecution of our claims for indemnity against Mexico may result in an expenditure to that amount. That sum amounts in the aggregate to one hundred and two millions in round numbers. Deducting, however, the balance in the treasury on the 1st July, 1846, we have $92,855,000 81 of unliquidated debt in the form of loans in stocks, and loans indirectly by the use of treasury notes. That the debt is as much, cannot, I think, be questioned. How much more it is likely to be, is another question. The honorable Senator from Connecticut added five millions for the great variety of expenditure in connexion with our military operations, not included in the estimated expenditures, and which cannot be estimated beforehand with any sort of precision. I think that he estimates these expenses too low, that he is on the safe side. Adding the five millions, however they will swell the amount to ninety eight or nearly ninety nine millions as estimated by the honorable Senator from Connecticut, though his estimate was made upon a different basis altogether. He took the expenditure and compared it with the revenue assuming the excess of the former as the basis of his calculations. I have taken a different course. I have taken the formal debt and arrived at the same conclusion almost as that reached by the Senator from Connecticut. I have taken the liberty to add—looking forward to the termination of this war at some period or another—the estimated deficiency for the coming year, which the Secretary of the Treasury reports at twenty millions, giving us a debt of at least one hundred and thirteen millions. Thus, I repeat, is the minimum of the debt, what is its maximum will be no one can tell.

I now take another mode of calculation. The Secretary of the Treasury reports the public debt on the first of December last, at forty five millions six hundred and fifty nine thousand dollars. In this amount he does not include the authority to borrow money which he already possessed, and which he reports to us under the head of loans available, at forty two millions. Then there is the loan authorized by this bill and other difference of one and a half millions to which I have already alluded. To that add the twenty millions to be raised for getting out of this Mexican war, and it gives us an amount of one hundred and seven millions. Now if there is any item in these calculations that is subject to cavil, it is that of the twenty millions of estimated deficiency for the coming year. It may be more, but certainly it will not be presumed that it will be less. Let me here advert to a consideration all important in connexion with this subject, that this estimate does not embrace the original debt which has been liquidated. It embraces only the amount of debt which we have put in the shape of permanent debts. Whether we have provided for all is another and very serious question Who can tell the amount of floating unliquidated debt? Who can tell the amount of debt to be added to this sum when we come to close up our accounts and allow all the various indescribable claims—superinduced by this war—that must finally be presented? We have no assurance that with respect to the amounts which I have mentioned of one hundred and seven millions—or one hundred and thirteen millions if you please—that the means thus raised on the credit of the government will be sufficient. We have passed a bill for raising ten regiments of regulars but not a cent of the expense has been embraced in the estimates. All these calculations are made on the expenditures estimated. And yet we have passed a bill for raising ten thousand men, the expense of which is to be added to these calculations. Are these troops to be authorized now with a view of being disbanded during the current fiscal year? Do we want five thousand men to be raised between this time and the 30th July next? If these troops are raised there is not only the expenditure of the current fiscal year, but other expenditures of the coming year to be added. Then we have following upon the heel of the ten regiment bill another bill authorizing the raising of twenty thousand volunteers.—Here, then, are thirty thousand men to be raised in addition to our present military force, and not one cent of this contemplated expenditure has entered into the calculations of the Treasury Department. That is not all: a great variety of expenses are not included. These land bounties that we have in our generosity provided must be included. Then we have the pensions to grow out of this Mexican war, and the miscellaneous claims growing out of other operations, quarter-master and subsistence departments.—Losses also of public property, claims for private property lost; and who can estimate the amount of these expenditures? I found upon my desk the other morning a report upon a claim of an individual, who had served in this Mexican war, giving him indemnity for goods and chattels lost; and I found in the inventory of his property which had thus been lost; I suppose winter clothing, cotton shirts, and boots and shoes which he had carried with him to the field, which had been lost, and for which he desired compensation. If, then, we are going to the extent of paying for all the old boots and shoes and cotton shirts that may be lost in this Mexican campaign, I think that we shall add very largely to the amount of my statement of these miscellaneous claims. A great many horses have been lost, and as I have had to deal with the claims for horses lost in our Indian wars from the time I first had the honor of taking a seat in this Senate to the present day, I can safely say that these campaigns are the best markets for horses in the world. Would to heaven my constituents could find half as good a market for their horses and mules! When we come to estimate all these claims with that degree of liberality which seems to be now in contemplation, I think that it will be found no small addition will be made to the amount of the public debt growing out of this Mexican war. If the government can find any capitalist ready to assume the obligation of the public debt, estimating it at one hundred millions of dollars at this moment, I think they should compromise with him immediately and accept his offer. In my judgment the public debt at this time is nearer one hundred and fifty millions than one hundred millions. Thus, I can give you no details, only that there lies beyond a flood of claims, that probably never will be really ascertained until our places be taken by other men. I leave that subject.

My object now is to approach an important question referred to by the Senator from Connecticut—how is this debt to be met? This is now the great inquiry. Before proceeding to the discussion of that point, however, let me allude for a moment, to the accusation made by the honorable Senator from New Hampshire, in relation to some mistakes which he alleged the Senator from Vermont had made, in the estimates which he submitted some weeks since. The first of these mistakes is said to consist in this: The honorable Secretary of the Treasury, furnishes an estimate at the commencement of the session, of ten millions in the deficiency of the appropriations for the current year. I became satisfied, after some investigation, that by an oversight this difference of ten millions, had not been included in the general estimate of our expenditures. It is now said, I was in error in that statement. Be it so, I am not disposed to go into any calculations to settle the question, but I am rather disposed to go into an adjustment of the error—a correction of the mistake—now. After having sailed amidst the mists and fogs of Newfoundland upon this subject for some time past, if the moment has arrived when new observations can be taken, and our latitude and longitude ascertained, I am very ready to correct our reckoning. How then does this matter stand? In the first statement which I presented to the Senate on a former occasion, I included the addition to the estimated expenditures, but in correcting the error, it became proper to correct errors on the other side, and thus endeavor, if possible, to obtain an accurate result. If I have been in error, I have erred in very respectable company. Immediately after the annual report was communicated to us, we were advised by the honorable Secretary, that a mistake of about seven millions had occurred in his general estimate of receipts and expenditures. How? It seems that by the authority to issue treasury notes, this sum of nearly seven millions, had been realized by the emission of treasury notes. It was not entered on the side of receipts; it was omitted, but the Secretary did enter the balance, $6,285,000 as an available emission of this loan. In my first statement, I charged the Secretary with the actual loan for the year 1846—'47, and with $6,285,000 as the available portion of the loan for the year '47—'48, omitting the actual receipts from this source of nearly seven millions, because it was omitted in the statement from which I took my data. I also charged the Secretary of the Treasury, with his own estimate of deficiency, amounting to fifteen millions and a fraction, as the difference in June, 1848. How then did we stand? When he comes to correct the errors he had received more money, but his deficiency was less. What then was the proper mode of correction? He should have deducted from the fifteen millions deficiency, but added the seven millions to his receipts. The result was, that as the cash received, and the deficiency went to the same column, and was the subject of addition, by subtracting the seven millions from the fifteen, and adding it to the same column as a separate item, it would have made the same result precisely. The result which I brought out at that time, as the excess of expenditures over the income, was $56,820,000. These calculations were made before the error was discovered by the Secretary, and when advised of the error, I deducted seven millions, and thus the result was $49,820,000.

What next? We are told that the deficiency in the appropriations, instead of being ten millions, was fourteen millions. Another mistake! The Secretary wanted four millions more. I charged him with that amount and thus the balance was turned the other way. His mistake of seven millions, in giving the amount of cash received and expended, and the additional excess of four millions in under estimating the expenditures of the current year, gives us seven millions as an offset against the calculations of my friend, and thus it turns out by this correction that the estimate I then made should be increased one million, notwithstanding this supposed error on my part. I have no objection to correct errors—certainly none relating to the department—and I can have no sensibility about the commission of errors growing out of the inaccuracy of the data with which I am furnished. It is apparent, sir, from all the examination which I have been able to give this subject, that the Committee on Finance is groping in the dark, and what is infinitely worse, that the treasury department itself is at fault. Correction after correction is made in the annual reports upon which we usually rely. Nevertheless I do hope, sir, that the department will continue to correct its errors as readily as I myself correct any into which I am betrayed by their inaccuracies.

There is another point upon which I have a few words to say, and that is in reference to the revenue of the year ending June, 1847. I was aware that five months of the year were under the tariff of 1842, and that seven months were under the tariff of 1846; but I remember that the continued operation of the new tariff, which was passed in July, and the warehousing system, passed at the same time, threw back the income of the residue of the year beyond the last of December. In point of fact, I have adverted to the extraordinary fall of the revenue from the passage of that law. The decrease was at the rate of one million, two hundred thousand dollars per month. I am told that I attributed that to the operation of the warehousing system, and it turns out by an examination of the warehouse that goods did not accumulate therein. Well, now, what is the result? They were not imported, and it is unimportant to my purpose whether imported or not. The fact stated by the chairman is entirely unimportant.

But the third error is in relation to the estimates of the receipts from customs. This is an important consideration for us all. It is all important that we should know upon what estimates we can rely in relation to the income from this source and whether these estimates have been correct or not. Certainly it is highly important to us to know in what position we stand, and upon what basis we proceed. In my estimate I put down the revenue for the current year from this source at twenty-four millions. I arrogate to myself no gift of prophecy. I made the estimates upon conditions which were satisfactory to myself, and, I hoped, such as would be satisfactory to others. But I am told that the probability is that the result at the close of the year will falsify my predictions. Sir, I deny the possibility of such a result. My statement was founded upon the assumption that this war was to continue. I reduced the estimate upon the ground that the effect of this war would be to embarrass the country and repress the activity of business operations. I declared at the time that if this war could be closed the commercial business and finances of the country must revive. Now the country is already satisfied that the war is closed. Nothing in my judgment would more truly astound the country than to learn that this war was to be renewed. The apprehension growing out of a state of war have been removed. The pressure is removed, the prospects of the money market are improving. Thus the very state of things is presented for which I made provision in my calculations with respect to the future condition of the finances. There cannot, then, be any falsification of my prediction, if the finances of the country should improve.

But there is another consideration worthy of attention. It is said by the chairman of the committee that we have already received the amount which was estimated as the receipts of the whole year. I admit very frankly that I did not take that into consideration in my calculations. I relied upon the usual course of trade, the wants of the country, the demand for foreign goods, and the ability of the country to pay for them. But the extreme destitution in Europe has interfered with the usual operation of those laws of trade. The commercial distress in England, the individual embarrassments, the bankruptcies that have taken place in that country, have flooded us with their manufactured articles which are poured into this market to be sold at any sacrifice; whilst at the same time we have been enabled to obtain an unusually extended market for our agricultural productions. But it is quite certain that although a temporary stimulus to importations has been given, there must of necessity be a corresponding declination and falling off in the importations, and of course the receipts from customs must be diminished in the same proportion. Whilst thinking upon this subject, having imposed upon myself the duty of addressing the Senate, a New York paper came to hand, containing an article from which I beg leave to read a few extracts. Speaking of the foreign dry goods market, and of the effect of recent information from Europe, the writer proceeds:

"We do not look for any decided improvement in the demand or other foreign or domestic goods, until next spring. The people are now living on their stocks on hand, and once empties the country merchant in his spring purchases, but are mostly near goods, and of course will go very sar to lessen his wants next fall. Under the existing rate of our manufactured duties, it would be a most unnatural course to attempt to import or send any goods to our market except such as are selected at all times—and shipment even of these should be delayed until the present excessive low found rate. As every description of goods in the last price current from Manchester would not it low at the end of June in our market.

"On Thursday auction sales of cloths were made at ruinous low prices, in fact we never knew such immense low, but as low as it was we do not think that purchasers could be found for duplicates at the same price. Fewer of our jobbers will give orders we think for the coming season, preferring to wait and watch the course of events. Some have been a little scorched last season, and have come to the conclusion that it is best to purchase their goods when they want them, than to anticipate the demand."

If the market has been thus glutted, how can we anticipate fresh importations from which the revenue of the last quarter has to be swollen to the amount received in the former part of the year. If the slightest reliance is to be placed upon this article, which comes from a respectable source, it admonishes us not to place reliance upon a continuance of importations; and there is another consideration which I do not wish to discuss at length, but to which I may be permitted to allude. It was presented by the Senator from Connecticut, and it is that our exports have wonderfully fallen off. The exportations of breadstuffs have been reduced almost to nothing; and the price of cotton also has greatly declined. With this declination of exports, how are we to continue those enormous importations? I do not wish to dwell upon this topic; it requires no elucidation, unless indeed it is necessary to combat the absurdity that national economy consists in increasing its old debts. Our exportations must regulate our means; our means should regulate our importations. In my judgment, the honorable Secretary has no reason to congratulate himself, nor the country to congratulate itself, in the present state of things. No state of affairs could be worse, no possible condition of our commerce could be worse than that created by an excessive importation of foreign goods. If there is anything that carries in its train disarrangement in the business of the country—prostration of its commerce, and depreciation of its property, private bankruptcies and public embarrassment—it is precisely the present condition of things.—The revulsion of '36 was the result of similar causes. A revenue derived from such a state of our commerce, is not reliable.

The present state of public affairs on the continent is also eminently worthy of consideration in its bearings upon our financial and commercial prosperity. Events may suddenly arise changing the whole aspect of our commercial affairs. My estimates were formed upon the supposition that the war with Mexico was to continue. If my anticipations be disappointed of course different results may be expected. We are now, as the country hope, at peace or soon shall be. This will have its effect upon the business of the country. There are some other topics connected with this subject to which I cannot here more than allude. The report of the Secretary is replete, not only with financial information, but a mighty mass of theory upon the general subject of political economy. Of course, I shall not pretend to follow himinto that field.

But there is one topic to which I must allude. It seems to be a matter of surprise that a revolution should take place in Europe without affecting this country. But do we not know that heretofore we have been in debt, and that pressure there, of necessity, produced pressure here, we standing in the relation of debtors. But the pressure created in Europe by a famine produced an enormous demand for our breadstuffs, and money of course went into our pockets. It is, then, not at all wonderful that embarrassment in Europe, instead of affecting us injuriously as heretofore, has operated to our advantage. The circumstance explains itself. But I shall proceed no further. I have thus glanced in a cursory manner at various points presented in the remarks of the honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance, and I can only say, by way of apologizing for the time which I have consumed, that the examination of our own finances and the investigation of our own national economy is worth infinitely more than all the paltry party questions upon which two-thirds of our time is wasted.

Ordered, That the amendments be engrossed and the bill read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time.

On the question "Shall this bill pass?" Mr. HALE demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered and taken with the following result:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Ashley, Atchison, Atherton, Bagby, Bell, Benton, Bierce, Butler, Cameron, Dix, of Massachusetts, Dodge, of Wisconsin, Dodge, Dodge, of Iowa, Douglas, Downs, Foote, Hannegan, Houston, Hunter, Jameson, of Maryland, Johnson, of Georgia, Lewis, Mangum, Miller, Moor, Niles, Phelps, Sevier, Tappan, Turney, Underwood, Westcott, and Yulee—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Babcock, and Hale—2.

So it was

Resolved, That the bill pass with amendments.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives in the amendments.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion by Mr. CAMERON, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business, and after some time spent therein,

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 29, 1848.

RESOLUTION OF THE LEGISLATURE OF NEW JERSEY.

Mr. MILLER presented a resolution passed by the Legislature of the State of New Jersey, in favor of the enactment of a law to provide for the reimbursement of the expenses incurred by William Napton and Alexander F. Arnold in raising a company of volunteers to serve in the Mexican war; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS.

Mr. HALE presented a petition of citizens of New Hampshire, praying a reduction of the rates of postage on letters and newspapers; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, a petition of inhabitants of Pennsylvania, praying such amendment of the Constitution of the United States as will abolish slavery throughout the Union; the motion to receive which was laid upon the table.

Mr. DIX presented the memorial of the Society for the reformation of juvenile delinquents in the city of New York, praying to be released from a judgment obtained against them by the United States, for the purchase money stipulated to be paid for the property now occupied by them as a House of Refuge; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BELL presented two memorials of citizens of Tennessee, and a memorial of citizens of Kentucky, praying that an appropriation may be made for repairing the dam at the head of Cumberland Island in the Ohio river.

Mr. BELL having stated the nature of the memorials said: I beg leave to add a few remarks in explanation of the importance of immediate consideration being given to this memorial. The dam to which the memorial alludes was constructed at the expense of the general government about fifteen years ago, and for some time it answered the purpose for which it was designed. About three years ago, however, a breach was made in the dam near the head of Cumberland Island, which occasioned much inconvenience and caused very great losses of property, perhaps more than it would have cost to repair the dam. But the late freshet in the Ohio river has enlarged the breach to such a degree as to threaten to put a stop to navigation altogether during a portion of the year, and to render the navigation exceedingly dangerous during the remaining portion. By the employment of light draught steamers, of late, the river has been considered navigable throughout the whole year, although, since this breach occurred, it has never been entirely safe; and now, unless it be repaired, it is expected that a total stop will be put to the navigation except at the cost of reshipment. Now, the interest that I represent is only a small part of the interests which are involved in this matter. It extends only to the navigation of the Cumberland, or at least, to the valley drained by the Cumberland river, and although that is great of itself—amounting to many millions of dollars in the course of the year—yet that interest is small in comparison with that which exists in all that country which is drained by the Ohio river—which sustains great injury on account of this impediment of the navigation in certain stages of the water. And I beg leave to call the attention of the Senators who represent Illinois, Indiana and Ohio to this subject. A dam was constructed, as I have said, at the head of Cumberland Island extending across to the Illinois shore, intending to throw the channel to the left of the island on the Kentucky side. In consequence of the breakage, however, the whole object is entirely lost; but there is a narrow strait through which every boat has to run the gauntlet. I am told that a single boat during the last season was damaged to the amount of two thousand dollars, having to tranship her cargo. Many boats have been wholly lost. I can speak with some feeling in regard to this matter, having been, on one occasion, on board a boat which, in making that passage, struck, but for several hours we were suspended as it were between life and death, it being a doubtful matter whether the boat would hold together. It was cold and stormy weather at the time, and if the steamer had gone to pieces the probability is that no person who was on board would have reached the land alive.

I am aware of the difficulty which surrounds the subject, but I think that when it is examined it will be found that this does not come within the principle to which objection is attached. The great objection which I deprecate is, that other works of a similar nature will be thought to possess claims equally pressing; but this objection will be removed when Senators consider that this is a work which cannot wait; that the obstruction is considered insuperable, and that every other improvement relating to these rivers can better afford to wait. I beg, also, to call the attention of the members who compose the Committee on Roads and Canals to the subject, and ask them to give it immediate consideration. I ask the attention of the Senate to it at an early day. Sir, the memorialists whose memorials I have presented are but a small portion of those whose interests are involved; there will be many more memorials presented on the same subject, coming from the whole extent of the Ohio river, from Pittsburg to its mouth. I believe the honorable Senator from Kentucky has already in his possession a memorial on the same subject. I trust that the Senate, in view of the circumstances, will indulge me by giving this subject their earliest attention. I now send the memorials to the Chair and ask that one of them, without the signatures, be printed for the use of the Senate, and that they be referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—Some petitions have been placed in my hands relating to the same subject with those which have just been presented by the honorable Senator from Tennessee. I will not occupy the time of the Senate, after what has been said, with any remarks as to the character of the obstruction which these memorialists seek to have removed. The effect of the breakage in the dam is, at times, to obstruct the navigation entirely, and at others, in the ordinary stage of the water, to render it exceedingly perilous. The dam was intended to improve the navigation by freeing the water on the Kentucky side. This dam has given way to the force of the water and the huge stones of which it was composed cast into the channel, rendering the navigation dangerous in the extreme. The effect of this breakage in the dam is to bar up almost entirely all ingress and egress to and from the Kentucky side of the river. There are attached to these petitions the names of some thousands of persons who are interested in this matter, and I beg to present their petitions and ask that they be referred to the same committee to which the memorials presented by the honorable Senator from Tennessee were referred.

I can hardly suppose that any remarks of mine are necessary to show the great importance of the navigation of this river. I almost fear to speak of its importance lest I might be thought to be influenced by local considerations. But the amount of property that passes through that channel is scarcely to be calculated, and it is increasing every year. The number of lives that are thus hazarded are immense. The whole of this property is put at hazard, to some extent, by this obstruction, and, I think, as the honorable Senator from Tennessee has said, that this application stands upon a ground peculiar to itself. The obstruction is one which the government, in a laudable effort to improve the navigation, has itself placed there. Whether it is to be removed or repaired is a question to be determined by Congress. The petitioners say it will cost less to repair it than to remove it, and when it is made firm and stable it will be of the utmost advantage to the navigation of the river. The government having placed the obstruction there is under an obligation, independently of the question of the power of Congress to improve the navigation of those rivers, to remove it.

The petitions were referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. BENTON presented the petition of Rebecca Heald, praying compensation for property destroyed by the enemy during the last war with Great Britain; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a petition of citizens of the State of Missouri, praying the right of pre-emption to certain lands settled and cultivated by them; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. YULEE presented the petition of George E. McClellan, in behalf of himself and a company of mounted volunteers, raised by him during the Seminole war, praying compensation for their services; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

FLORIDA MOUNTED VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. YULEE submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to the Senate, if not incompatible with the public interest, all documents relative to the services of Captain M. Cohen's company of Florida volunteers, in the year 1840.

LIGHT HOUSES AND BUOYS.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives to change the location of certain light houses and buoys, reported it without amendment.

Mr. DAVIS asked for the immediate consideration of the bill, and in order that Senators might judge of the propriety of giving it immediate consideration, he stated that the object of the bill was merely to carry into effect an act which had been passed at the last session of Congress, providing for the erection of certain light-houses and buoys. That act provided for the erection of a light-house on the Hudson river, another on the Savannah, a buoy and light-house on the Santee river, and another near Galveston. The Secretary merely asks from Congress, power and authority to change the location of these light-houses, to the erection of which, as at first contemplated, insuperable objections exist. In regard to the one on the Hudson river, it was proposed to be located on certain land for which the owner now demands a very extravagant price, and it is found that another spot can be procured for a very moderate sum. This case is an illustration of the whole, and I ask that it may be acted on now by the Senate, for the reason that the time of year has arrived, when the works ought to be proceeded with.

Mr. BAGBY.—I hope that the ordinary course of business will not be interrupted. I understood, too, that there are appropriations in this bill, of rather questionable propriety.

Mr. DAVIS re-stated the object of the bill.

Mr. BAGBY.—I would inquire whether it involves any additional expenditure of money.

Mr. DAVIS.—Not a dollar, except what was provided for last year. The word money is not used in the bill.

Mr. BENTON.—It is simply to change the site of these light-houses, is it not?

Mr. DAVIS.—That is all.

Mr. BAGBY.—Then I have no objection.

The Senate proceeded to consider said bill, as in Committee of the Whole; and no amendment being made it was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it pass to a third reading.

The said bill was read a third time.

Resolved, That this bill pass.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives accordingly.

COLONEL ROBERT WALLACE.

Mr. CASS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill for the relief of Colonel Robert Wallace, aid-de-camp to General William Hull, reported it without amendment.

CONGRATULATIONS TO THE FRENCH.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. ALLEN asked and obtained leave to bring in a joint resolution tendering the congratulations of the American to the French people; which was read and passed to the second reading.

Mr. ALLEN asked that the resolution be now read a second time.

Mr. MILLER thought it would be proper to refer the resolution to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and had no objection to the second reading with a view to the reference; but if it was intended to ask for the consideration of the resolution to-day, he must object to the second reading.

Mr. ALLEN thought there was no necessity for a reference, and preferred that the resolution should be acted upon at once.

Mr. MILLER objected to the second reading, as against the rule.

BOUNTY LANDS.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. ASHLEY asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill explanatory of the act entitled "An act to raise, for a limited time, an additional military force, and for other purposes," approved 11th February, 1847; which was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their Clerk:

Mr. President: The President of the United States has notified the House of Representatives that he approved and signed the 27th instant, the bill further to amend deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th June, 1848.

The House of Representatives have passed a bill making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with the various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1849, and for other purposes; in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The above named bill from the House of Representatives, was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

THE SENECA INDIANS.

On motion by Mr. ATCHISON, it was Ordered, That the report of the Secretary of War, presented the 19th of January, 1848, in relation to losses sustained by the Seneca Indians, through a late sub-agent of the United States, be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and printed.

PUBLIC LANDS AT FORT SNELLING.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted by Mr. BREESE, on the 23d instant, and it was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to inform the Senate what quantity of land has been reserved from the public lands at Fort Snelling, on the Upper Mississippi, under the treaty or treaties with the Sioux, and what portion of the reserved land is now claimed by the United States as necessary for military purposes.

THE SUPREME COURT.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill from the House of Representatives supplemental to the act entitled "An act concerning the Supreme Court of the United States," and

On motion by Mr. CRITTENDEN, it was Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed to, and made the special order of the day for, Friday next.

SAMUEL LEECH.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill of the Senate to provide for the compensation of Samuel Leech, for services in the investigation of suspended sales in the Mineral Point District; and it was Resolved, That they concur therein.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives accordingly.

CALIFORNIA CLAIMS.

On motion by Mr. CASS, the prior orders were suspended, and the Senate resumed the consideration, as in Committee of the Whole, of the bill for ascertaining and paying the California claims.

Mr. DIX.—Mr. President: The transactions out of which the claims provided for by the bill under consideration arose, were explained yesterday in the brief but very pertinent and lucid remarks of the honorable Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CASS,] as chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, before which the testimony substantiating the claims was taken. I hold in my hand the printed document containing this testimony, and before I sit down I will read some portions of it to the Senate, though I may perhaps but present what is familiar to all.

I do not know that any explanation further than that which has already been given by the honorable Senator from Michigan is necessary to vindicate the propriety of passing the bill. The pecuniary obligations for the discharge of which it provides, were contracted in good faith, for the purpose of subduing the country and of expelling from it the military forces of Mexico. In the execution of these objects, the young and accomplished officer at the head of our troops, Colonel Fremont, exhibited a combination of energy, promptitude, sagacity, and prudence, which indicates the highest capacity for civil and military command; and in connexion with what he has done for the cause of science, it has given him a reputation at home and abroad of which men much older and more experienced than himself might well be proud. That the country will do justice to his valuable and distinguished services I entertain not the slightest doubt.

The objects accomplished by Colonel Fremont, as subsequent developments have shown, were far more important than those I have referred to. There is no doubt that his rapid and decisive movements kept California out of the hands of British subjects, and perhaps out of the hands of the British government; and it is in this point of view that I desire to present the subject to the Senate. If these transactions stood alone—if they constituted an isolated case—I might not deem it necessary to call attention to them. But, as a part of a system to all appearances deliberately entered upon and steadily pursued, it seems to me that they may justly claim a more extended consideration than would be otherwise due to them.

While discussing the bill to raise an additional military force in January last, I stated some facts in illustration of the encroachments of Great Britain on the southern portion of the North American continent. I alluded particularly to the movements on the Mosquito coast, where she is establishing herself under the pretence of giving protection to an insignificant tribe of Indians, but in reality to gain possession of a territory not only intrinsically valuable on account of its natural products, but doubly so to her on account of its advantages of position. This occupation does not rest upon the ground of an original establishment on territory unreclaimed from its primeval solitude, or even on territory not reduced to actual possession by its first discoverer. It is a portion of the old Spanish dominion in North America, constituting, after the dissolution of the empire of Spain in the western hemisphere, a part of the confederation of Central America, and now an integral part of the States of Honduras and Nicaragua: and if the power of Spain had continued unbroken, this unjustifiable encroachment would not have been heard of. I stated on a former occasion that the territory occupied in the name of the Musquito nation by Great Britain, contains about 40,000 square miles, nearly as large a surface as that of the State of New York, and that she had recently sought to extend her possession by forcible means to the river San Juan de Nicaragua, near the eleventh parallel of latitude, one degree further south than the territory actually claimed as belonging to the Mosquitos according to her own geographical delineations.

Nearly a century ago some connexion existed between Great Britain and the Mosquito Indians; but the territory was abandoned by her under treaty stipulations with Spain. When the connexion was renewed I am unable to say. But I believe the first open and avowed attempt to exercise rights of sovereignty over the territory, through consular agents, was in 1843, when Patrick Walker was appointed consul at Bluefields; and this appointment was immediately the subject of a protest by at least one of the South American States.

Before I proceed to give the details of this encroachment, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the position taken by the Executive of the United States, nearly twenty-five years ago, in respect to the future colonization of this continent by European powers.

In the annual message of Mr. Monroe to Congress, in December, 1823, he stated that in the discussion of the respective rights of Great Britain, Russia, and the United States, on the northwestern coast of America, the occasion had "been judged proper for asserting as a principle, in which the rights of the United States are involved, that the American continents, by the free and independent condition which they have assumed and maintained, are henceforth not to be considered as subjects for future colonization by any European powers." In the same message it was declared that we should regard any attempt on the part of European powers to extend their political "system to any portion of this hemisphere, as dangerous to our peace and safety." "With existing colonies or dependencies of any European powers," says the message, "we have not interfered and shall not interfere. But with the governments who have declared their independence, and maintained it, and whose independence we have, on great consideration and on just principles, acknowledged, we could not view any interposition for the purpose of oppressing them, or controlling in any manner their destiny, by any European power, in any other light than as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition towards the United States."

The two positions assumed by the Executive of the United States were—

1. That there must be no further colonization on either of the American continents by any European power; and

2. That there must be no interference by European powers with the independent States in this hemisphere:

And these declarations were accompanied by the disavowal on our part of all intention to interfere with existing colonies or dependencies of any European Power on this continent.

Of the wisdom or policy of these declarations I have nothing to say; though I must add, that I have always considered the publication of manifestoes, which the government putting them forth is not prepared to maintain at all hazards, as calculated to detract from its dignity and influence.

Mr. Monroe's declarations have not been maintained. They applied to South as well as North America; and during the last five years the Banda Oriental and the Argentine Confederation, have been the theatre of an armed intervention on the part of Great Britain at first, and ultimately of Great Britain and France, which is almost unprecedented in the history of nations, as a violation of the right of every community to regulate its domestic concerns in its own way, without external interference. I will not detain the Senate by entering into the details of these transactions. Suffice it to say, that in 1838, in consequence of internal dissentions in the Banda Oriental, or the Oriental Republic of Uruguay, fomented by foreign officers and residents in Montevideo, General Oribe, the President, resigned, and fled to Buenos Ayres, his rival, General Rexeira, succeeding to his politicalpost. In 1842, Oribe entered the Banda Oriental, drove Rexeira into Brazil, and besieged his successor, Paez, in Montevideo, which was subsequently invested by sea by the Argentine fleet. The interposition of Admiral Purvis, commanding the British fleet, when the Admiral of the French fleet refused to interfere, on the ground that such interference would violate well established principles of international law, has had the effect of prolonging for five years a war, which would otherwise have been speedily decided, and led to a violation of every rule of international duty, through a further intervention in the affairs of the Argentine confederation by the combined fleets of France and Great Britain, under the sanction of their respective governments. Those who desire to know more of these transactions will find a most interesting discussion in the British House of Lords, in the Parliamentary Debates of 1845, vol 83, page 1152. In reply to some inquiries proposed by Lord Beaumont, the Earl of Aberdeen made the defence of the Ministry. He was followed by Lord Colchester, who had been at the Rio La Plata, and who was thoroughly acquainted with all that had taken place. He corrected many of the Earl of Aberdeen's statements, and I think it will be admitted that he left to the Ministry a most unsatisfactory ground of defence. On the principles laid down by Mr. Monroe, it would have been the duty of the United States to interpose for the purpose of protecting the Oriental and Argentine republics from this flagrant invasion of their rights as sovereign and independent States. We have failed to do so—I do not say whether rightly or not; but the impolicy of making declarations which we are not prepared to maintain is strongly exemplified in our inaction.

In the annual message of the President to Congress in December, 1846, the declarations of Mr. Monroe were reiterated, but the application of the principles he asserted was virtually restricted to the continent of North America. Whatever hesitancy there may be in extending the application further, to this extent its assertion and maintenance at all hazards can afford, it appears to me, no ground for a difference of opinion. Our own security depends, in no inconsiderable degree, on the tranquility of the States bordering on us, or in our neighborhood. The interference of European powers in their affairs can have no other effect but to produce distractions dangerous alike to them and to us. We have a right to insist, then, on the principles of non intervention on this continent—a principle lying at the very foundation of all national independence—a principle which cannot be violated without offending against the common welfare and the common interest of the whole civilized world. In connexion with this subject, I desire to say that I have always insisted in the most earnest manner on the duty of non-interference on our part with the affairs of European States. I consider it the more imperative now, when great political changes are taking place, and when the whole continent of Europe may be convulsed to its centre.

In this view of the subject, the encroachments of Great Britain in North America possess an importance which cannot be exaggerated. I begin with Central America, and shall pass on to California, where we have had recent evidence of a deliberate design to obtain possession of the country for the purpose of excluding us.

In February last, I received a letter from a friend in New York, a gentleman of high respectability, extensively engaged in commercial transactions, chiefly with Central and South America, and who formerly held a seat in the House of Representatives, stating that he had noticed my allusion to the affairs of the Mosquito coast, and that he could give me some information on the subject, if I desired it. I immediately made the request, and received from him, about a month ago, a letter, which I will read to the Senate:

NEW YORK, February 28, 1848.

"DEAR SIR: Your favor of the 25th instant is received. In compliance with your request I have hastily drawn up the outline of the information desired.

"In August, 1840, Mr. James C. Bell and myself, New York merchants, called to see a person having great command of advantages at the then newly-created Bluefields, Mosquito nation, Central America, and who desired to form a connexion with a house at New York, in which these advantages would be profitably employed for commercial enterprize. Having, at that time, much business at Belize and Truxillo, I was ready to listen to propositions for increasing my trade with that country, especially to receive their valuable information which I suspected Mr. B. could give me. Mr. Bell stated he was the Secretary to the British consulate at Bluefields, which he assured me was really the government or portion of the Mosquito nation—a tribe of discolute and degraded Indians, scarcely so, called at fourteen, with an income of the consul below, and descended on the Truxillo country for the purpose of collecting the Mosquito quota from those previously conveyed to the British government, on that their claim when questioned could be maintained as a legal demand made on them by the Kings that the office of the British consul was not really the position of any importance, which abounded with such forests of mahogany and other valuable woods on the coast and many miles in the interior on navigable rivers, but at the proper time to show, provided sufficient inducements, a number of acres of land to the Mosquito Indians, from the south to 10° of north latitude, comprising San Juan and the rich country of Lake Nicaragua, thus securing the best route to the Pacific, as well as by far the most fertile and productive part of all that section of Central America; that he (Mr. Bell) had made two visits, accompanied by skilful surveyors and engineers, to San Juan, and thence to the interior and to the Lake Nicaragua for purposes of exploration, &c., by order of the government, and received privately to Mr. Walker, the Consul at Bluefields, that he came to the United States to effect on his individual account a connexion with some mercantile house by which to establish branches at Bluefields and at San Juan in advance of its becoming a British port, that he had received an exclusive grant for the cutting of mahogany on Bluefields river and adjacent coast; that this connexion with and intimate relation to the consulate at Bluefields, alias the Mosquito government, would give him such advantages at San Juan that he could nearly monopolize the interior trade of that place, and ship to the United States large quantities of spars, indigo, cochineal, hides, &c. in exchange for cotton goods, flour, &c.

"Mr. Bell, by written documents and by [illegible] satisfied me fully of the truth of his statements, and I [illegible] to go [illegible] I [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

the pretence of giving protection to this miscalled nation, Great Britain has extended her sovereignty over a district of country nearly as large as the State of New York or Pennsylvania. She has vessels of war, commanded by British subjects, under the name of the Mosquito navy. And, in a word, she has appropriated to herself a part of the territory of Honduras, and is encroaching on the territory of Nicaragua, against the solemn protest of the Central American States. Her objects are doubtless threefold—

1. To extend her political dominion on this continent;
2. To open new fields for commercial enterprise; and
3. To obtain possession of the most practicable route for a ship canal across the Isthmus, and thus to control the commercial communication between the two oceans.

This last object is naturally regarded as the most important. The route has been surveyed minutely, thoroughly, by a British engineer, and its practicability ascertained. From the Caribbean Sea to Lake Nicaragua, the river San Juan is susceptible of the requisite improvement. The lake is already navigable for vessels of any burden; and from the lake it is less than sixteen miles to the Pacific, with a mean descent of about one hundred and twenty-eight feet. The results of this examination will be found at the end of the first volume of Stephen's work on Central America.

But it is not through her connexion with the Mosquito coast alone that Great Britain is extending herself across the continent. Through her establishment at Belize she is penetrating to the very heart of the peninsula of Yucatan. She had at first only a permission to occupy a small district on the coast for the purpose of cutting logwood, and to enjoy the use of a fishery for the subsistence of the persons employed. This permission was given during the Spanish rule in America. It was confirmed in 1783 by the treaty of Versailles, under very cautious restrictions, and slightly extended by the treaty of London in 1786. The sovereignty of Spain over this territory became, by virtue of the independence of her colonies, of which Yucatan was one, vested in Mexico. But the right of Great Britain to Belize, I am told, has not been recognized either by Mexico or Yucatan. She not only continues to hold the coast, but she has extended herself over a district of about fourteen thousand square miles, embracing one of the most valuable portions of Yucatan; and I believe she claims it by conquest. She is within sixty miles of Chiapas, the Southern State of Mexico; and her chief establishment is said to be a vast depot of contraband. A fierce contest is now going on between the Spanish and Indian races of Yucatan; and the latter, who were once disarmed and harmless, are now found to be abundantly supplied with powder and firearms—many of the latter bearing the stamp of the tower of London. When this contest, marked, as all such contests are, by murder and wanton and savage barbarity, shall have exhausted the combatants, both parties may be willing to take refuge in the power, and find tranquility under the protection of Great Britain. Sir, this is the usual issue of her intervention in the domestic concerns of other States—those especially in which civilization has made but little progress. This is still more likely to be the result when semi-barbarous tribes are intermingled with civilized races, as in the greater portion of this continent to the south of us, and from numbers or local circumstances approaching an equality with each other in point of strength.

I do not make these statements, Mr. President, for the purpose of exciting feeling here or elsewhere. It is a subject which I desire to see considered with calmness and deliberation; but it is one which deeply concerns us. Our tranquility, our political comfort, our commercial interests, are all involved in the exemption of neighboring States from domestic dissensions and violence; and we have a right to see that these mischiefs are not promoted by unauthorized interference from abroad. I do not propose to speak of the right of interference in the internal concerns of other States. On a former occasion I said to the Senate all that I desire to say on that subject. But I hold it to be our right and our duty, when we see questionable movements by foreign powers on this continent, either through their constituted authorities, or through their subjects, supported by the power of the State, to know what are their objects, and to see that the political independence of our weak and defenceless neighbors is not insidiously subverted, and their territorial possessions wrested from them by unwarrantable encroachment.

One of the peculiarities of the system by which Great Britain has extended herself over so large a portion of the globe, is that she usually acts in the first instance by private rather than by public agents. She employs commerce to effect what other governments accomplish by public authority and force. Instead of sending an army or a fleet to take possession of a coast, she sends a trading company. Nothing can be more unsuspicious than the circumstances under which their first lodgment—the germ, perhaps, of a future empire—is made. They only wish some facilities for landing and for shelter while they dispose of their merchandize; they desire to establish a factory, (which, in the British accepta tion of the term, is a house for traders,) and to enjoy some temporary conveniences for traffic. The permission is given, a foothold is obtained, a house is built, a picket, a ditch, an embankment follow. These simple improvements (to use an American phrase) grow insensibly into a settlement, a fortress, and a colony, and the occupation becomes perpetual. Here are British subjects, British property, and British interests to be protected; the honor of Great Britain is concerned, and it will not permit them to be abandoned. Her East Indian Empire, the most vast and lucrative of her possessions, was gained through the agency of a trading company. Through a trading company she gained her first foothold on the northwest coast of America, and obtained for herself in the end some of the best portions of Oregon.

There is another peculiarity in the British system of extension. Colonization is only desired so far as it is coextensive with political sovereignty, She does not labor to civilize or improve where she cannot rule. Commercial interest is the principal, and social improvement the incident, in her progress.

Sir, there were two great systems of colonization in ancient times—those of Greece and Rome—and each distinct in its character. Greece was actuated by no sordid reference to self in the extension of her people. When she sent out her children to colonize distant territories, she let them go forth independent and free. She did not insist on carrying her political sovereignty along with them, and compelling them to pay a servile obedience to it. She sent them out with her benedictions and prayers, to enjoy, unshared by herself, whatever prosperity they could earn by their industry and their valor; and it was through these migrations that the foundations of ancient civilization were laid in southern Italy.

Roman colonization was totally different in its character. Rome, indeed, did not encourage colonization out of Italy in the early days of the republic. In its latter days, and during the early period of the empire, she sent out colonies to distant regions, and retained them in dependence on herself. She desired that all the streams of prosperity which emanated from her should be poured back, in enlarged currents, upon their source. It was a vast system of centralization. Under its influence the heart became distended and gorged, while the extremities were left exhausted and cold, and the whole system fell asunder by force of this inequality.

This is the British system of colonization; it has been more liberal of late, but unless still further relaxed, its fate will be the same. Its great characteristic is dependence on the parent State; its most inflexible formulas, (if I may be allowed the expression,) colonial governments subservient to the crown, commercial regulations framed with an exclusive, and (such is the fatality of all selfishness, individual or national) usually with a mistaken view to metropolitan interests.

It is not for our advantage that this system should be extended. We desire freedom in commercial intercourse. We do not interfere with any colonial systems, however exclusive, where they now exist. We do not oppose their extension in any other portions of the globe. But, having no colonies ourselves, desiring none, looking only to an extension by pacific means, and from the operation of natural laws, over the unoccupied districts of country west of us, we have a right to insist that colonial establishments, exclusive in their character as respects commercial intercourse, shutting out the world except the parent State, and dependent on distant governments, shall not be planted in our neighborhood in violation of the rights of defenceless States. I would not make this principle the theme of a declaration or a manifesto. I would have it quietly announced to those whom it concerns, and firmly maintained against all infringement.

Before I dismiss this part of the subject, I wish to say that I am not unwilling to concede to Great Britain some merit for what she has done for constitutional liberty in the past, nor am I disposed to deny that her colonial system may lead in the end to results of great value to the cause of civilization. She has, in more than one instance, arrayed herself against the progress of arbitrary government in Europe, and asserted principles which lie at the very basis of all free institutions. Through her colonial possessions she is disseminating throughout the globe the intelligence and the civilization by which she is herself distinguished; and, when the political bonds by which her vast possessions are held together shall be rent asunder—a day not distant, perhaps—when the sceptre of her empire shall be broken, the colonies she has planted in every continent and in every sea, will become so many centres from which the lights of knowledge and freedom will be radiated to the darker portions of the earth. While advocating a determined resistance to her encroachments, I am willing, nevertheless, to do her this political justice.

Let me now turn to the subject more immediately in hand—the California claims. The propriety of passing the bill providing for the payment of them has been fully shown by the honorable Senator from Michigan. It only remains for me to consider the subject in connexion with the particular topic which I have discussed.

By the testimony taken before the Committee on Military Affairs, it appears—

1. That Eugenio Macnamara, a Catholic priest, made application to the government of Mexico for a grant of land in Upper California, for the establishment of Irish colonies. The first colony was to be established at San Francisco; the second at Monterey; and the third at Santa Barbara; and the number of colonists was not to be less than ten thousand. There is no date to the application; but other documents show it to have been previously to the 19th of January, 1846.

2. The avowed objects of Macnamara were to keep the Californias out of the hands of the Americans, who are represented, in his memorial to the Mexican government, as an artful and base enemy, and as abhoring the people and the religion of Mexico.

I will read to the Senate some extracts from his original application to the Mexican government. They will be found in the translation at page 19 of the document containing the testimony taken before the Committee on Military Affairs, and in the original Spanish, at page 77 of the same document:

"1. Eugenio Macnamara, Catholic priest and apostolic vicar, came to the country of submitting to your Excellency some reflections on a subject worthy of the attention, much public attention, dealing to the expectation and consideration of Upper California.

"It does not require the gift of prophecy to foresee that with which [illegible] the country will cease to be an integral part of this republic, unless some prompt and and efficacious measure be adopted to prevent [illegible]

"For this reason I propose, with the aid and association of your Excellency to carry forward this project, to place in Upper California a colony of [illegible]. I have a triple object in making the proposition. I wish, in the first place, to increase the cause of Catholicism, in the second to contribute to the [illegible] of a country, new, thirdly, I desire to prevent obstacles in the way of [illegible] occasioned on the score of an irreligious and anti Catholic nature. I therefore pray to your Excellency that these be conceded to me in extent of territory on the coast of Upper California for the purpose I have indicated."

I will also read an extract, at page 24, from his second application, urging attention to the first. It will be found in that section at page 79:

"Your Excellency will excuse me that I return to the charge in this matter, as it is no fine ought to be had in this important affair. [illegible] your Excellency knows well enough that we are [illegible] enemy, who knows no means however [illegible] country, and who abhors [illegible] and [illegible]

"If the means which I propose be not [illegible], your Excellency may be assured that, before another year, the California will become the prey of the Methodist wolves, and the whales country will be consumed with the [illegible]. WHAT I propose the means of repelling them, my [illegible] I have [illegible] inasmuch as I have no personal interest in the affair, save the progress of the holy religion of God, and the happiness of my countrymen. The stigma cast upon us and upon one of our most respectable [illegible] I cannot [illegible] as emanating from a conviction of their truth."

3. The grant to Macnamara, after being submitted to the consideration of the Governor of California, was made on the 4th of July, 1846, and comprised about three thousand square leagues, containing, besides the bay of San Francisco, some of the best lands some of the most important military and commercial positions in California.

4. Macnamara was taken to California in a British sloop-of-war (the Juno) in June, 1846; a British ship of 80 guns, (the Collingwood) commanded by Admiral Seymour, followed in July, and Macnamara was taken away in her.

The extract I am about to read from the affidavit of Col. Fremont will show the connexion between Macnamara's movements and those of the public armed vessels of Great Britain. It will be found at page 14 of the document:

"The fruits of the revolutionary movement thus passed to the United States, and have remained with her ever since. These fruits were very considerable. Besides the peaceable possession of all the northern part of California and the actual force in the field under the independent flag, which immediately was [illegible] the United States, there is good reason to believe, and evidence is now at hand to sustain that belief, that the revolutionary movement prevented a design of the Californians to put their country under the flag of the British, and also prevented the completion of the colonization grant of three thousand square leagues to Macnamara, who was brought to California in the British sloop of war Juno, in the month of June, 1846. Admiral Seymour, in the Collingwood, of 80 guns, arrived at Monterey on the 16th of July. Macnamara was on board the Collingwood when I arrived at Monterey on the 19th, and was carried away in that vessel. The taking possession of that place on the 7th had anticipated him, and the revolutionary movement had checked the designs of the Californians to place the country under British protection; and also prevented the fulfilment of the great grant to Macnamara, the original papers of which I now have here, to be shown to the committee and to be delivered up to the government."

5. In addition to the Macnamara grants, some of the most valuable missions were sold in May and June, 1846, to British subjects, for very inconsiderable sums, showing an evident design, in case the United States should get possession of the California, to keep some of the most valuable districts out of the hands of the government, by converting them, through fraudulent conveyances, into British property.

6. It appears also that a plan was set on foot by the British Vice Consul in California, Mr. Forbes, Macnamara, and others, to put that country under the protection of Great Britain, and at the very moment when it was expected that a war would break out between the United States and Mexico. The time, the circumstances, the actors, all indicate a deliberate design to get possession of California for the purpose of keeping it out of the hands of the United States. The auspices under which a junta was planned and convoked for the purpose of asking the protection of Great Britain are shown by an extract which I will read from the affidavit of Capt. Gillespie, of the Marine Corps, and which will be found at page 28 of the document:

"About this time, June 30, I learned that the junta which was to have established at Santa Barbara on 15th June, and which had been planned and [illegible] and through the agency of Mr. Forbes, the British Vice Consul, and an Irish Catholic priest, by the name of Macnamara, had been prevented from assembling in consequence of the rising of the settlers. This junta was proposed for the purpose of asking the protection of England, and of giving an immediate [illegible] to the treaty of the San Joaquin for the settlement of ten thousand Indians, to be brought to California under the direction of Macnamara. All this intrigue of British agents was broken up by the timely and prompt operations of the settlers, under the direction of Capt. Fremont."

By Lieut. Minor's testimony, which will be found at pages 43 and 44, it appears that the convention or junta was held, and that a majority were in favor of claiming the protection of England—a decision naturally to have been expected, when it is considered under what auspices it was convoked. The extracts I am about to read contain also some interesting facts connected with the movements of the British Admiral:

"The undersigned, a lieutenant in the navy of the United States, has the honor to make the following answers to the interrogatories put to him by your honorable committee:

"The undersigned being in command of the southern district of California during the latter part of 1846, was influenced by Pedro C. Carrillo and [illegible] information thus obtained is founded on facts) that he, the said Carillo, was a member of a junta that assembled at Santa Barbara in June, 1846, for the purpose of declaring the independence of California, and of asking the protection of the United States or Great Britain, that the junta was represented by all of the influential portions of California; that a majority of the same were for claiming the protection of England; that their resolves would probably have been executed had it not been for the war and their fears of an armed force, then on the north side of the bay of San Francisco, under the command of Capt. Fremont. The undersigned has understood from other sources entitled to confidence, that a majority of the people of California desired the protection of England. The opinion he thus formed was strengthened by the fact that an English frigate (the Juno) had, about the time the junta met, landed an English subject named Macnamara at Santa Barbara, of whom it was said that he had obtained a grant from the Mexican government of a large and fertile portion of California, embracing the whole valley of the San Joaquin, from its source to its mouth—a valley, as the undersigned believes, comprising one-third of the richest portion of California. The undersigned believes that the British squadron in the Pacific, commanded by Rear Admiral Sir Geo. T. Seymour, composed then of a larger force than they ever had upon that ocean, were employed in closely watching the movements of the American commodore. Being aware of this fact, Commodore Stont, when he heard of the first battle on the Rio Grande, put under way in the frigate Savannah, then anchored off Mazatlan, for the ostensible purpose of proceeding to California. An English vessel of war weighed soon after the Savannah, and stood in the direction of San Blas, where it was known the admiral was. After cruising in the gulf two days the commodore returned to his anchorage off Mazatlan, when another English ship got under way and stood in the direction of San Blas. The undersigned believes that this was intended to communicate [illegible] the departure of the English admiral. On the 8th of June, 1846, the Savannah again made sail, and, after a passage of 23 days, during which a press of canvas was carried, she arrived at the port of Monterey, in Upper California, on the 7th July, of which day, the ship of Admiral Seymour, entered the harbor on the 15th of July, and the undersigned believes that the admiral was disappointed when he saw the American flag flying on shore."

The testimony of Capt. Hensley, from which I will give a brief extract, and which will be found at page 33, fully sustains the statement of Lieut. Minor:

"I am a resident in California, where I have resided since the autumn of 1843. In the month of May, 1846, I went to San Francisco, where I met with Gen. Vallejo, and had a short conversation with him on the affairs of Upper California. I understood from him that he had recently attended a convention, composed of Gen. Castro, himself, and five others, delegates from the different districts in California, at which the proposition had been made and debated to separate from Mexico, and establish a government in California, under the protection of some foreign power, believed by us to be England; but, as the General positively stated, the majority was not in favor of placing the country under the protection of the United States, though he himself was. Gen. Vallejo was of course guarded in conversing on so dangerous a subject as this was at that time, and from the substance of his remarks, as understood by myself and [illegible] who heard them."

The grant to Macnamara is so connected with the movements of the public vessels and public agents of Great Britain, as to raise a strong presumption that he was secretly countenanced by the British Government. Dr. John Baldwin, whose testimony will be found at pages 46, et seq., states that Macnamara lived in the house of the British consul or charge d'affairs in Mexico, and that he understood in that city in September and October, 1847, a plan had been projected, under the auspices of the British legation, to colonize California with emigrants from Ireland. These facts will be more fully shown by his affidavit, at pages 46 and 47 of the document, from which I will read a single paragraph:

"I resided in the republic of Mexico from the year 1822, until 1838, a period of sixteen years; during which I made the acquaintance of many of the leading men of the country.

"I again entered Mexico (city) on the 14th of September, 1847, and remained there until the 31st of November; during that time I made the acquaintance of the priest Macnamara. From various sources entitled to credit, I was informed that he had, under the auspices of the British legation, projected a plan to colonize California with emigrants from Ireland. His project had met the approbation of the Mexican Government, and he went to California to perfect his plans. In the mean time, it was asserted that the ulterior views of Macnamara was to promote the interest of the British Government and not the Mexican Government. A fierce opposition was commenced in the republican members of Congress, when he should return with his matured plans from California; this resistance became unnecessary in consequence of the conquest of California, by the arms of the United States. Macnamara lived in the family of either the British consul or charge d'affairs in Mexico."

I have referred to the connexion of Macnamara's movements with the public vessels of Great Britain as presumptive evidence of the connexion of the British Government with them. I do not inquire whether Admiral Seymour had special instructions or not. From the declaration of Admiral Purvis, in the intervention of La Plata, it is highly probable that British naval officers cruising in distant seas have general instructions "to protect British interests at all hazards," (I believe that is the phrase,) leaving an unlimited discretion to the officer and giving to the government the advantage of being able to approve or disavow his conduct, as its special cases, according to its own interest. From all the circumstances connected with the transactions in California, we are constrained to believe that the British naval commander was fully apprised of Macnamara's objects, as well as the design to place that country under the protection of Great Britain, and that he was there co-operating in the one, and ready to co-operate in the other. Indeed, by referring to the testimony of Mr. Leker, at page 39, it will be seen that his arrival there had been talked about and expected with a view "to take possession of California."

I have given, Mr. President, a mere outline of the transactions of British subjects and British agents in California. The leading facts are verified by the affidavits of Col. Fremont, Capt. Gillespie, of the marine corps, Lieut. Minor and Midshipman Wilson, of the navy, Col. Russell, Capt. Hensley, Doctor Baldwin, and many gentlemen connected with the civil and military transactions of the Californias after the rupture between the United States and Mexico; and some of the most important circumstances are authenticated by the public records of California which fell into our possession.

It is impossible that the success of these movements should not have brought us into direct collision with Great Britain. We could not have failed to regard them, considered in connexion with her proceedings in Oregon and more recently in Central America, as part of a deliberate design to environ us with her colonies, and especially to shut us out from the Pacific and its extending commerce. From all the facts, we can hardly doubt either that she would have taken possession of the country in her own name, or, what is perhaps more probable, that she would in the first instance, have taken it under her protection. In this case the drama of the Musquito coast, the performers only being changed, would have been acted over again. A Californian governor, somewhat above the grade of the king of the Musquitos in respectability, but on the same level with him in subservience to the protecting power, would have been put in the foreground, while British subjects would have occupied the country and gradually reduced it into the possession of Great Britain. Thus shut out from the Pacific, our own people would have been met at the Sierra Madre, or perhaps still further east, and the tide of emigration and settlement would have been turned back upon the Atlantic coast. It is in this point of view that these transactions possess the greatest interest and importance, and that the sagacity, promptitude, and decision of your youthful commander in California, at the time the disturbances broke out, have given him the strongest claims on his countrymen. Any faltering on his part—any hesitancy in acting, and in acting promptly—might have cost us millions of dollars and thousands of lives; and it might also have cost us a contest of which the end is not readily foreseen.

Mr. ATCHISON.—I deem it my duty from various considerations to support the main principles of this bill. Many of the claimants are natives of Missouri, and have been known to me almost from my boyhood. The bill proposes to make an appropriation for the satisfaction of these claims for military services in California, and prescribes the manner in which the justice of these claims shall be ascertained. In both these objects I concur. It was the citizens of California under Col. Fremont who made this conquest, and the benefits of that conquest have accrued, as has been properly said, to the United States—and in a financial point of view it will be found that this conquest has been made at less cost than any other during the war.

Mr. President, I can fully justify Col. Fremont in all that he did in California. Indeed he would have deserved the execration of the American people, and he would have received it, had he done less. What were the circumstances? It seems he had taken up his line of march for Oregon. He had left California and had advanced as far as the northern extremity of Llama Lake. He was there overtaken by an officer of the United States who informed him that preparations were making to expel the American settlers from California, upon the groundless pretext that they were about to commence an insurrection against the government. Col. Fremont had then under his command about one hundred and sixty men, and there was in the territory what was called the California battalion, not exceeding three hundred men, composed of those who had gone into that country as emigrants, intending to settle there. What could Col. Fremont have done except what he did do? What could any man who had a heart in his bosom do, when the very annihilation of his countrymen was threatened? When, too, he had authentic information that they were not only in danger from a civilized force, but that the Indians were to be stirred up against them? I appeal to every Senator, what could he have done under such circumstances? Sir, had he not acted as he did, he would have deserved and received the execration of every honest man in the United States. He returned upon the receipt of this information to the valley of the Sacramento, where he had several engagements with the forces of the enemy. This was on the 8th or 9th of May, and here let me remark, that hostilities had commenced in another place. It was upon those days that the battles of Palo Alto and Resseca de la Palma were fought. There was no place for our citizens to retire to. They were but acting upon the first law of nature, self-defence. It was not then known that war was declared, it is true, but they could do nothing else than repel the hostilities with which they were assailed. Col. Fremont as the officer of this government, could not, it is true, have raised the flag of the United States in California; a short time afterwards, however, the news of the war with Mexico arrived, and then the standard of the United States was raised, the stars and stripes taking the place of the grizly bear. Commodore Stockton then took the command, and Col. Fremont was required to raise as many men as he could, to complete the conquest of California. This was done, and in a period of about nine months the work was accomplished. The volunteer forces which he raised, furnished all the necessary supplies and munitions of war themselves, to carry on the campaign. These supplies were purchased by Col. Fremont on the behalf of the government, upon his own responsibility; and it seems to me that the act having been adopted, by this government taking formal possession of the country, government if not legally, is at all events morally bound to make compensation. The government should do one of two things, they should either relinquish all claim to California, or else they should make the necessary appropriation to pay these men. Upon the plainest principle of justice and morality—to say nothing of interest—we must do one or the other. We must either relinquish to these citizens the country which they were instrumental in conquering, or we must indemnify them. They made great sacrifices, and we have made use of their property, and services. It is right then that they should be indemnified. I have had conversations with well informed persons who were there at the time, and they informed me that the emigrants who were then coming to that country, left their families in the mountains, and joined this battalion for the purpose of defending their countrymen, who were already settled in California. I have been further informed that many of them did not receive one cent of pay for many months service. They entered the service well clothed and well equipped, with all the little funds they could spare, making use of their own houses, and thus contributed to the conquest of California. And they did all this upon the assurance of officers of the United States, that they would receive compensation for their services. I could refer you to proofs if it were necessary, but I presume every gentleman has read the testimony. Many of these witnesses I have known a long time, and they are all men of respectability, high standing, and unimpeachable veracity. I hope there will be no objection to the passage of this bill, for I think there can be no question as to the propriety of its passage. There are points however, about which I have some doubt, and that is, whether it is within the constitutional power of Congress to name the commissioners; but, that Col. Fremont and the officers of the battalion—the persons connected with the transactions—should constitute this commission, there can be no question. They can have no interest separate from that of the government, as far as I can see. Their duty will be only to ascertain what claims are just, and allow only such as are of that character. The men who transacted the business are most likely to know the details, and are most capable of judging as to the correctness of the claims. There are only two propositions presented, one is to pay for the services rendered, and the other the appointment of a proper commission to decide upon the claims.

Mr. RUSK indicating a wish to make some remarks upon the subject, the further consideration of the bill was postponed until to-morrow.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion by Mr. HANNEGAN, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business, and after some time spent therein,

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, MARCH 30, 1848.

PETITIONS.

Mr. DIX presented the petition of Hall J. Kelly, asking a grant of land in Oregon, for services rendered in exploring and developing the resources of that country; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HALE presented a petition of citizens of Maine, praying a speedy termination of the war with Mexico, and the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia; the motion to receive, which was laid upon the table.

Also, a petition of citizens of Erie county, New York, expressing their belief that slavery never had any constitutional existence, and praying the adoption of measures for its abolition throughout the United States.

Mr. HALE moved that the petition be received, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DOWNS moved that the motion to receive the petition be laid upon the table; which was agreed to.

Mr. HALE presented a petition from citizens of Mentz, New York, praying an inquiry into the constitutionality of slavery, and the propriety of extending the writ of habeas corpus to every inhabitant of the United States. He thought that this petition did not come within the practice of the Senate in regard to abolition petitions, as it did not ask for the abolition of slavery. He thought it due to the petitioners that the subject should receive the consideration of a committee, and a report be made which would enlighten them on the subject.

Mr. TURNEY moved that the motion to receive be laid on the table.

Mr. HALE demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and it was decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Ashley, Atchison, Bagby, Breese, Butler, Calhoun, Davis, of Mississippi, Dickinson, Dix, Dayton, Downs, Douglas, Hannegan, Hunter, Johnson, of Ga., Lewis, Mangum, Moor, Niles, Rusk, Turney, Westcott, Yulee—23.

NAYS—Baldwin, Davis, of Massachusetts, Hale, Miller, Phelps, Underwood, Upham—7.

Mr. PHELPS presented a memorial from citizens of the United States praying the purchase of Mount Vernon by the government; which was laid upon the table.

WRECKS OF VESSELS.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be instructed to communicate to the Senate such information as he may possess, or may be able to collect in regard to wrecks of vessels belonging to the United States during the year which will end the 30th June next, designating the places where such wrecks occurred, the time when, and all other circumstances attending the same which he may deem useful.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. DOWNS, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, submitted a report accompanied by a bill for the relief of Henry Fredien and other citizens of Louisiana.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

Mr. ASHLEY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of the legal representatives of William McKenzie, late a seaman on board the United States' ship Vincennes, reported it without amendment.

Mr. DIX, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of Elijah H. Willis, reported it without amendment.

CONGRATULATIONS TO THE FRENCH.

The following joint resolution coming up in its order, it was read a second time:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, in the name and behalf of the American people, the congratulations of Congress are hereby tendered to the people of France upon their success in their recent efforts to consolidate liberty, by embodying its principles in a republican form of government.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to transmit this resolution to the American minister at Paris, with instructions to present it to the French government.

Mr. BALDWIN then moved that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. ALLEN.—I have no very great feeling on the subject of this particular motion. I do not know, sir, that it will make a great deal of difference whether this resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations or retained by the Senate and made the special order of the day for a day in future. I cannot anticipate, sir, what may or may not be the opinion of the members who compose that committee with regard to this resolution; I will however presume to say, that, whatever the opinion of the committee may be, I doubt not they will afford the Senate an opportunity, by a report on the subject, to express its opinion upon the resolution itself or the principles embraced in it. But, sir, it does not seem to me to be one of those propositions which require the intervention of a committee previous to the action of the Senate upon them. It is an isolated proposition—without detail—without complexity—which is presented to the mind of every Senator, and it is therefore of a character, which, it would seem to me, must render it totally unnecessary that it should be referred to a standing or even a select committee. Near the beginning of this session, sir, a resolution was submitted by the honorable Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] in relation to what ought or ought not to be the policy of the government of the United States with regard to Mexico. That resolution looked to a pending state of things, and was in its very nature a complex proposition. It was so much so, and so immediately connected with the action of our government, that I thought—with great deference to the better opinion of others however—that it would be most wise, most circumspect, in every way most judicious, that a resolution of that import—in full view of the actual relations which this country bore to Mexico, at the moment the resolution was introduced—should be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. But the honorable mover of the resolution deemed it totally unnecessary that any such reference should be made; and seemed to consider the motion to refer as a motion hostile to the resolution, and as an indirect attempt to evade the consideration of it by the Senate. He therefore opposed the reference, and opposed it with reasons so good, in the judgment of a majority of the Senate, that his opposition prevailed, and the reference was not made according to the motion.

The proposition which I have submitted is a simple, isolated proposition; it presents a solitary question to the minds of the Senate, unembarrassed and unelaborated by any details, a question on which no committee can enlighten the Senate otherwise than by making a report and presenting an argument for or against the specific proposition contained in the resolution. I therefore trust that this reference will not be made, but that the Senate will retain possession of the resolution and fix a day on which it will take it up for consideration and dispose of it in the usual form by a formal vote of the body. Still, sir, I shall not only do that which I am obliged to do—acquiesce in the judgment of the Senate upon this subject, but I shall do it without any further complaint of that judgment, than that such a course may look like an unwillingness on the part of the body to meet this question upon the responsibility of its members, I shall not occupy the time of the Senate any longer. Should it be the judgment of the Senate, that the resolution be referred, I trust that the committee to which it is so referred will report it back in such a form as to give the Senate the command of the question, and not withhold it too long, to enable us to fix a day for its final consideration.

I am not going into a discussion of the question presented in this resolution now. If I were ever so much desirous of doing so, and the Senate ever so much desirous of granting me the honor of its attention, still the cold which I have would prevent me from doing so at present; but I will state, that if any member of this body supposes that this resolution originated inconsiderately without a just appreciation, as far as my mind could appreciate such an important object—without a just appreciation of the effect of its passage, those who entertain this supposition are much mistaken. I duly considered this matter in all its forms and aspects; and never in my whole life have I embraced any proposition with a more thorough approbation of my heart, and my mind, than that which I have submitted in the form of this resolution. I think, sir, that I know what I am about; I think that when I undertake to submit a resolution to express, through the instrumentality of the two houses of Congress, the approval of the American people of this great movement in Europe, that I know what I am about. But, sir, as I said before, I will not go into this matter now; but I hope to have an opportunity of going into it in all its depths, even to its deepest foundations. It was remarked by a distinguished member of this body not long since, that we, now-a-days, hear but little said upon the great elementary truths of public liberty; that the subject seemed to be forgotten. Here, sir, is an occasion for reviving and reviewing the elementary principles of public liberty; and I desire, for one, to contribute my humble efforts to remedy this evil of which we have heard so much complaint—that in our discussions here the public mind has seldom been directed to the great question of liberty, that we were distracted with ideas of conquest, and had lost sight of ideas of liberty. When this discussion shall come up, I desire to go into this rich subject, and to remedy that defect in our discussions which we have heard of not long since in this Senate. And I shall hope to have the aid, or rather something more than the aid of much abler men than myself upon this floor, for I will not presume that any man, affecting to represent the American people would be unwilling to say on their behalf that they congratulate the French people upon the establishment of the liberties of French, I will anticipate no such result. I shall not ask the yeas and nays upon the motion to refer; but I will hope that the Senate will not refer this resolution to a committee.

Mr. HALE.—I wish, sir, to offer an amendment, and I beg to say a few words in reference to it. When we were counselled by the President of the United States to establish a mission to Rome on account of the occurrence of "recent political events," there was a good deal of discussion as to what the Pope had done. An honorable Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. FOOTE,] thought that the Pope had done a great deal, whilst on the other hand, an honorable Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. BADGER,] thought that his Holiness had as yet accomplished very little. In the case now before us I think it must be admitted that something has been done. The French revolution has not been altogether fruitless. It presents something tangible. I propose, sir, that our resolutions of congratulation should have some meaning, and, therefore, submit the following amendment to the resolutions of the Senator from Ohio:

Add in the 8th line, after the word government, these words:

And manifesting the sincerity of their purpose by instituting measures for the immediate emancipation of the slaves of all the colonies of the republic.

When we send such a resolution as that, sir, the French people will be informed of the object of our sympathy. It will assure them that in our judgment they have indeed done something tangible in the cause of liberty and humanity, on account of which the heart of the American people is filled with joy and gladness. The French people have not made a mere empty declaration of their attachment to the cause of liberty. They have not declared the people free and yet retained their fellow creatures in bondage. They have thus done something which deserves the congratulations of the whole world. I move that the amendment be printed for the use of the Senate, and that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. DOWNS.—I do not perceive any necessity for the reference of the resolution, and as it is obvious that there must be some debate, I think that the better course will be to fix a day for its consideration.

Mr. HALE.—For myself, I should prefer the course indicated by the Senator from Louisiana, but I made the motion to refer in order to meet the views of my friend from Connecticut, [Mr. BALDWIN.]

Mr. CALHOUN.—I do not perceive the slightest necessity for referring this resolution to the committee, and on that point I entirely concur with the views of the mover of it. The resolution is simple; it requires no examination of details, and the Senate is just as competent to form an opinion of its merits as any committee can possibly be.

I do not intend to enter at present, into the great question presented in the resolution. To act upon it now, would in my judgment, be premature. The people of France have done much. They have made a mighty revolution. They have overthrown an old and powerful monarchy; and decreed the establishment of a republic. All this they have accomplished in a very short period, and without any extraordinary bloodshed or confusion. It is indeed calculated to excite our wonder, and, so far as the aim of the French people extends, our lively sympathy. But the time has not yet arrived for congratulation. Much remains to be done. The real work to be performed is yet before them. They have decreed a republic, but it remains for them to establish a republic. If the French people shall succeed in that—if they shall prove themselves to be as wise in constructing a proper constitution, as they have proved themselves to be skilful in demolishing the old form of government,—if they shall really form a constitution which shall on one hand guard against violence and anarchy, and on the other against oppression of the people, they will have achieved,indeed,a great work. They will then be entitled to the congratulations not only of this country, but of the whole civilized world. But if they fail, what then? What then? Can there be a more important inquiry? If France fail, under what form of government will she find herself? I suppose it will be out of the question to go back to a constitutional monarchy. The Bourbon family in all its branches, is, I take it, now odious to the French people. They will hardly think of reinstating the old imperial dynasty of Napoleon. An aristocracy they cannot think of; and what then must be the result if they fail to establish a republic? If it come to contests within, or wars without—if it shall be necessary to resort to force, to repress internal discord, or overcome foreign assailants—quite a possible case—France may find herself in the embrace of a military despotism. Such a result would furnish no ground for congratulation either on our part, or that of the civilized world.

This is, indeed, a mighty movement. It is pregnant with mighty consequences. Whether the result shall prove to be a blessing or a curse to France and the world,depends upon what is coming,rather than upon what has been already done. A revolution in itself is not a blessing. The revolution accomplished by the French people, is indeed a wonderful event—the most striking in my opinion, in history; but it may lead to events which will make it a mighty evil. It is therefore premature to offer our congratulations merely upon a revolution. We must look to the consequences and the end. We must await the termination of the movement. I wish well to France—sincerely do I wish her well! There is no man that breathes who has a deeper or more profound love of constitutional government than I have—not one. But I have never known a period when there was so great a necessity for wise, deliberate, cautious procedure. Great events are before us. There lives not the man who can say what another year may bring forth.

I offer no opinion as to the success or failure of the French people in this effort. I see tremendous difficulties in the way of success—difficulties resulting from the social condition of France, and the composition of her people. I see on the other hand a good deal of encouragement. The success of the French people will, in my opinion, depend, at least in a very high degree, upon the fact whether she can prevent war—that again depending upon two circumstances: one, whether she may have the self-control to abstain from improper interference with surrounding countries; the other, whether they may have the moderation and good sense to abstain from assailing France. Thus far the leading power of Europe has certainly discovered great good sense and foresight. Great Britain has done as she ought to have done; and I trust that every other power in Europe will stand and look on; giving France a fair opportunity to consummate the great work in which she has engaged. It is due to France, to the civilized world, and to themselves, that European powers should observe strict non-interference. If she succeed, it will be an admonition to all Europe, that the time has arrived when they must agree to yield to liberty in a constitutional and a stable form. Thrones will fade away, and freedom and republican institutions become the order of the day. If, on the contrary, standing aloof and avoiding all contest, France shall fail in this great undertaking, after a fair trial, without the interference of other powers, it will do more to put down liberty under a republican form of government, than any other event which could occur.

Now I think that it is due all round that there shall be a fair trial. The first step to that, in my opinion, consists in quiet looking on and as little interference as possible. To France, the people everywhere will extend their sympathy; but I do contend that the governments themselves ought to be prudent and abstemious in the expression of their sentiments. If we, as a government, extend our congratulations in this formal and solemn manner; others may take the opposite and denunciatory course, and between the two, that result will be produced which must inevitably overthrow the revolution—an appeal to arms. That is one reason why this government, looking to the interests of France alone, and with the kindest feeling, ought to be cautious and abstemious in making a move. My opinion, then, is, that the wisest course will be to lay this resolution on the table, expressly on the ground that it is premature. The circumstances by which we ought to be regulated in expressing or withholding our congratulations have not yet presented themselves. When these circumstances do occur, the time for taking up the subject will have arrived. We know that a national convention, called by the provisional government, is to assemble about the middle of next month.

Mr. BENTON (in his seat.)—It will meet on the 20th of next month.

Mr. CALHOUN.—Let us await that important event. Let us await the action of the convention. That will be wise and prudent. Let us not act with precipitation. I move, then, to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. DICKINSON.—I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. UNDERWOOD.—Will the gentleman from South Carolina withdraw his motion for a moment that I may make a single remark?

Mr. CALHOUN.—I cannot withdraw the motion.

The call for the yeas and nays being seconded, they were ordered and were taken with the following result.

YEAS—Messrs Bagby, Baldwin, Benton, Berrien, Butler, Calhoun, Davis, of Mississippi, Dayton, Hunter, Mangum, Miller, Phelps, Upham, and Yulee—14

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Ashley, Atchison, Atherton, Bradbury, Breese, Cass, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, of Massachusetts, Dickinson, Dix, Douglas, Downs, Felch, Foote, Hale, Hamlin, Houston, Johnson, of Maryland, Johnson, of Georgia Lewis, Moor, Niles, Rusk, Spruance, Turney, Underwood, and Westcott—29.

So the motion to lay the resolution on the table was not agreed to.

Mr. ALLEN.—On a great question like this, I would not be guilty of the petty trickery of trying to force a vote of the Senate, under the impulse of a great feeling recently excited by so great an event. I do not desire the thoughtless, unreasonable judgment of the Senate, if this body can be supposed to be capable of such a judgment upon such a proposition as this. I seek the deliberate judgment of the Senate, in full view of all the facts upon which that judgment is to be founded, and in order that there may be time for that judgment to be made up, I move that the resolution be made the special order of the day for the first Monday in May.

Mr. BALDWIN.—There is a motion to refer now pending.

The PRESIDING OFFICER.—The motion is to postpone till the first Monday in May.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland.—I understand that the motion was to make the resolution the special order for that day.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—Does not the motion to refer take precedence?

The PRESIDING OFFICER.—The motion to postpone is first in order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD.—I concur entirely with the remarks made by the Senator from South Carolina; but I voted against his motion to lay the resolution upon the table, because I conceive it placed me in a false position. If we had had the resolution upon the table it would have been an act from which inferences might have been drawn unfavorable to those who so voted, in reference to their sympathy with the great movement which has been made by the people of France, and I am free to admit that my heart is with them in every step which they have taken. I have rejoiced in every movement which the French people has made from time to time with the view to the establishment of a republic. But although these have been my feelings, and now are my feelings, strongly cherished, I am admonished to caution by the fact that in all their former efforts they have signally failed. That signal failure, heretofore, admonishes me of the propriety of observing that prudence and caution recommended by the Senator from South Carolina. I think with him, that it is wise to await the result of this great movement. If France succeed, her example will be followed I doubt not by more than the half of Europe. If she fail, not only may the chains of monarchy be rivetted more closely in Europe, but her failure may seriously affect the safety of republican institutions throughout the world.

Now what ought to be done? It seems to me, as we are notified through the press, that the elections in France will shortly take place, that the national convention will soon assemble, and that as the result of the deliberations of that body will reach us before we adjourn, that we ought to await the event, before, as a government, we give expression to our opinions. In the meantime it will be quite becoming in any of us as citizens to tender our congratulations to the French people in this movement. Entertaining these views, and as there is no prospect that we shall obtain the result of the labors of the French convention on or before the day named by the Senator from Ohio, I move to postpone the consideration of the resolution till the first Monday in June.

Mr. DOUGLAS.—I regret that the Senator from Ohio has consented to the postponement of his resolution till the first Monday in May. In my opinion the events which have already transpired fully justify us in expressing our sympathies with the French people, and that there is no good reason for deferring our congratulations till May. The same argument which is now urged against our action till May might then require the postponement of the resolution until December, and then for a series of years. I do not suppose that the people of France will be able to reduce their system of government to perfection, either by the first of May or during the present year. The change of an old form of government to a new one—the organization of the various departments of the government—the putting of the whole machinery into operation—the familiarizing of the people to the new order of things—is the work of time. But they have made a beginning. They have made a glorious beginning. It is indeed a wonderful achievement, and forces our admiration. A revolution accomplished in three days; almost without bloodshed, by moral force, and with no other weapons than hymns of liberty and shouts of "down with the King"—"down with the Ministry"! We have before us the first acts of the provisional government, and in my judgment they present sufficient ground for hope and confidence that the government will be able to carry out what they have begun, with sobriety, wisdom and determination. In looking over the decrees issued by the provisional government from day to day it appears to me that human wisdom could not have devised a more prudent course than they have adopted. They intend to effect a radical revolution. They design to make the new government republican in all its principles and forms; and they have commenced the work in a manner which discovers that the men engaged in it, understand their business. Never—if we except the Continental Congress—has a body of men assembled, which has discovered so much skill and wisdom as has thus far characterized their proceedings.

Why then, I ask, should we defer our congratulations? What credit shall we reflect upon ourselves; or what support shall we render to France, if we withhold our sympathy and our congratulations till the struggle is over? Now is the time when our sympathies are needed. Now is the time when we should extend all the encouragement and support which the expression of our feelings may afford. Now is the time when the people of France deserve our sympathy. Now is the time when our sympathy should be given. They would not thank us for it after the struggle is over and the great work is completed. We propose to make our sympathy dependent upon their success! I suppose if they fail we are to regard them as rebels; and that it is only in the event of their success that they are to be regarded as patriots! Our judgment with respect to the great movement in which France is engaged is to depend upon their success, and not upon the work itself! I do not agree with the gentleman from South Carolina, who says that if the people of France fail, the failure will do more injury to the cause of liberty than any event which can possibly take place. If they fail now, you will find that another movement will be generated which will bring success with it. This is the first step. It may be that they may leap at a single bound from a monarchy to a republic—from comparative despotism to freedom. It may be that it will require a slower, a more protracted process, interrupted and embarrassed by difficulties, subjecting them to trials and sacrifices. The revolution may be the work of years. But whatever may be the process, slow or rapid, our sympathies are with France in this glorious work, and the utterance of those sympathies should be prompt, full and cordial. The fact that the people of France have dethroned the King and peacefully decreed a republic—the fact that they have abolished all titles and orders of nobility—the fact that they have decreed universal suffrage to France—the fact that they have been enabled to act with such a spirit of moderation and wisdom, as to combine all classes, parties, and factions in France—the church, the army, the navy—in one bond of brotherhood, acting in concert and with unanimity in support of the common cause, inspires great confidence in the success of the movement, and I am unwilling to dampen that hope by the expression of any doubts here. The presentation of this resolution, and its postponement for the reason stated, that we doubted the success of the revolution, and that it was not yet safe or prudent to express our sympathy, will have the effect of casting a shade upon this movement. I have no fear of the alternative presented by the Senator from South Carolina, that the expression of our sympathy and congratulations may elicit counter-expressions from other governments. If Russia, Prussia and Austria wish to issue denunciatory declarations, let them do so. Are the people of France likely to be deterred by any declarations from such sources? Not at all. But they do feel deeply interested to know what republican America thinks of this movement, because the United States of America is the only republic upon earth, or the only one that deserves the name. All republicans throughout the world have their eyes fixed upon us. Here is their model.—Our success is the foundation of all their hopes. Shall we, then, turn a deaf ear to the voice that comes to us from France?—shall we hold a silent tongue?—shall we hesitate?—shall we cast a damper on their hopes by expressing a doubt of their success?

I am opposed to withholding or deferring the expression of our sympathy and our confidence. I believe that it is important that we should act and act now. The prompt action of our minister in Paris presents an additional reason for the immediate passage of the resolution. Our minister showed that he thought he was safe in acting in advance of express instructions from his government, and that he was but expressing the sentiments of the people and government whom he represented in tendering his congratulations. I believe he did express the feelings and sentiments of the people of the United States, and I am unwilling, by the postponement of this resolution, to evince any doubt as to the propriety of his conduct. I make this remark not on his account, but in order to show the necessity of putting ourselves right. Why should we postpone the resolution till May? We cannot have learned by that time the action of the convention.—Are we to await the action of that body? Surely not. Surely we are not to be restrained from rejoicing in what has been already done, till we see the work completed. I believe that the work is, indeed, begun, and that the end will be certain triumph, sooner or later, and I pray that it may be achieved in the shortest time.

Mr. ALLEN.—I fully concur in all that has been said by my friend from Illinois, as to the unreasonableness of awaiting the action of the French convention. My desire is, that the resolution should be passed as speedily as possible. In naming the first Monday in May, my object was to meet if possible the convenience and wishes of others, some of whom desired a later day, and some an earlier day. But it is impossible to fix a day agreeable to all, and as I wish speedy action, I shall modify my motion so as to substitute for the first Monday in May, the second Monday in April.

Mr. HANNEGAN rose, and being recognized by the Presiding Officer, was about to address the Senate, when

Mr. FOOTE, who had also risen at the same moment, requested the Senator from Indiana to yield the floor for a very few moments.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—If I surrender the floor to my friend from Mississippi, the inevitable result must be, that I will be obliged to yield to every other gentleman who may desire it. It is evident that this debate, if it proceed, will occupy the whole day, and as there is executive business which requires the action of the Senate, I shall be compelled to make the motion, with great reluctance, that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. DICKINSON.—Let the vote be taken on the postponement of the resolution.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—I am sorry that I cannot consent that the debate should proceed, as it is obvious that it will be protracted.

The motion being temporarily withdrawn,

Mr. FOOTE rose and said: I would not, of course, in the circumstances, think of detaining the Senate by any extended remarks; but I do regret that the Senator from Indiana could not deem it consistent with his duty to yield the floor in order to afford me an opportunity of making a few observations on a subject so important in every aspect, as that which has just occupied the attention of Senate, particularly when other members, entertaining views adverse to those which he and I hold, had been heard at length. I wish it to be understood, that in my opinion, the public sentiment of this country on this subject is matured.

The Senator from South Carolina, as I understand, desired a postponement of the resolution, till the public sentiment had been matured.

Mr. CALHOUN.—Not at all. I said that I desired a postponement of the resolution till we had an opportunity of judging whether the movement in France was a subject of congratulation or not.

Mr. FOOTE.—Well, sir, I think that the events which have already occurred fully justify all that is contemplated in the resolution. I believe that the American people have looked to this matter, and understand it perfectly. In my opinion, the enlightened instincts of this free people have already settled the question so far as the great body of the people could settle it. It would be impossible to find anywhere throughout this broad land, an assemblage of the people, in which it would be at all necessary to awaken their interest or inform their understanding by any discussion of the revolution in France. The excellent remarks of the Senator from Illinois render it unnecessary to enter into any argument against the postponement of our action on the resolution offered by the Senator from Ohio; nor would I have said a word on the subject, but for the fact that the organ of a large and respectable party, published in this city, has in the most solemn and formal manner, expressed sentiments hostile to the movements in favor of freedom in France. That organ is supposed to represent the views and sentiments of a large body of American freemen, and having in this imposing manner uttered its denunciatory declaration, the impression is likely to be made on the French people that there are those in the United States who do not sympathize with them in their struggle for liberty. In addition to that a member of this Senate, whose reputation and influence are diffused throughout the world, has not hesitated to express his apprehension as to the result of the present movements in France. Indeed, the Senator from Kentucky has gone so far as to say that every effort hitherto made to establish freedom in France has been a "signal failure." From that opinion I dissent entirely, and at the proper time, I intend to be heard on the subject. I beg the Senator, then, to prepare himself for a friendly contest on that point. I am prepared to show that the march to freedom in France has been steadily onward during the last fifty years—that not a single retrograde movement has been made, so far as the progress of the great principles of liberty is concerned—and that even under the imperial government, these great principles were continually in the advance.

Mr. UNDERWOOD.—I have no doubt that I did use the expression just alluded to by the Senator, but it was too broad, and is liable to a construction which I would not attempt to sustain. I did not intend to convey the idea that no advance had been made in France in regard to the principles of liberty. On the contrary, I am of course aware that great progress has been made in that respect. But my idea was, that all attempts to establish a republican form of government have heretofore been failures.

Mr. FOOTE.—I am glad that an opportunity has been offered the honorable Senator of explaining his language, which was certainly liable to serious misconstruction both here and elsewhere. His explanation, given with characteristic manliness, is satisfactory to me, and must be so to all. I am delighted to find that his sentiments and mine correspond so perfectly. I will not detain the Senate longer. I have risen only to say that I am prepared for action on the resolution. In my opinion we should not hesitate. To doubt is to damn the cause of freedom in France. Our minister, in the noble spirit which becomes an American freeman, and with something of the moral sublime in action, presuming that the American people would not hesitate on such a question, has tendered, in our name, his congratulations to the republic of France. Shall we now be laggard in this good cause? Let us emulate the conduct of Mr. Jefferson, who hailed the French revolutionists of a former day as brothers and patriots at a time when all the European powers denounced them as rebels! I am prepared to sustain our minister, and deprecate the transmission of any intelligence which might indicate the slightest disagreement in this body on the great subject of the liberty of France. Of course I will not now enter at all upon any discussion of the question. I rose simply to protest in the most solemn manner against the sentiments to which I have alluded, and to challenge courteously those who entertain them to courteous moral combat.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—There is a case of individual liberty now pressing us rather more closely than this question of public liberty, which we will have ample time to discuss, and I therefore renew my motion.

The resolution was then passed over informally, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business.

At a late hour, the doors were re-opened, and

FRIDAY, MARCH 31, 1848.

PETITIONS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD presented a memorial of citizens of Christian county, Kentucky, praying an appropriation for the repair of the dam at the head of Cumberland Island, in the Ohio river; which was referred to to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. WESTCOTT presented the memorial of Peter B. Dumas in behalf of the heirs of the Marquis de Fougéres, deceased, praying permission to institute legal proceedings to try the validity of their claim to certain lands in the State of Florida.

Mr. WESTCOTT moved that the memorial be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. ASHLEY observed that he could see no propriety in referring this subject to the Committee on the Judiciary. It was an application relating to a private land claim. To be sure there was a question of law involved in it, but he apprehended it did not belong to that Committee any more than any other private claim. He moved that it be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—I was requested to have the petition referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; but I suppose it is immaterial to which Committee it goes. I shall not therefore object to the motion of the honorable Senator.

The petition was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. DIX presented a memorial of citizens of Rochester, New York, praying an appropriation for the purchase of Mount Vernon by the United States.

Mr. DIX said he had had some doubts as to the proper committee to which this memorial should be referred. As the Committee on Military Affairs, however, had had under consideration the subject of a military asylum, and it might be that the two subjects would be connected, he would move its reference to that committee.

The reference to the Committee on Military Affairs was ordered.

Mr. BRADBURY presented a petition of ship-owners, merchants, and others, of Saco, Maine, praying that an appropriation may be made for repairing the piers in Saco river; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HANNEGAN presented a memorial of citizens of Newburg, Indiana, praying that an appropriation may be made for repairing the dam at the head of Cumberland Island, in the Ohio river; which was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. UNDERWOOD presented the memorial of Nancy Haggard, daughter and heir of William Grymes, late an officer in the revolutionary army, praying the payment of interest on the amount of his seven years' half-pay; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

On motion by Mr. FELCH, it was Ordered, That Henry R. Schoolcraft have leave to withdraw his memorial and papers.

On motion by Mr. MILLER, it was Ordered, That leave be granted to withdraw the petition of the mechanics and laborers in the Navy Yard at Washington.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

On motion, it was

Ordered, That when the Senate adjourn, it be to Monday next.

STEAM EXPLOSIONS.

Mr. WESTCOTT submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Commissioner of Patents be requested to proceed in the examination of applications for Patents for inventions useful for the prevention of steam explosions, according to his office, in preference to other applications for Patents; and that he report whether the powers of such application as he may deem useful to the Senate, with the other information heretofore called for by the Senate from his office on said subject.

COMMERCE, ETC., OF SIBERIA.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, from the Committee on the Library, to whom was referred the resolution granting authority to Mr. Palmer to make certain alterations and additions to the memoir heretofore ordered to be printed, reported the same without amendment, and recommended its passage.

The resolution was considered and agreed to.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. BALDWIN, from the Committee of Claims, to whom were referred the bills from the House of Representatives for the relief of Bent, St. Vrain and Company, and for the relief of J. Throckmorton, reported them without amendment.

CIRCUIT COURT PROCEEDINGS.

Mr. ASHLEY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives to amend the act entitled "An act to regulate proceedings in the Circuit Court of the United States, and for other purposes," passed August 8th 1846, reported it without amendment.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their clerk:

Mr. President: The House of Representatives have passed a bill authorizing a term of the United States' Circuit and District Courts at Chicago, Illinois, and a bill to make Ship Island in the collection district of Pearl river, a port of delivery, and to authorize the appointment of a Surveyor for said port, in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

PATRICK WALKER.

The Senate proceeded to consider the motion made on Monday last, by Mr. BAGBY, to reconsider the vote of the 24th instant, on the passage of the bill granting a pension to Patrick Walker.

Mr. BAGBY had made this motion, he said, at the suggestion of several Senators, who desired a reconsideration in order that some general system applicable to such cases might be adopted by the Senate. He had himself voted with the majority on the passage of the bill, and he had not changed his opinion in regard to it, nor would he change his vote. And he would say further, that whenever a case like that of Patrick Walker was presented to the Senate, if he was here, he would cheerfully give his vote for granting forty dollars a month, or whatever sum might be necessary to provide for his support; for he held it to be the imperative duty of the government to take care of their wounded and disabled soldiers.

Mr. DOWNS said he hoped the vote would not be reconsidered. The bill was one which had been introduced by his colleague who was not now in his seat, and it had passed by a large majority. The only object, as he understood, of the reconsideration was that some general system might be adopted, but he could see no good reason for deferring this bill for that purpose. If a general system should be adopted, which would be applicable to this case, there would be nothing to prevent the case being included and this bill would then be inoperative. In the meantime this man ought not to be allowed to suffer for the want of his pension of which he was greatly in need. He doubted very much whether any general system could apply to a case so extraordinary; perhaps the whole war would not present another case like it.

Mr. BRADBURY.—The unfortunate soldier for whom this bill proposes to grant a pension, is one of my constituents who formerly lived in my vicinity, and I have examined his case and must confess it is one in which I feel much interest. It is a case which addresses itself not only to our sympathy but to our sense of justice. A young man in the prime of life enters the service of his country, and while engaged in battle, bravely sustaining the honor of that country, is, by the misfortunes of war, mutilated and made helpless for life. Both hands are lost, and one arm from the shoulder; he has not the power to contribute to his support, nor even to put on his clothes or help himself to his food. He now asks that country for which he fought, to render him justice; and not turn him over to the cold charities of the world. I hope the motion to reconsider will not prevail, and that this bill will not be delayed for any general law. It is a case that general laws will not be likely to reach; and it is not certain that any general law will be adopted by Congress, nor when, if it should. The passage of this bill will not prevent the adoption of a general system. It only does justice for one who now asks it; and a general law can then precisely as well provide for others whose cases have not been reached by special acts.

Mr. NILES.—The honorable Senator from Maine expressed the hope that Congress will do justice to those who have been disabled in the public service. I concur with him in this view; but I wish to make provision with some degree of equality. Now I do not hesitate to say, that if this case is to be made a precedent for legislating in individual cases, you will have a pension list of at least five millions of dollars. This I understand to be a case of disability which deprives the person of all capacity to support himself by any kind of employment. But there are cases which go beyond mere disability. One of the citizens of my own State, near the close of the last war with Great Britain lost his right arm whilst serving in the honorable capacity of major, and he is, in consequence not only totally disabled, but he has been subjected to much pain and suffering. Well, he, and many hundreds of others, I presume, similarly situated, have been knocking at your doors for thirty years, and have been turned away without having any provision made for them. I wish to do this man justice; and I wish to do justice to all as far as I can, but if each disabled soldier is to receive a pension such as this bill provides, we may make up our minds to have a pension list of at least five millions of dollars. I hope the vote will be reconsidered with a view to amend the bill.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I voted for this bill, but on reflection I have been induced to change my opinion. I understand that the subject has engaged the attention of the Military Committee, and that they are preparing a bill which will cover this and similar cases; and under this view, in order to test the principle whether we shall defer this matter a little, and give that Committee an opportunity to act upon the subject, I move that, for the present, the bill lie upon the table.

PRESIDING OFFICER.—The motion now pending is to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. DAVIS, of Miss.—I will merely remark that I have no objection to the amount to be paid. I am not sure that less would suffice for his comfortable maintenance; and if so much be necessary, so much I am ready, if this system is to be pursued, to vote. But I object to it because it is a special mode of providing for those who are incapacitated so much as not to be able to support themselves; thus holding out a premium to those who solicit in person or through their friends; giving them additional aid which is always withheld from those who are prevented, either by poverty or pride, from making solicitation. I prefer some general measure, such for instance as I proposed a few days ago, for the establishment of a military asylum, where soldiers, war-worn and destitute of friends, may be protected and provided for. This would be monumentum ære perennius to the liberality of the government towards those who have become disabled in the public service. I was much pleased with the remarks of the honorable Senator from New York, when submitting a proposition for the purchase of Mount Vernon. He alluded to the propriety of establishing there an asylum for destitute and disabled soldiers.—What place could be more appropriate than the tomb of the father of his country, for the guardianship of war-worn soldiers? What more fitting place, where they might be gathered together, and where all necessary care might be extended to them? It was with the view of adopting some provision of this nature that I objected to this special enactment. I hope that this bill will be allowed to lie upon the table until the Senate decide whether they will adopt a general system. If they decide against it, then will I be ready at all times to give my vote for granting the most liberal pensions to those who have suffered in the public service.

Mr. BRADBURY.—The passage of the bill will throw no impediment in the way of the adoption of a general law to provide for disabled soldiers. My objection to delay in relation to the passage of this bill is that it is uncertain whether a general system will be adopted, and this individual is so situated that delay is to him a denial of justice. I hope that the bill will be allowed to pass, and that the committee will at the proper time bring forward a measure providing for the establishment of an asylum.

Mr. DAVIS.—The committee has already prepared a bill for for that purpose. The Senator certainly cannot suppose that this case is to stand out and be distinguished above all others of a like nature. If every case is to be provided for by special enactment then there will be no necessity for a general law; but the impropriety of such a course must be apparent to every Senator.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—In reference to the remark of the honorable Senator from Mississippi, that those who make personal application are always provided for whilst others are neglected, I can say in defence of the present applicant that his application arises from stern necessity; it is forced upon him; he has no alternative. He has no means of subsistence, and since he has been here he has been dependent upon the generosity of two distinguished officers of the army who are acquainted with his heroic conduct.

Mr. DAVIS.—I hope the honorable Senator does not attribute to me a want of sympathy with a soldier who is disabled and destitute. If a suffering soldier require pecuniary aid, I will go as far as the Senator himself in rendering aid individually, but I desire that our legislation should be uniform and based upon reason, that there shall be an established system.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—Certainly I have no sort of objection to that. On the contrary, I approve of the proposition, but to await the adoption of such a measure is not the way to rescue this man from suffering. All that I ask is, that an act of justice shall be done to this brave soldier.

Mr. MOOR.—I understand the objection of the honorable Senator from Mississippi to this bill to be that a military asylum is to be provided during this session of Congress, and that special enactments for individual relief, will therefore be unnecessary. But I submit to the honorable Senator, whether it is prudent, to say the least of it, to require a man, whose case is so meritorious as this man's is admitted to be, to await the passage of a general law—an event that is by no means certain? Would it not be more consistent with humanity to grant relief without delay?

Mr. DAVIS.—So far from opposing this claim, I am a member of the committee from which the bill was reported, and gave it my concurrence. I only desire that time shall be given to test the question, whether we will adopt a general system or not.

Mr. MANGUM.—I voted for this bill with a good deal of reluctance. I think that this mode of legislation is exposed to all the objections which have been stated. It seems to me that it would be better to let the appropriation be made for a single year, and in case a general system, which will embrace such cases, be not adopted by Congress, the act for the relief this individual can be renewed. If this be assented to, I will vote for the reconsideration.

Mr. DOWNS asked for the yeas and nays upon the motion to reconsider, but they were not ordered.

The motion to reconsider was then, upon a division, agreed to. Ayes 15—Noes 14.

The question recurring upon the passage of the bill—

Mr. MANGUM, by unanimous consent, moved to amend the bill by striking out the words "during his natural life," and inserting "for the period of one year;" which was agreed to.

Ordered, That the bill be engrossed and read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time.

Resolved, That this bill pass, and that the title thereof be as aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives therein.

THE FRENCH REVOLUTION.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the joint resolution tendering the congratulations of the American to the French people.

The question pending was upon the motion of Mr ALLEN to postpone the further consideration of the resolution to, and make it the special order for, the first Monday in April.

Mr. BALDWIN.—When these resolutions came before the Senate yesterday, I moved to refer them to the Committee on Foreign Relations. Subsequently, after the remarks which were made by the honorable Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] I acquiesced in the motion made by that Senator to lay them on the table. The Senate, however, did not adopt the motion, and it is now proposed by the honorable Senator who moved the resolutions, that a day be specially assigned for their consideration by the Senate. I am opposed, sir, to the assignment at this time of any day for that purpose, because, I am still of opinion, that a reference of the resolutions to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as originally moved, is the proper course to be pursued in regard to them.

The first resolution declares, "that in the name and behalf of the American people, the congratulations of Congress are tendered to the people of France, upon their success in their efforts to consolidate liberty, by embodying its principles in a republican form of government." The second requests the President to transmit the preceding resolution to the American minister at Paris, with instructions to present it to the French government. Personally, sir, as one of the American people, I yield to no Senator in the expression of my sympathy with the great movement which is now going on for the amelioration of the political and social condition of the people of France, and of the other European states. But as a member of this Senate, I am not prepared to act on these resolutions, or to assign a day for that purpose, until I am better satisfied of our right to act in the manner proposed. I want first to be assured, that we are entitled, as Senators—as members of the Congress of the United States, to speak, at all, in the name and behalf of the American people, in a matter relating to the intercourse of this government with a foreign nation. I had supposed, sir, that every thing relating to the foreign intercourse of the people of the United States, pertained in the first instance, to the Executive. I had supposed that in the distribution of powers and duties among the several departments of our government, the people had confided to the President, alone, the trust of speaking in their name and behalf to foreign nations; and to Congress, the trust of legislating for their benefit.

I am aware, sir, that questions may arise in relation to our foreign intercourse, on which it may be proper and expedient that the sentiments of Congress should be declared. But these are cases where legislation is required, to enable the Executive to carry out his views in regard to the foreign intercourse of the nation.

If the President, deeming it his duty to recognize the independence of a foreign government, or to send a minister to a nation with which the United States have before had no diplomatic intercourse, calls on Congress to make provision for the exigency, then, sir, the matter comes up legitimately for discussion before Congress acting in its legislative capacity, in deciding upon the expediency of granting or withholding the appropriation required.

Mr. ALLEN.—I wish to correct an error into which the argument of the honorable Senator seems to imply that he has fallen. It is not the object of this resolution to make a formal recognition of the French government. The French government asks no government in the world for such recognition. It would be an insult to that government to make any such recognition.

Mr. BALDWIN.—So I understand it. Congress is not called on to legislate for any purpose connected with the recognition of the French republic. We are not asked to aid the Executive by an appropriation, to carry into effect any suggestion or purpose of his, in relation to our foreign intercourse. We are called upon by this resolution, to undertake, ourselves, the direction of the foreign intercourse of this government; to declare that we, as the representatives of the American people, are authorized to speak in their name—announce their sentiments—and request the President to direct them to be communicated as such, to the French government, by the American minister at Paris.

Now, sir, I say the American people are able to speak for themselves. They are able to manifest their own sympathies. They are doing it, sir, from one end of the Union to the other; and that is the proper way for the sympathies of the American people to be manifested on this occasion, unless it be done through that organ of the government, whom they have specially intrusted with the duty of conducting their foreign intercourse. When and how have they ever delegated to us the power to speak in their name, in relation to the concerns of a foreign people?

Sir, if we can tender congratulations in the name of the American people to the republicans of France, on the achievement of their liberties, can we not also tender the expression of their regrets, to the down-trodden subjects of other empires, who yet groan beneath the sceptre of a despot? There are many governments with whom we hold diplomatic intercourse, whose institutions are as little accordant with the views and wishes of the American people as those which have just been so signally overthrown, but have they ever authorized Congress to express their disapprobation for those institutions? To what inconsistencies in the action of the government, would not such a course inevitably lead? To what derangement of the system established by the Executive of conducting its foreign intercourse? By what imperfect lights would Congress necessarily be guided in its action, in comparison with the sources of intelligence, which constant and confidential correspondence with our ministers abroad, places at all times at the command of the President?

It appears to me, therefore, to be obviously proper, that the Executive should take the initiative in all such proceedings; and unless he is under the necessity of applying to Congress for an appropriation to enable him to accomplish his purpose, that Congress should confine itself to the legislative duties assigned to it by the constitution. By the second resolution the President is—

"—requested to transmit this resolution to the American minister at Paris, with instructions to present it to the French government."

Is not this, I ask, the first time in the history of this government, that Congress has undertaken to give instructions to the President in regard to our foreign intercourse? If there be any other instance on record, I am not aware of it. I know of no precedent for such a resolution; but I do know that this matter—of the interference of Congress with the appropriate duties of the Executive, has been discussed on more than one occasion, and the sentiments of both houses of Congress expressed against it.

In 1822, President Monroe, by a special message, communicated his own sentiments to Congress in favor of the recognition of the independence of the South American republics, in order, as he suggested, that "should Congress entertain similar sentiments, there may be such cooperation between the two departments of the government as their respective rights and duties may require." What were their respective rights and duties, to which the President referred? The right of the Executive to recognize the existence of foreign governments, and the right of Congress to make, or withhold, the appropriations necessary to enable the Executive to hold intercourse with those governments. When, therefore, Mr. Monroe invited the cooperation of Congress, it became at once a matter of legislation, and, of course, a proper subject for the action of Congress.

The message was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, who reported a resolution "that the House of Representatives concur in the opinion expressed by the President, that the American provinces of Spain which have declared their independence, ought to be recognized by the United States as independent states; and that the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to report a bill appropriating a sum not exceeding 100,000 dollars to enable the President to give due effect to such negotiation." So, too, in 1823, when Mr. Monroe, in his annual message, brought to the notice of Congress the condition of Greece, then just emerging, after a similar struggle, from the cruel despotism to which she had been for centuries subjected, a distinguished Senator from Massachusetts introduced a resolution "that provision ought to be made by law for defraying the expense incident to the appointment of an agent or commissioner to Greece, whenever the President shall deem it expedient to make such appointment." It was treated, sir, as a matter entirely belonging to the Executive, so far as regarded the intercourse between this government and that of the people whose independence it was proposed to recognize.

This, of course, enabled Congress to enter fully into the discussion of its propriety, and, legitimately, to express the sentiments of the American people, so far forth as it became necessary to embody them in the resolution called for by the recommendation of the Executive. Sir, when the bill from the House of Representatives making the appropriation of $100,000 to defray the expenses of missions to the South American republics, was pending before the Senate, a Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH,] proposed an amendment—

"That no money should be drawn from the Treasury for that purpose, until the President should be fully satisfied that such missions would not interrupt the friendly relations of the United States."

But though every Senator knew that the President was desirous of recognizing the independence of those States, the amendment was rejected by a vote of 28 to 9, on the ground that it was trenching on the peculiar office of the Executive. The whole matter was regarded by the Senate as purely an Executive affair, and that Congress had no right to do any thing more than their duty as legislators required. Well, sir, what legislation is needed now? Is there any? Have we not an able minister in France, through whom it will be the duty of the Executive to communicate the sentiments of the American people, in such terms, and at such time, as on his responsibility he shall deem fit? Has not our minister, already, in his official capacity, anticipating the approbation of his government, been among the first to tender his felicitations to the provisional government of France? Have not our citizens who happened to be in France at the time of the revolution, availed themselves of the occasion to tender with enthusiasm their own congratulations? Are not the American people at home, in every part of the country, manifesting their sympathy in a similar manner? Why then should Congress, in this extraordinary manner be called on, at this time, to undertake the office of expounding the sentiments of the American people, when the American people have not sent us here for any such purpose? Sir, except so far as they have confided that duty to the Executive, they have reserved to themselves, individually and collectively, the privilege of speaking their own sentiments, according to their own volition, at their own time, and in such a manner as will approve itself to their own judgment.

Sir, I am for maintaining the responsibility of the separate departments of the government. I would neither interfere with the duties of the Executive, nor suffer the Executive to interfere with the duties of Congress. If each department of the government confines itself to the proper discharge of the functions committed to it by the American people, we shall go on harmoniously and regularly, and the voice of the people will be authoritatively declared whenever, and in whatever form, the occasion may require it to be uttered. But, if Congress is to be made the arena for the discussion, with a view to their promulgation, of any sentiments, no matter what, which any member may think proper to propose, in regard to the concerns of a foreign government or people, can we fail to perceive the dangerous consequences to which it will inevitably lead? When the bill making provision for the Panama mission was pending, this question, sir, attracted the attention of both houses of Congress. An amendment was proposed by a member of the House of Representatives, from the State of Delaware, limiting the power of the Executive in regard to the nature and extent of the diplomatic intercourse contemplated by the bill, between the government of the United States and the Congress of Panama. The amendment was at first sustained by a majority of the House, but was afterwards rejected, expressly on the ground that it would be an assumption by Congress of a power which the people had confided to the President alone. A distinguished member of the House from Massachusetts declared, after the amendment was adopted, that he should vote against the bill, "because it introduced one of the most dangerous innovations that had ever been attempted." What was that innovation? Simply, sir, an attempt on the part of Congress to instruct the Executive in the performance of his duty in regard to the foreign intercourse of the government.

Regarding, as I do, the resolutions on your table as liable, in an eminent degree, to the same objections, I am neither prepared at this time to give them my support, nor even to assign a day for their consideration. I do not believe it to be our province to speak for the American people in this matter. I believe they are competent to speak much more effectively themselves, than we can speak for them; and that the voice of the people, in the warm language of their own hearts, embodied in their own resolutions, will be much more acceptable to the people of France, than any cold declarations in their name by the Congress of the United States, whom they never authorized to speak in their behalf.

But, Mr. President, if I was satisfied that it was proper for Congress to speak in the name of the American people, on this subject I entirely concur with the Senator from South Carolina in the opinion that the time has not arrived in which we can, with propriety, adopt the sentiment embodied in these resolutions. The resolutions declare, if I understand their true meaning, that the people of France have succeeded in their efforts to consolidate liberty, by embodying its principles in a republican constitution. Sir, they are only making, now, the first effort to accomplish this purpose. The government of France is not in the hands of those who have been elected by the people. It is either self-constituted or it derives its power from the spontaneous movement of the people of Paris, with whom the revolution commenced. The provisional government is taking its first measures, for obtaining a full representation of the French people in a convention, to lay the foundation for the establishment and maintenance of constitutional liberty. Have they accomplished it? Is liberty consolidated, in the language of the resolution? I do not like the word, sir. It is rather too much in the style of the Holy Alliance to suit my taste. I remember in the famous declaration of their policy, sent out to the world by the allied monarchs, they spoke of it as the only means of "consolidating human institutions and remedying their imperfections." I should prefer some other word, of less equivocal import. I had much rather see liberty diffused through France, to the utmost limits of the realm, than consolidated in the hands of a Parisian regency. It sounds too much like the consolidation of power that centralizes here. And I think, sir, that the Congress of the United States would be much better employed in taking measures to prevent that consolidation of power which is so rapidly going on within the precincts of this capitol, by means of the enormous increase of Executive patronage, than in undertaking to conduct, unasked, the foreign intercourse of the American people.

But, sir, if we are to speak at all in their name, I should prefer that the resolutions be committed to the Committee on Foreign Relations, that they may consider whether the language used is such as the people would approve. I hope, therefore, that the motion for the special assignment of a day for their consideration will not prevail.

Mr. DOWNS.—I was a good deal surprised that there should be any debate at all in this body upon a question on which the people every where are so unanimous; and I must confess that my astonishment has been increased in consequence of the assumption of the leading position presented in the remarks of the gentleman who has just resumed his seat. If this were a question out of which any political capital could possibly be made—if it could be regarded at all in that light, I should certainly congratulate myself and the party to which I have the honor to belong, that the President of the United States had received such substantial aid from an ally so unexpected. A large portion of the time which has elapsed since the assembling of the present Congress, has been occupied in denunciations of the unauthorized exercise of power on the part of the President of the United States. It has been repeatedly alledged that he has transcended the limits of constitutional authority; but the discovery appears to have been just now made that the Executive is the sole depository of any power at all in regard to our foreign relations. I am rejoiced at this remarkable change of sentiment in quarters to which we had not certainly any reason to look for support; and I may surely be permitted to express the hope that whenever a question arises hereafter, either bearing on the Mexican war, or any other question of public policy, with regard to the constitutional powers of the President, it will be admitted on all hands that he has some duties to perform, and some degree of authority to exercise.

For myself, sir, I am really unable to perceive the grounds of distinction which the gentleman from Connecticut has assumed in reference to the action of Congress and the Executive on the question now before us. I cannot see any valid objection to the expression of opinion on the part of Congress. The gentleman indeed asserts that the people did not send us here to tender our congratulations to the French; and that we have not had an opportunity of ascertaining the sentiments of our constituents upon the subject.

Mr. BALDWIN.—I did not object on the ground that we did not know the sentiments of our constituents; but that they had not confided to us the power of speaking in their behalf.

Mr. DOWNS.—I may have misconceived the gentleman, then, in some degree; but I have correctly represented the main ground of his objection to the passage of this resolution. I was about to say in reply that it might be possible that the gentleman had some doubt as to the sentiments of his constituents, but that I could have no hesitation as to those of mine. This is the last question in the world in reference to which I shall deem it necessary to consult my constituents. As for myself, I feel strongly on this subject. It is a natural feeling. What American is there who does not cherish a lively and grateful recollection of the sympathy which we received from France in our own hour of trial? From the period of our revolution the two nations have been united by the tenderest ties of grateful regard. But in the State which I have the honor in part to represent, there are peculiar reasons which operate in producing sympathy with France. The other members of this body represent constituencies almost entirely American. Perhaps fully one-half of the people of my State are French. It is their native language. The actors in this remarkable revolution are of their own blood. They have friends and relatives amongst them. Hence it is that amongst my constituents the feeling of attachment and sympathy is overwhelming. I should then be false to every principle of duty were I to remain silent, and await an expression of the opinion of my State before I gave expression to my feelings on this subject.

The gentleman contends that precedents are against the course which is now proposed; but the cases to which we have been referred in support of that view are not analogous. The government of France is not a new one. It is only a change of administration. I am not familiar with the details of the cases cited by the gentleman, but my general recollection is that in the case of the States of South America, the resolution was introduced by a democratic member from Kentucky, in this very form. I presume, however, that the gentleman will not deny that either branch of Congress may express its sentiments on a question of this kind. There may, indeed, be cases in which the action of the House might not be proper: but in reference to the Senate alone, there is a strong argument in favor of its action, when a doubt might exist as to the propriety of action on the part of the House. The Senate possesses certain Executive powers. It is true, that in questions connected with our foreign relations, the President takes the initiative, but I do not know that that is absolutely necessary. Again, the Senate represents sovereign States—many of which are far more important than a dozen of the petty principalities of Europe.

I hope that the resolution will not be postponed. This expression of sympathy and respect to be of any value, ought to be made promptly, spontaneously, without doubt or hesitation. If we can not give France a hearty greeting, let the resolution be put down at once. Let the thing be done properly, or not at all.

Mr. HANNEGAN here suggested that it was necessary to proceed to Executive business.

Mr. DOWNS yielded, expressing the design of adding a few remarks when the subject should again be before the Senate.

The resolution was then, by unanimous consent, passed over informally.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion by Mr. HANNEGAN, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business, and after sometime spent therein,

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, APRIL 3, 1848.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. CASS presented the proceedings of a meeting of wounded soldiers, who served during the last war with Great Britain, and in the present war with Mexico, held at Watervliet, New York, praying an increase of the present rate of pension allowed to soldiers losing their limbs by wounds r ceived in battle, which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, presented a memorial of citizens of the United States, praying that an appropriation may be made for the purchase of Mount Vernon, by the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. DIX presented the memorial of Horace Southmayd and Son, merchants in New York, praying the reimbursement of certain duties levied on a cargo of goods shipped by them to the port of Tampico in Mexico; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Also, a memorial of physicians and apothecaries in the District of Columbia, praying the adoption of measures for preventing the importation of spurious and adulterated drugs and medicines; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WESTCOTT presented a memorial of the County Commissioners of Hillsborough county, Florida, praying the confirmation of the location of their county seat and a grant of land for the erection of a court-house and jail; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

PUBLIC LANDS IN FLORIDA.

Mr. WESTCOTT submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the commissioner of the General Land Office be directed to report to the Senate, as soon as practicable, an abstract or list of all permits granted under the acts for the adjustment of Florida claims, specifying in different columns the number and date of each permit, names of settlers, designation of land, number of notice, date, person to whom permit was delivered, whether head of family or single man; whether land designated was surveyed and when, and if so its designation by the survey, and the cases and dates when reported as in pursuit; and the reasons therefor; and when and to whom lands included in permits have been sold by the United States; and in what cases settlers have availed themselves of the amendatory act of 1844; and also copies of all instructions for the execution of said laws by the General Land Office; and, also, to report whether, in his opinion, any additional legislation is proper to effect the object of said laws.

THE WYANDOTTS AND DELAWARES.

Mr. ATCHISON, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of the chiefs and delegation of the Wyandott Nation of Indians, reported a joint resolution to sanction an agreement made between the Wyandotts and Delawares for the purchase of certain lands, by the former, of the latter tribe of Indians; which was read and passed to the second reading.

MICHAEL HOGAN, DECEASED.

Mr. WESTCOTT, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of William Hogan, administrator of Michael Hogan, deceased, reported the same without amendment; and also submitted a report on the subject, which was ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The following message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. WALKER, his secretary:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I communicate to Congress, for their information, a copy of a despatch, with the accompanying documents, received at the Department of State, from the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States at Paris, giving official information of the overthrow of the French monarchy, and the establishment in its stead of a "provisional government, based on republican principles."

This great event has occurred suddenly, and was accomplished almost without bloodshed. The world has seldom witnessed a more interesting or sublime spectacle than the peaceful rising of the French people, resolved to secure for themselves enlarged liberty, and conscious in the majesty of their strength, the great truth, that in the enlightened age, man is capable of governing himself.

The prompt recognition of the new government, by the representative of the United States at the French court, meets my full and unqualified approbation, and he has been authorized, in a suitable manner, to make known this fact to the constituted authorities of the French republic.

Called upon to act upon a sudden emergency, which could not have been anticipated by his instructions, he judged rightly of our feelings and sentiments if his government and of his countrymen when, on all occasions throughout his diplomatic intercourse with other countries, he was the first to recognize, so far as it was in his power, the freee government established by the French people.

The policy of the United States has ever been that of non-intervention in the domestic affairs of other countries, leaving to each to establish the form of government of its own choice.

While this wise policy will be maintained towards France, now suddenly transformed from a monarchy into a republic, all our sympathies are naturally enlisted on the side of a great people who, imitating our example, have resolved to be free. That such sympathy should exist on the part of the people of the United States with the friends of free government in every part of the world, and especially in France, is not remarkable. We can never forget that France was our early friend in our severest revolution, and generously aided us in shaking off a foreign yoke, and becoming a free and independent people.

We have enjoyed the blessings of our system of well regulated government for near three fourths of a century, and can properly appreciate its value. Our ardent and sincere congratulations are extended to the patriotic people of France, upon their noble and thus far successful, efforts to found for their future government liberal institutions similar to our own.

It is not doubted that, under the benign influence of free institutions, the enlightened statesmen of republican France will find it to be for her true interest and permanent glory to cultivate with the United States the most liberal principles of international intercourse and commercial reciprocity, whereby the happiness and prosperity of both nations will be promoted.

JAMES K. POLK.

Washington, April 3d, 1848.

The message having been read—

Mr. HANNEGAN moved that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and be printed.

Mr. ALLEN.—I will ask if there is any necessity for the reference of the message to a committee, as there is no action asked for.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—It is, I believe the usual and more respectful course.

Mr. ALLEN.—I only desire to say that I do not wish a reference of the subject in this form to interfere with the action of the Senate upon the resolution which I have submitted. I have no particular desire regarding this reference, further than that the action of the Senate upon the resolution shall not be delayed on that account.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—The object is certainly not to delay the action of the Senate upon the resolution of the Senator from Ohio.

The message was then referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their clerk:

Mr. President: The President of the United States has officially notified the House of Representatives that he has approved and signed the bill to authorize a loan not to exceed the sum of sixteen millions of dollars.

The House of Representatives have passed the bill of the Senate granting a pension to Ruth Allen.

They have also passed a bill for the relief of Jacob Gideon, and a bill for the relief of Thomas Scott, register of the land office at Chilicothe, in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The Speaker of the House of Representatives having signed an enrolled bill, I am directed to bring it to the Senate for the signature of their President.

THE FRENCH REVOLUTION.

Mr. ALLEN moved that the prior orders be postponed, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution tendering the congratulations of the American to the French people.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—I am very anxious that this resolution shall be acted on, but there is an order of the day relating to a bill of much public consequence, which I think may be disposed of without much occupation of our time. I mean the bill for the reorganization of the Supreme Court, which was reported some days ago. The subject embraced in this resolution is one which may occupy a good deal of time in its discussion, we cannot tell how much. It is certainly a very grave subject, and it will necessarily be debated at much length. I am anxious that the bill to which I have referred, shall not be delayed until the discussion of this subject is concluded, which may not be until a considerable time has elapsed. I therefore must insist upon proceeding with the special order of the day.

Mr. ALLEN.—The bill which has been named by the Senator, will undoubtedly, give rise to a lengthy discussion; to a discussion which will extend through more than one day, perhaps through many days. I do not think that the resolution which I submitted will give rise to a very long discussion. So far as I am concerned notwithstanding the great desire which I have to speak somewhat at large upon the subject, I will waive that privilege rather than be instrumental in postponing, by opening a general discussion, the action of the Senate upon this resolution. I believe that the action of the Senate upon the resolution can be had to night, and the whole matter finally disposed of. I shall not delay the action of the Senate by any set speech, nor am I aware that there is a disposition on this side of the chamber, to make very long or elaborate speeches on the subject, and I cannot help, sir, in this connexion calling the attention of the Senate to one fact, letting that fact carry with it its own argument without any commentary of mine—a fact to justify by precedent, the resolution which I have submitted; and to justify by precedent likewise the speedy action of the Senate. I will read from the journal of the House of Representatives very briefly, and then I will simply ask the Senate to decide upon the motion. On the 10th day of February, 1820, Mr.

Clay submitted in the House of Representatives this resolution upon which the proceedings, which I will read from the journal were had.

Mr. CLAY submitted the following resolution, viz:

Resolved, That the House of Representatives participates with the people of the United States in the deep interest which they feel for the success of the Spanish provinces of South America, which are struggling to establish their liberty and independence; and that it will give its constitutional support to the President of the United States, whenever he may deem it expedient to recognize the sovereignty and independence of any of the said provinces.

The said resolution was read; when

Mr. WOOD moved that it lie on the table, which, being negatived,

Mr. ARCHER, of Maryland, called for a division of the question; and the same being stated to agree to the first member thereof, ending with the word independence—

Mr. WOOD moved that the said resolution be postponed indefinitely.

And, the question being taken thereon,

It was determined in the negative.

Mr. FOOT then moved that the said resolution lie on the table, which motion was also negatived: when,

Mr. WOOD moved to amend the same, by adding thereto the following proviso:—Provided nothing in this resolution is intended, nor shall be construed, to have any influence upon the independent exercise of the treaty making power by the President and Senate.

And, the question being taken to agree to the said proviso,

It was determined in the negative.

The question was then taken on agreeing to the said first member of the resolution,

And passed in the affirmative, yeas 134, nays 12.

Mr. MACLAY then moved to amend the second member of the said resolution, by prefixing the following: "That it approves of the course heretofore pursued by the President of the United States with regard to the said provinces."

And, the question being taken thereon,

It was determined in the negative.

The question was then taken to agree to the second member of the said resolution, to wit: from the word and, after the word independence, to the end thereof,

And passed in the affirmative, yeas 82, nays 66.

Mr. CLAY, and Mr. ALLEN of New York, were appointed a committee to present the said resolution to the President of the United States.

And then the House adjourned.

This was the nature of the proceedings in regard to the resolution which expressed the sympathy of Congress in connection with the sympathy of the people. There were one hundred and thirty-four votes in the affirmative, and but twelve in the negative, and the whole proceeding was accomplished on the same day they were submitted. I will ask for the yeas and nays on my motion to postpone the prior order of the day, and proceed with the consideration of this resolution.

Mr. BAGBY.—When these resolutions were under discussion on a former day I voted to lay them on the table. In giving that vote I desired not to be understood as wanting sympathy with the people of France in the mighty efforts they have recently made to improve their political condition by the overthrow of monarchy and the establishment of a republican form of government in its stead. I yield to no one in attachment to republican principles—not even to my friend from Ohio—and no one admits more cheerfully than I do that Senator's devotion to republican government and the principles of political liberty. I voted to lay the resolution on the table, because I took it for granted from the moment I heard of the great movement in Paris, that our minister at that point would, as early as practicable, send an official despatch to the government of the United States, and that that would be communicated to the Senate. In this expectation, sir, I have not been disappointed. The President has received such a despatch and has just communicated it to the Senate. I approve fully of the course pursued by the American minister, and entirely concur in the liberal and enlightened feeling of sympathy expressed in the President's message. These documents have been referred, properly referred, to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and will form a proper basis for whatever action the Senate may think proper to take in regard to the French revolution. I think that the resolution brought forward by the honorable Senator from Ohio ought to take the same course. It appears to me that this would be more respectful to the people and to the governments of both countries. Sir, in matters of such vast concern to the interests and happiness of mankind as the establishment of governments, something more is necessary than feeling hearts and undoubting confidence. It is a case in which, above all others, we should be guided by the calm lights of truth, reason, caution, and mature deliberation. Impassioned declamation on the part is necessary to stimulate the French people to revolution. That mighty event has been accomplished. It remains to be seen what are to be the fruits of it. If I was certain that I saw in the great movement that has lately taken place, the uprising of the sun of liberty, ascending in majesty and grandeur to its meridian height, and there imparting light and heat, and the blessings of constitutional regulated freedom, based upon true republican principles, to the people of France, I should indeed rejoice with inexpressible joy. If, on the other hand, it was but the lightning's flash and the thunder's roar which preceded that tremendous series of events, which on a former occasion swept like a tornado not only over France, but over continental Europe, carrying the miseries and the horrors of war, havoc and bloodshed in its desolating course and ending in absolute military despotism, it can prove no source of rejoicing with me. I sympathize deeply and sincerely with the people of France, but I have my doubts and misgivings. I hope for the best. Under every aspect of the case I am anxious that the subject shall undergo the investigation of a committee, and that they shall express in a temperate, statesman-like manner, the sympathies and views of the Senate and those of the American people. I have listened with great pleasure to the views expressed by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] and however widely I may have differed from the Senator on other questions, I avail myself of the occasion to say that his views in relation to this meet my entire concurrence and approbation, and are, if the Senator will permit me to say, highly creditable to his enlarged experience in public affairs, and worthy of the high rank he holds as a statesman, not only in the estimation of his own countrymen, but throughout the civilized world. I shall be compelled, sir, unless these resolutions are taken up in order to be referred to a committee, to vote against the motion.

Mr. DICKINSON.—I rise for the purpose of suggesting that the question is not debatable in its present form. The reason why I make the objection is, that the Senator from Louisiana the other day while debating this resolution upon its merits, gave way to other business, and it is not only depriving that Senator of the privilege to which he is entitled, but reversing the whole order of business to proceed as we are now doing.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—I wish merely to inquire whether a motion to postpone the order of the day for the purpose of taking up a particular subject is a debatable question.

PRESIDING OFFICER.—It is the opinion of the chair that it is.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—Well, when I offered that motion, and moved to amend it by substituting another subject for consideration, is not my motion equally debatable, and have we not the two subjects open for debate? If the gentleman can give reasons for taking up the subject which he proposes, may I not also give reasons for taking up another, and thus support my ground of opposition to his motion by showing the necessity for prompt action on the subject which has been made the very order, which has been proposed to be dispensed with? The bill to which I allude had passed the House of Representatives previous to the adjournment of the Supreme Court, and anticipating its passage through the Senate also, the court adjourned to meet again on the first Monday in May, provided the bill should become a law. It is actually necessary, therefore, if the bill is to be acted upon at all, that it should be acted upon in time to give notice to those having business before that court. If its passage be delayed it will defeat the very object and purpose of the bill as effectually as if it were voted down. And this I cannot think Senators will be willing to do, when they understand the necessity for the passage of such a bill. I do not propose now to offer the remarks which I design, and hope to have an opportunity to offer, before the resolution of sympathy is finally acted upon. I am in favor of that resolution, and I do not wish an inference to be drawn from my opposition to its present consideration, that I do not concur in it with all my heart. Still there is time for that expression of sympathy, and there is time for doing the business which is pressing upon us also.

Mr. BUTLER expressed his desire that the bill referred to by the Senator from Kentucky should be proceeded with. If the bill was to be acted upon at all it ought to be taken up now.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, remarked that he had received letters of inquiries in regard to what disposition had been made of this bill. He believed that courts were about to be held in several of the Circuits of the United States, and it was highly important that the passage of the bill should not be delayed.

Mr. BENTON.—I believe, sir, we have a rule, which rule is applicable also to the proceedings in the Supreme Court—that unfinished business shall be entitled to preference. It is also the rule of common sense. A bill was in progress last week relating to a matter of great importance, which bill was deferred for reasons which the Senate can well comprehend; its progress was interrupted by a matter of exigency, and those who had charge of the bill yielding to that exigency consented that the bill should be temporarily passed by, with the expectation that the moment that subject was disposed of the consideration of the bill would be resumed. This was my understanding, sir. That particular subject is not yet disposed of, and I wish, therefore, that instead of beginning with any matter the Senate would now go into Executive session and complete the business before it in that capacity, then resume the consideration of the California bill, and when that is done we may go on with any thing else that may be proposed.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—I will state to the Senator that the individual on trial is now under habeas corpus.

Mr. CASS.—The Senate will recollect that some days since I gave notice that I would call up the bill for raising an additional volunteer force as soon as the bill which was then in the hands of the chairman of the Committee on Finance, should be passed. That bill has passed. At that time there were reasons urged by the honorable Senator from Missouri, for bringing forward this California bill. I yielded to those reasons, and immediately thereafter the question regarding the French revolution came up, and that being a great question I gave way to that also. It appeared to me that the testimonial proposed to be given by this country to France, to be worth any thing depended on two considerations—promptitude and unanimity. I did hope that we should have both. It is now certain, however, that one will be wanting if not the other. As far as respects myself I shall feel bound to insist that the bill from the Military Committee shall not be superseded by any other business, and I trust the Senate will pardon me from pressing its immediate consideration.

Mr. DOWNS.—I am aware that there are several bills pressing upon the Senate; but I hold it to be important as was suggested by the honorable Senator from Michigan, that if we act at all in relation to the subject of the resolution, our action should be speedy; whatever we do should be promptly done. I am willing therefore, although I took but little part in the discussion of the subject when it was before the Senate the other day, to forego the privilege of offering any remarks, and hope that by common consent the vote may be taken.

Mr. DAYTON.—I should hope with due deference to the wishes of the Senator from Kentucky, that the bill in reference to the Supreme Court will not now be taken up, inasmuch as one of the gentlemen of the Committee who takes a particular interest in the bill is not present. It will be recollected in what manner the bill passed from the committee into the hands of the Senate, that it was by a majority only; and I know that if it be taken up it will not lead to a short discussion. This I know not only from what took place when the bill was before the Committee, but from communication with members on both sides of this chamber, who are opposed to the passage of the bill. If it be taken up I question whether we shall see the end of the discussion to-day, or even to-morrow. There is, it seems to me, one obvious reason why the unfinished business before the Senate should be disposed of, so far as the resolution from the Senator of Ohio is concerned. I understood from him some days since, that he had no intention to press it to an immediate vote, that he was willing to postpone it until some future day, or to refer it to the Committee on Foreign Relations. If this be so, may we not make some such disposition of the question, and when it shall return upon our hands again, say what we have to say upon it, and in the mean time dispose of the other business that is before the Senate?

Mr. ALLEN.—All business that has been introduced into the Senate, and is not perfected, is the unfinished business in the usual sense of the term; but the only unfinished business in the strict sense of the term, is the resolution. It is the very business that the Senate had in hand, and which was passed informally by when the Senate on Friday went into Executive session. Now with regard to the day, I did seek with the utmost solicitude to find out the day which would best accommodate the Senate. I named one which was not the day however, which I first had in my mind, it was far more remote than I would have named, but for the sake of gratifying gentlemen who proposed it, I acceded to their wishes. But after naming that day finding that it was as much objected to as any other, I fell back upon the original period. Now we have had the subject several days under discussion, and can complete it this day if we take it in hand. I will offer no obstacle to its completion this day, I will make no speech upon it if gentlemen will take it up—so far as I am concerned it may be voted on in five minutes. I ask for the yeas and nays on the resolution.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—As I am but little skilled in the rules of this house, having as long as I have been here confided implicitly in the Presiding Officer, I wish to know if the special order of the day may not be called for by the chair as the proper subject for consideration?

PRESIDING OFFICER.—Certainly, if there be no other business in progress before the Senate.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—There is no other business in progress. There is a motion to postpone the order of the day, and to proceed to the consideration of other business. I conceive that the case of the special order for which I have called is one of great exigency, far more pressing and momentous in its demand upon our immediate attention than is the other business presented, and now being urged upon the Senate for consideration. Sir, delay will defeat this bill effectually. I wonder how Senators can take any other view of it. I am for giving both of the measures pressing upon us for consideration a prompt and immediate attention; but as this bill is one of the greatest consequence to the administration of justice in the whole Union, I hope it will not be postponed. I will say, however, in relation to this resolution, that I think it is due to the subject, at least, to commit it. I have not examined its phraseology myself, and have no other confidence in its fitness than that which arises from my knowledge of the capacities of the gentleman who drew it up. It may be all correct, but I think it is best that we should act prudently and cautiously in the matter, and that it should undergo the revision of a committee. The greatness of the subject, and character of the relations existing between the two nations demand such consideration. I have seen a disposition to delay evinced since it was brought up for consideration, and I had resolved in my own mind to have shortly made an effort for a compromise in order to an early consideration. In going to a committee I would desire it to be speedily reported upon. It may be that something should be added to these resolutions. I think that they are susceptible of improvement by additional resolutions. If we stand in an attitude as a republic to address the French nation, our experience and advice to them as the oldest and strongest republic in the world will not, I think, be regarded as officious or superfluous. For one, I believe it is indispensable to the permanence of the French republic, that her departments should be divided into States, and that she should have State institutions, as well as a national convention or assembly to govern the whole republic. Might we not without making ourselves in some form or other offensive, insinuate some idea of this sort, the carrying out of which would greatly increase confidence in her stability as a republic. Again, instead of placing her seat of government in a great city, liable to be suddenly agitated by tumults, following the advice of Washington, might we not recommend to her the locating of her capital in some quiet and sequestered spot similar to that in which our own capital at present reposes? Would not such action on her part establish greater confidence in the minds of other nations as to the permanancy of her republican form of government? But whether we can venture to make a suggestion of this kind, is a matter for the Senate to determine.

Mr. ASHLEY.—It will be recollected that when this bill was reported back to the Senate it was reported by a majority only of the committee and that there was a protest against it by the minority of the committee. I have no particular preference at what time it shall be taken up. I am desirous, however, that when it is taken up it shall receive a full discussion. I believe it is the most important measure that has been presented to the consideration of the Senate this session. It proposes to materially change the whole judiciary system, as I think, permanently—though it purports upon its face to be but a temporary change—and is the entering wedge to an entire change of that system. I shall object, therefore, to its being taken up for consideration until we can devote a sufficient time to the consideration of its provisions, as well as of all the amendments that may be offered. I will observe further, that the minority of the committee instructed me when the bill came up to offer an amendment. That amendment failed. Since that time I have learned that in another portion of the capitol a system has been introduced which has received unanimous concurrence. I should have been glad of an opportunity to have examined that measure before we act up on this. If we take up the bill now we can hardly expect to go into a full discussion while this other subject is pending, and gentlemen are anxious to engage in this discussion. I hope, therefore, that it will be postponed. I do not agree with the Senator from Kentucky that there is so great a necessity for immediate action. If we pass the bill some ten or fifteen days hence there will be abundant time for notice to reach all parts of the United States at what time the Supreme Court will hold its session.

Mr. DAYTON.—I desire to say emphatically that I am in favor of the passage of this bill, and that I shall vote for taking it up at the very earliest opportunity. Since I expressed a desire that the bill might not now be taken up in the absence of a member of the committee, I find that he is either here or will be here immediately, and therefore the only reason for which I desired its postponement being removed, I shall cordially unite in the effort to bring it before the Senate.

Mr. NILES.—I consider it entirely irregular to proceed in this way by taking a particular bill and giving it preference over all the other business before the body. I hope that on this proposition we shall not be governed in any degree by what has been said in reference to other measures, I was under the impression that the Senator from Ohio desired to take up his resolution for the purpose of fixing a day for its consideration. But if I understand him now, he proposes to take it up for the action of the Senate at this time. I am not prepared this, and if that be the object I shall vote against the motion. I am satisfied that this subject has not received that consideration which its importance demands. It strikes me that the resolution is not expressed in the best form. I do not know what is meant by "consolidation of liberty." But without going at all into this matter, but merely regarding the form of the resolution, and the form of that which has been referred to, as an example, I would say that the House of Representatives in that case were speaking for themselves only. I think that when one government addresses another, too much care cannot be taken in regard to accuracy. I concur with the remark of the Senator from Michigan that if this expression of the feelings of the American people is to be of any avail, it is desirable that it should be expressed with great unanimity, but I do not think there is any necessity for being in haste. Expressions of this kind should come from the people themselves; they do not come well from us. Our action should be deliberate—the result of the well settled judgment of this body. I shall not go further into this matter. I think in regard to the motion, it should be considered without reference to any other subject than that to which it refers.

The question being about to be put, the yeas and nays were again demanded, and they were ordered.

Mr. BAGBY.—I will with great pleasure vote for taking up the resolution, with the understanding that it is to be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, or, if the Senator prefer it, to a select committee.

Mr. ALLEN.—The question pending when the Senate went into Executive session on Friday, was to make this resolution the order of the day for this day. There were propositions to amend that motion by the substitution of another day. The object which I have in making the motion that I have made to-day, is, to take up the resolution and to proceed immediately to its consideration, without reference to a committee and without naming another day.

The yeas and nays were then taken with the following result:

NAYS—Messrs. Bagby, Baldwin, Bell, Benton, Berrien, Butler, Calhoun, Clarke, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, of Massachusetts, Greene, Johnson of Maryland, Mangum, Miller, Niles, Pearce, Phelps, Spruance, Turney, Underwood, Upham—22

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. HANNEGAN proposed that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Executive business.

Mr. CRITTENDEN opposed the motion, and moved that the Senate proceed to consider the special order, being the bill to which he had before alluded.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—I will suggest to the honorable Senator from Kentucky that there are very pressing reasons for having an Executive session.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—I cannot conceive that there is any more pressing business than the consideration of the bill which I have named. I hope that the Senator, therefore, will withdraw his motion in order to give me an opportunity to take that bill up.

Mr. CASS.—What will be the effect of that motion? Will it be to give preference to that subject over all others?

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—That is the very object of my motion.

Mr. CASS.—I trust it will not be agreed to.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—Let the Senate decide.

Mr. CASS.—The speedy consideration of the bill relating to the California claims is, in my apprehension, still more important than that of the bill to which the Senator referred.

Mr. BENTON.—I am very unwilling, sir, to be pertinacious before the Senate, but here is a bill for appropriations which is entitled, by all the forms of proceeding observed in legislative bodies, to precedence. It is a bill containing appropriations which ought to have been included in the general appropriation bill. It is a subject of that nature which is of itself entitled to precedence; but independently of that, it was delayed only for the purpose of permitting the loan bill to be proceeded with, after the passage of which, the consideration of this bill, it was understood, was to be resumed. It gave way to a matter of exigency which subsequently arose; but when I came here this morning it was with the expectation that it should be no longer deferred. Now, it is proposed that a subject which has engaged the attention of Congress at times for fifty years be taken up; that is to say, whether the Supreme Court of the United States shall be cut loose from the States? That is the question which comes up upon the bill, the consideration of which is urged by the Senator from Kentucky. Shall the Supreme Court be cut loose from the States, and the judges of that court be settled here for life, and become a permanent central and supreme power? That question has been decided at times after the fullest debate. As often as the question was presented fully, it has been decided that it should not be done. There is certainly a great amount of time on the docket of that court; but are you to make the docket less by preventing the judges from going into the circuits to hold courts? You cannot do it. I admit that the pressure of business upon the court is an evil which will require a remedy; but there is one thing I never will admit, that a proper change of the system can be made hastily. I am against all legislation that is done under the cry of "now or never." We have now the stimulating argument addressed to us that the Supreme Court has adjourned to meet in May, and that we must therefore act now upon this subject; and I presume act affirmatively upon it. Now, this is forcing us to perform an immense work in legislation upon something like the cry of "now or never." A subject which has at times engaged the deliberate attention of the two houses of Congress, is now to be acted upon at once, under the argument that it is rendered necessary by a proceeding of the Supreme Court. I am unwilling to go into a subject of this magnitude with the view of acting thus hastily; besides, I do not regard this measure as a remedy for the evil. I hope that the bill will not be taken up until a more proper time; and that it will then be proceeded with deliberately, without any stimulant for action on the part of the Senate, other than the desire to provide a remedy for the existing evil.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—I am very sorry that the honorable Senator has thought it necessary to oppose this motion, which is merely a motion to take up the bill for consideration; and upon this motion the Senator makes his speech regarding the merits of the bill. The bill has been reported to us by a committee of this body, with a recommendation that it be passed.

PRESIDING OFFICER.—The pending motion is to proceed to the consideration of Executive business.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—The Senator from Indiana is willing, I believe, to withdraw that motion for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of the bill which I have mentioned, which is the present order.

PRESIDING OFFICER.—The California bill is the prior special order.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—I do not know that. It is unfinished business to be sure, so is the resolution of the Senator from Ohio. But I move to take up this bill in whatever form the motion may be most appropriately pronounced. The Senator from Missouri has supposed that this bill presents the great question whether this court shall be cut off and separated from the States entirely, reducing the States to the character of provinces, and establishing a permanent and central power. But, sir, the whole object of the bill is to provide for an exigency growing out of an accumulation of business before that court. Something must be done to get rid of this mass of business, which prevents cases from being heard for two or three years after being docketed. How is this to be done? Unless you provide some way of disposing of this accumulation of business, the evil will increase every day, and it will be as injurious in its effects as the evil which the honorable Senator seems to dread so much.

The motion to proceed to the consideration of Executive business was then agreed to.

After some time occupied in Executive business, the doors were opened, and

The Senate adjourned.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their clerk:

Mr. President: I am directed to notify the Senate of the death of the Honorable JAMES A. BLACK, a member of the House from the State of South Carolina; and of the proceedings of the House taken thereon.

DEATH OF THE HON. JAMES A. BLACK.

The resolutions from the House of Representatives having been read—

Mr. BUTLER rose and addressed the Senate as follows: The death which has just been communicated by the resolutions from the House of Representatives is an event well calculated to arrest attention and inspire serious reflection. This is the fourth death that has occurred among us during this session—a period of four months—and the ninth occasion upon which we have been called on to go in mourning for the loss of a member belonging to the 30th Congress. These are circumstances that are giving to our session a melancholy celebrity.

My late colleague, the Hon. JAMES AUGUSTUS BLACK, was seized on the 16th of the last month with a violent congestive chill, which terminated in an obstinate and incurable pneumonia, of which he died at his lodgings, in this city, last night, at twenty five minutes after eleven o'clock. Before he was taken ill he had the prospect of many days before him. With a robust constitution, he was in the enjoyment of vigorous health, neither of which had been impaired by previous disease. His last sickness was violent, painful, and protracted, but it was borne with a sustaining fortitude worthy of a man and a Christian.

Our departed friend was born of respectable parents in Abbeville district, South Carolina, and at the time of his death he was in the 57th year of his age. The deceased entered the army in 1812, at the age of eighteen, with the commission of lieutenant, and was promoted to the grade of captain before the close of the war.

Captain BLACK had not, I believe, any opportunity of distinction on the field of battle. But he left the service with the reputation of an excellent officer, having made a strong and favorable impression on the minds of his associates and military comrades. His keen sagacity, penetrating observation of men, his prompt judgment and untiring industry, associated with cordiality and frankness of manner, were qualities that well fitted him for military command. Upon one occasion, whilst he was stationed near St. Mary's, the intrepidity of his benevolence and courage was put to a test called for by a signal exertion to save life. By one of those sudden floods which occur in that part of the country, the bridges, causeways, and houses were submerged and swept away, destroying many lives and property. Captain BLACK, with much peril to himself, found a gentleman, then a young midshipman, now a captain in the navy, insensible and exhausted, floating on the wreck of a vessel. This gentleman, on hearing of the illness of Mr. BLACK, repaired to his bedside, and, inspired by the utmost delicacy of gratitude and friendship, ministered to his wants with the tenderness almost of a woman.

On the close of the war Captain BLACK retired to private life, and engaged in business with characteristic energy and industry. Prior to his election as member of Congress he filled several situations of trust and responsibility. He possessed in an eminent degree the self-reliance of a self-made man; with the peculiarities of deportment and character that made him a popular favorite. From the period of his return to the 28th Congress others have enjoyed better opportunities than myself of forming an estimate of his popular career. But the deep and even affectionate anxiety manifested during his illness, and the profound sensation which his death occasioned amongst those who were particularly associated with him, are honorable commentaries upon his private virtues and his public worth.

At an early period, Mr. BLACK became a disciple of the old republican doctrines, and he ever afterwards maintained them with unflinching firmness and uniform consistency. He has been sustained during his public career by the unshaken confidence of an intelligent, numerous, and wealthy constituency.

A few days before he died he gave expression to his unshrinking faith in the hopes and consolations of the Christian religion. He retained throughout his painful illness the possession of his mental faculties, and one remark which he made is worthy of record, as it affords at once matter of consolation and admonition. He said that a death-bed was not the place to prepare for death, and that he had not deferred till the last moment the solemn considerations connected with his spiritual welfare. He professed a confident adherence to the Christian faith, and expressed the hope that, through its efficacy, he should enjoy a happy existence hereafter! A few days before his death I approached his bedside, and endeavored to cheer and encourage him. "This is indeed a great trial," he said, "but I will try and meet it as becomes a Carolinian!" Afterwards he said, "I have only one request to make: let my bones rest in the soil of my native land!"

This is not a fitting occasion on which to speak of the domestic relations of my departed colleague. Into that sacred private circle in which the virtues of the husband and the father were displayed, it is not for us to enter. It is consolatory that his wife, son, and brother reached his dying bed in time to receive an affectionate recognition; and that he left this earthly scene with a firm hope of happiness beyond the grave, leaving behind him an unsullied name, and the reputation of a good and upright man.

Mr. BUTLER submitted the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Senate has received with deep sensibility the message from the House of Representatives announcing the death of the Honorable JAMES A. BLACK, a Representative from the State of South Carolina.

Resolved, That in token of respect for the memory of the deceased, the Senate will attend his funeral at the hour appointed by the House of Representatives, and will wear the usual badge of mourning for thirty days.

Resolved, That as a further testimony of respect for the memory of the deceased, the Senate do now adjourn.

Whereupon,

The Senate adjourned.

CONGRATULATIONS TO THE FRENCH.

Mr. HANNEGAN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the message of the President of the United States of the 3d instant, reported a joint resolution tendering the congratulations of the United States to the people of France; which was read and passed to the second reading.

MR. ALLEN'S RESOLUTION.

Mr. ALLEN moved that the prior orders be postponed and that the Senate resume the consideration of the joint resolution tendering the congratulations of the American to the French people.

Mr. FOOTE.—A reason was given the other day against the adoption of this resolution, but whether it was intended to be a philological reason, or a critical reason, I am not able to say.

Mr. HALE.—I rise to a question of order. The motion is to postpone the prior order for the purpose of taking up something else. I understood from the Presiding Officer the other day that such a motion was not debatable.

Mr. FOOTE.—It is not my intention to make any extended remarks, but merely to respond very briefly to an objection which has been raised to the phraseology of this resolution, and to show that it is precisely the phraseology which ought to be used.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—If the Senator will allow me, I will remark that I believe there will be no objection to proceeding to the consideration of all these resolutions together, and then the question will be open for the Senator's remarks.

Mr. FOOTE.—I only desire to say a single word.

The PRESIDING OFFICER.—There is a question of order now before the chair.

Mr. FOOTE.—I ask the decision of the chair upon that question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER.—The decision of the chair was entirely different from that which the Senator from New Hampshire supposed. It is entirely in order to debate the motion to postpone the orders of the day.

Mr. HALE.—I so understood the chair, and from that decision I take an appeal.

Mr. MANGUM.—I hope the Senator will withdraw the appeal. A motion to take up from the table, a subject which has been laid there by a vote of the Senate is not debatable, but a motion to postpone the orders of the day is debatable.

Mr. HALE withdrew the appeal.

The question being about to be put on Mr. ALLEN's motion,

Mr. FOOTE said: I design to occupy only a moment of the time of the Senate, for I do not suppose, that at this stage of the matter, I should be heard in extenso with any degree of patience by the Senate. The Senator from Connecticut the other day objected to the phraseology of the resolution—he objected to the phrase consolidation of liberty in a written constitution. I thought at that time, and think still, that it is the very best language that could be adopted. I believe that the resolution was carefully prepared, and that it has been drawn up in scholastic style, is clear in its phraseology, and expresses precisely what it should express. I considered the phraseology to be simply in accordance with the French idiom; and I regarded it, therefore, as the more suitable compliment to the French government, and was entirely in favor of preserving it unaltered. Since that time I have obtained a work, which, by the way, I commend to the attention of Senators; it is the last work of Lamartine, who is known to all of us as the ablest man perhaps of the age in which he lives, the orator, the poet, the scholar, and the statesman. In this work I find a passage in which the very term to which exception has been taken is employed; and I beg to read one or two sentences: "La nation ayant en soi l'inaliénable souveraineté qui repose dans la raison, dans le droit et dans la volonté de chacun des citoyens dont la collection fait le peuple, avait certes la faculté de modifier la forme extérieure de sa souveraineté, de niveler son aristocratie, de déposséder son église, d'abaisser ou même de supprimer son trône pour régner elle-même par ses propres magistratures. Or, du moment que la nation avait le droit de combattre et de s'affanchir, elle avait le droit de surveiller et de CONSOLIDER les resultats de sa victoire."

Here, sir, we find that this very word "consolidate" is used by Lamartine in the same connexion as that in which it has been employed by the Senator from Ohio. I trust, then, that it will not now be considered, that there is the slightest impropriety in the use which has been made of this word in the resolution.

One more word, sir, and I have done. I believe that gentlemen have taken exception to the language of the resolution without due consideration. We have heard so much apprehension expressed about centralizing government, that they imagined there might be something in this phraseology which favored the idea of consolidating power in a central government. But it gentlemen will look back, and examine the history of our own government, they will find that the word was first used, I believe, by Washington himself, in a sense somewhat different to be sure, when he spoke of "a consolidation of the Union." It is a Washingtonian phrase. I say, with all deference, I am chiefly regardful of what has occurred in France, chiefly disposed to approve of what has taken place, because I see that instead of permitting the liberties of the people to float upon the waves of popular feeling, they are for imitating our example, and consolidating them, in the language of the resolution, in a written form of government.

Mr. MANGUM.—I was about to remark, when I begged the Senator from New Hampshire to withdraw his appeal, in order to make myself clearly understood, that although there may be debate upon a motion to postpone prior orders, and take up a particular subject yet that such a motion did not admit of debating the principles contained either in the measure proposed when taken up, or in those that ought to be postponed for that purpose. Everything on your calender has to be taken up in its course, and nothing lies upon the table except by a vote of the Senate, and when a subject is placed upon the table by such vote, the motion to take it up is not debatable.

The yeas and nays on the motion having been demanded were ordered.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—I do not know what use there is for taking the yeas and nays. I know of no opposition to the motion. I have been prevailed on, in consideration of the great desire of gentlemen, and for their accommodation, to permit that which is the special order to be passed by, that the resolution of the Senator from Ohio may be taken up and disposed of.

Mr. ALLEN.—If there is to be no contest about it, I do not care about having the yeas and nays. I will therefore withdraw the call.

The question being then put, upon the motion to postpone the prior orders and proceed to the consideration of the resolution, it was agreed to.

Mr. ALLEN.—I shall not trouble the Senate with any extended remarks upon this resolution———

Mr HANNEGAN.—Will the honorable Senator allow me a moment? I included in my motion—when I renewed the motion of the Senator to take up this resolution—the additional proposition to consider at the same time the resolutions reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MANGUM.—The motion then is to substitute the resolutions reported from the Committee for the resolution of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. ALLEN.—There is no motion of that sort yet.

Mr. MANGUM.—I make that motion, then; to strike out all the original resolution, together with the amendment, and substitute those reported from the committee.

Mr. ALLEN.—That is a double motion. It is capable of a division, and I shall ask a division of it. So far as it supersedes the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire it is one thing, and so far as it supersedes the body of the resolution it is another. I shall ask for a division of the question. On this question I barely wish to remark that in the brevity and simplicity of the resolution which I offered, I was governed by a desire to do what I supposed would become one nation speaking to another,to employ brief, emphatic, general, and unequivocal language, to avoid all detail, and to make the resolution expressive of a general feeling in favor of a general principle. In drawing up the resolution I sought to find language to accomplish that object. I sought to find language which I believed to be the most proper, most dignified, and most respectful—when one nation was speaking to another nation—without going into detail or giving any reason for what we did, except the great reason of popular liberty. I knew, sir, that any attempt to go into detail would involve the discussion of all the parts and principles of the French constitution. One Senator wants to commend the French for having taken action with regard to its Colonial dependencies. Another Senator might wish to commend the French for having expressed, in the form of a decree of their government, their will with regard to foreign powers. Another Senator might desire to compliment them more particularly for some decree relative to the internal regulations of France itself; and so on, as each one of the various acts or decrees of the temporary government of France happen to strike the mind of each Senator. Each Senator would like to express himself when you enter into the business of detail; and thus we would have to make a resolution to comprehend every act of the French government in detail in order to gratify the peculiar predilections of every Senator. In order to avoid all these things, and in order to give to this resolution the brevity which struck me as most compatible with the true dignity of one nation speaking as a nation to another nation; for that reason, I say, I submitted the resolution in a single sentence. Every one will perceive, in attempting to go into detail, the unbounded and unnumbered difficulties that would instantly present themselves. To go into detail, we give a reason by the very detail for what we do, and to give a reason for each particular idea proposed. is to make us become rather advisers than congratulators of the French people. I thought it more respectful to the French people and government that we should make a general tender of the congratulations of the American people to the French people for what they have done in its great aggregate, using no words except one general phrase, to express the general love of liberty entertained in this country, and the general hope of the American people that it may be consolidated in France. The only possibility then, of getting a resolution, it seems to me, which would accomplish the great object which all seem to have in view, that of expressing fully and entirely the unanimous feeling of the Senate—the only possibility of getting such a resolution, is to take one that employs general language and avoid every expression of this vast and complicated subject in the various details. I shall therefore, myself, considering the resolution which I submitted for its directness, its plainness, and its brevity—vote against the passage of this amendment.

Mr. NILES.—The objection which has been urged to the resolution of the Senator from Ohio, and which was commented on by the Senator from Mississippi, is a matter of mere verbal criticism. think that the resolution is objectionable in substance. It assumes a state of things which does not exist It goes altogether beyond any information which we have on the subject of the present position of France. It proposes to tender in the name of the people of this country, congratulations to the people of France.—For what? Why, for the success of their efforts in consolidating liberty. Well, this phrase consolidation of liberty, must mean something. I suppose it must mean for the success of their efforts in providing safe guarantees of liberty, without which, liberty cannot be preserved. It must mean this, or something to this effect. Now what information have we on the subject? Why instead of having provided these guarantees, they have done nothing towards the organization of a government in any form. We have information that an existing government has been overthrown, and a temporary or provisional government constituted government, set up in its place. What have been the circumstances under which this provisional government came into existence? It had no legal sanction except the face of circumstances. The only sanction that government had, is the supposed acquiescence of the people of France. I will admit, although the officers of the provisional government seemed to have been constituted by a mere handful of men, who happened to be present in the Chamber, yet I will admit, that the nation so far as we can infer, seemed to have acquiesced and given a sanction to this government, but in what light is it to be regarded? It is a mere temporary government springing out of the exigency of circumstances, and this resolution therefore, goes altogether beyond the real state of things, and undertakes to express the approbation of this nation, for the success of the French, in establishing a free government, a thing which we know they have not as yet done. We all hope that such a result will follow, but can we now speak to this people, tender our congratulations for their success, when nothing has been done? I think the resolution goes altogether too far. I think the resolution is essentially defective in substance, to say nothing of the language, because it goes greatly beyond the facts.

Mr. DICKINSON.—I am not only desirous to congratulate France upon recent interesting events as proposed by the resolutions of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. ALLEN,] but also to congratulate the Senate and the country upon the healthy progress of opinion here within the last few days. No longer since than Monday last, there was an effort to take up the resolutions, which was resisted and defeated upon the ground, amongst others, that they were premature; but now, without any change of circumstances whatever, they have been taken up by common consent, and notwithstanding the opposition indicated heretofore by several Senators, and this morning by the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. NILES,] I anticipate their passage by very great, if not entire unanimity. When asked what France has yet done to justify the congratulations of this government, I answer that she has solved a great and interesting problem in human government. America demonstrated to the world that man was capable of self-government, but France has established another great fact, scarcely less important to the oppressed people of Europe, that the force of opinion is mightier than armed men, and that monarchy can be overthrown and deprived of its ill-gotten power by social convulsion. What, we are asked, has France done? Peaceably and unarmed, by the omnipotence of opinion, her people have broken down one of the most powerful monarchies of modern times with all its concomitant enormities and abuses, and have removed every obstacle between thirty-five millions of king oppressed people and liberty. If this is not an achievement worthy of congratulation, I cannot imagine what would be.

The late "citizen king" attained his position by professions of great regard for the rights and interests of the people of France. and although for a time he did not openly throw off all pretence of regard for popular rights, the last ten years of his despotic reign have been characterized by avarice, tyranny and usurpation, and every act that can disgrace even a monarch. In the pursuit of his schemes of ambition and aggrandizement. he had practically limited the right of suffrage to about two hundred thousand of his thirty-five millions of people—those elegible to the popular branch of the national legislature, were few in number, and nearly one half of the late Chamber of Deputies, the nominal representatives of the people, were office-holders under, and in the pay of the executive government. The public debt, and the burdens of taxation had been doubled in a time of profound peace, excepting the Algeria war, which was kept on foot as the out-let for the turbulent and disaffected, and doubled too, in raising and equipping armies, and erecting fortifications, to overawe the people of France, and force them into subjection. The liberty of the press and of speech have been abridged from time to time, to suit the Royal wishes, until in attempting to prescribe the number of citizens who might meet at a public dinner, and frankly discuss the measures of government, he was deposed and driven from his palaces and gardens, and too, like our common progenitor for his sins, forever, and like him, his return guarded by the sword of liberty. The history of his downfall, flight, and humiliation, is ful of interest and instruction. The ablest, proudest sovereign—the wealthiest individual upon earth, seated upon the throne of one of the most powerful monarchies in christendom, sustained by an able ministry, and backed by a standing army of four hundred thousand men, completely armed and equipped, with frowning fortresses commanding every part of the city of Paris, is overthrown and flies from a betrayed and outraged people, literally when none pursues him, in fulfilment of the proverb. His throne is burned to ashes, and scattered to the four winds of heaven, and he a homeless, houseless fugitive, from town to town, from house to house—cold, pennyless, and starving—half clad in borrowed garments, in a miserable fishing boat, seeks refuge in the land of the great rival, and hereditary hater of his race and nation! Sad, but becoming termination of a career black with treachery, perfidy and ingratitude! The image of his predecessor Charles the X. seemed to haunt his imagination, and in his flight he is said to have ever and anon exclaimed—"like Charles the X." But he had not the apology of that weak and imbecile monarch, the tool of a designing ministry. to plead in extenuation of his tyrannous reign, for the citizen king was a sensible and practical man, who gave himself, tone and complexion to his administration, and was capable of estimating truly the consequences which must flow from it. But he was blinded by selfishness and passion, and hastened with his own hand, the ruin of his household. Like the insane, when reason flickers up for a moment with the last pulsations of life, this mad monarch as he was about to leave his native land forever, was blessed with a ray of returning sense, and in words of truthful, interesting import, said to a friend—"I join the Republic frankly and sincerely, for I carry with me the French monarchy, and I shall descend with it to the tomb. I have been the last King of France."

Thus have the people of France thrown off a powerful, corrupt and tyrannous reign, and trodden down every barrier between themselves and civil liberty. Thus have they driven into exile the instruments who have enslaved and oppressed them. Thus much have they already achieved for the cause of oppressed humanity. The future is full of hope, and none can doubt of the ultimate success of this brave and chivalrous people. But if we knew they would again be reduced to the vassalage under which they have so long struggled, and that Louis Phillipe himself would be again placed upon the throne, and they be subjected to his arbitrary sway, they would be none the less entitled to our congratulations for the great and good work they have already accomplished—for the mighty advance they have made in proclaiming to the world freedom of opinion and the rights of man. They have spoken in a voice and language that has already been heard throughout Europe—inculcating the doctrines of liberty and equality—that has brought the oppressed and plundered masses to their feet, with joyous expectation, and has caused corrupt and stultified monarchy to feel its thrones rocking and the earth trembling beneath it.—They have caused industry to hope that it may yet partake of the bread it has earned; and labor, that while it should toil for those whom Providence has taught to look to it for sustenance, no laws, human or divine, can justly require it to support an indolent and beggarly aristocracy, armed and willing to enforce obedience.—Ireland has already caught up the sound, and is looking forward with renewed hope to her hour of emancipation. Austria is ringing with shouts of liberty from Hungary and the Bohemian hills—throughout Italy, Germany, and even in England herself, under pretence of giving, terrified and dismayed monarchy is restoring to man rights which were wrested from him during physical ages.—If there are no precedents for such congratulations, we can easily make one; and we should by all means do so, for the signs of the times clearly indicate that at no distant day, if not during the present session, our congratulations may be extended to other lands than France, upon a like occasion. Let us then congratulate this great nation upon an event so auspicious in her history, and leave future events to the future. If it is said the French people are too impetuous for a republic, it may be answered they are too impetuous for monarchy They have tried every other form of government unsuccessfully, and now, in erecting a republic, if they but copy our federative system—the great secret of our strength—the expectations of the most sanguine must be realized. France in 1798 and 1848 are as unlike as two different nations. In '98, too, our government was an experiment; the little cloud which promised to refresh and fertilize the earth was then no bigger than a man's hand; now its highest hopes and anticipations have been realized, and its blessings have been co-extensive with civilization. France, in an especial manner, has profited by the lessons of wisdom we have taught her, and is prepared to follow our example. She has been thus far eminently successful, and I would extend her congratulations cordially and unanimously, at the earliest moment, and in the most pointed and significant phrase.

Mr. HALE.—I rise to make a few remarks in reference to a suggestion which seems to meet general favor, that the French people have not yet done enough to merit our congratulations; and that we must wait with a cold, calculating, mathematical philosophy, till we see every thing settled and perfected—till we have seen that the seeds of liberty have germinated, spread out their branches, blossomed, and borne fruit before we can thank God and congratulate the people of France for any thing that has been done. These, sir, are not my sentiments. This policy is not in accordance with my convictions or feelings. Nor would this conduct be in accordance with the motives which generally govern human action. When parental love first looks upon the young infant, does it refrain from thanking God till the child has grown to manhood? Does the mother's heart refuse its thanksgivings for her offspring till the infant has become a man? No! Though but the hour after its birth it should be consigned to the grave, yet would parental fondness thank God for the bright vision that had dawned upon it, only to bless it but for a moment. And if the fires of liberty which the French people have lighted up were this moment to go out in darkness—if the next steamer that comes across the Atlantic should carry the tidings that the beacon lights which had been lighted on the continent of Europe had been extinguished forever, yet would I thank God from the bottom of my heart, and congratulate the people of France that they had made that effort to be free! Whether successful or unsuccessful—whether crowned with triumph or not, I rejoice in the present efforts of the French people, and hail the spirit that has given them birth.

But, if the French people had done nothing more than has been stated by the Senator from New York, I confess that they would have had no congratulations from me. When I saw the Senator from New York, representing such a constituency as that which sent him here, rise to tell us what the people of France had done, I thought we should hear something worthy of the congratulations of freemen. But what is the great feat which he represents them as having accomplished? Why, that they had dethroned their King, and driven him a houseless wanderer in borrowed vestments, to the shores of his hereditary foemen! Sir, is not history full of examples of a people goaded by oppression, driven by desperation, making energetic efforts to throw off the yoke of their oppressor, only that they might become the more willing victims of another despot? Is there any cause for congratulating France in that alone? Not at all. If the expulsion of a King is all that they have accomplished, they shall have no congratulations of mine. They did that much before. They expelled Charles the Tenth, and put Louis Phillippe in his room. If they stopped here, it would ill become the American people to offer their congratulations. Have the people of France done nothing more? Have they merely stripped the king of his royal robes and clothed him in borrowed garments? Oh! no. They have done something more than that. They have proclaimed great principles which lie at the foundation of all human freedom, and by the energy and promptitude of their action they have given assurance to the world that they are sincere in their purposes and in the declarations which they have put forth. They have declared the great principle of universal suffrage. The aristocracy of two hundred and forty thousand, which ruled the destinies of France, have been stripped of their monopoly of authority, and every man is now a voter and a citizen. The chamber of nobles is struck out of existence. All titles are abolished. More than that, they have not stopped to measure their ideas of personal, social, civil and religious liberty by the hues of a man's complexion! In the language inscribed upon the bell which stands in the tower of the building where the foundations of American liberty were laid, they have proclaimed "liberty throughout all the land and to all the inhabitants thereof." Compared to that achievement the expulsion of an hundred kings is but as the small dust of the balance. Who cares whether Louis Phillippe landed upon the shores of England clothed in his royal vestments or with the borrowed habiliments of a fisherman? What matters it to humanity —to liberty—to human progress that such are the fortunes of the fallen King?

In the history of nations, as of individuals, there are crises.—There is a moral Rubicon, as well as a physical one, to which we may advance, and there hesitate, and deliberate, then either crossing boldly or receding in dismay. The people of France have come to that perilous and interesting crisis; and if my voice could be heard by the French people, I would mingle with my congratulations a note of warning. I would tell them that if they would be true to themselves—to the hopes of the world—to the destiny of the untold millions that are to follow in their footsteps in succeeding ages, I would say to them, see to it that you seal your fidelity with your blood before you compromise with the spirit of liberty! Let them make no compromise; but let them make clear work of it, and vindicate not only their fidelity, but their consistency, carrying out in its true meaning, its full force and in its energetic life, the great principles of the doctrines which they have declared. I have sometimes thought, in dwelling upon the history of this republic; and it has been the common talk of the world that in this land was the last hope of freedom—that when the eye of science had revealed in the solitude of the ocean, the continent to which the Pilgrims of New England repaired, that they might here, removed from the temptations, oppressions and luxuries of the old world, erect the sacred temple of liberty, if the effort failed here, it failed forever;—that I had seen indications fearful and fatal, that we were departing from the faith of our fathers, that instead of being true to the first principles of human liberty which we have proclaimed, that we were cutting loose from them, and entering upon the adventurous experiment of a foreign and aggressive war, not for the purpose of promoting liberty, but of extending and perpetuating the institution of human slavery. As I contemplated these things the conviction seemed to force itself upon me that the indications of our success were faint and feeble; that the illustration which we were about to give of the capability of man for self government, was to be the same as that of other nations which had gone before us; and that after our failure the hopes of freedom would indeed be extinguished forever. But in the dawning of this revolution in France, I behold the sun of hope again arise, his beams of golden light streaming along the eastern horizon. I am now inspired by the hope that even if we fail here—that even if liberty should be driven from this her chosen asylum, the divine principle would still live and would find a sanctuary among the people of another land—that when our history should have been written, and our tale told, with its sad moral of our faithlessness to liberty, boasting of our love of freedom while we listened unmoved to the clanking of chains and the wail of the bondmen—even, then, in a continent of the old world light would be seen arising out of darkness, life out of death, and hope out of despair!

I trust that whether these sentiments are to be embodied in the resolution or not, that it will be acknowledged that enough has been done and more than enough to call forth the earnest sincere, heartfelt congratulations of every American.

Mr. BUTLER then rose and was recognized by the chair, but yielded to

Mr. HANNEGAN, who said: Inasmuch as I am placed in a peculiar relation to the question now before the body, I shall accept the floor from the gentleman who has so courteously yielded it, promising to return it to him with Jew's interest hereafter, whenever the opportunity may fortunately occur. I will not detain the Senate by entering into any details of the events which we have all read in the newspapers with regard to the events that have recently transpired in France. It is enough to refer the Senator from Connecticut to those details as furnishing an answer to the objection that nothing has been done to warrant congratulations from America to France.

Mr. NILES.—The Senator entirely misunderstood me. I said that the resolution of the Senator from Ohio went beyond any thing that had been done.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—I am happy to hear the explanation of the Senator, although I still differ with him in his construction of the resolution. The Senator from New Hampshire expressed the hope that the French people might be enabled to persevere even unto the shedding of blood. To that I respond, if it be necessary! But I fervently trust in God, that not one drop of human blood may flow in this great revolution.

Mr. HALE.—I said that I desired the French people might be faithful unto death.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—That of course implies the shedding of blood. But I trust no neck will be brought to the block—that no human misery, but that unmingled human happiness may flow from this great movement.

And now, sir, it is due to the Senator from Ohio and myself that I should make a brief explanation. When the message of the President was communicated to us on Monday last, it was, on my motion, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and I then stated to the Senate that it was not my intention to interfere with his resolution. I will carry out my purpose in that respect; for although as the organ of the Committee, I reported the resolutions which have been read this morning, and although I prefer them as they go farther in expressing my views, yet I will never place myself in a position in which I can, for an instant, be suspected of public or private treachery. I suggested to the Senator from Ohio, in the morning on which he introduced his resolution, that he had better do it at once. I then committed myself to his resolution, and I shall carry out the committal by any vote which I may be called on to give. The resolutions of the Committee on Foreign Relations, indeed, express the same sentiments and feelings as the resolution of the Senator from Ohio, and entirely accord with resolutions which have been prepared by other Senators, amongst them my friend from New York, [Mr. DIX.] They all embody public sentiment and no more. All convey nothing more than what fell from the lips, and came fresh and warm from the hearts of every day-laborer around your capitol grounds, as he exchanged congratulations, and shook hands with his associate, on the intelligence of these glorious events. My friend from Ohio, however, with characteristic boldness—leading, as he always leads worthily, when the great principles of human liberty are at stake—came forward the moment that the tidings reached us and gave notice of his intention to introduce such a resolution. As the originator then of this procedure, to him belongs the credit, let the details be what they may of the action of which the Senate may adopt. And here I may, without impropriety, remark that, to the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. MANGUM,] is chiefly due the credit of the resolutions reported from the committee. His valuable suggestions in the committee room, reduced my share of their preparation to little more than that of drafting them. But this is of little consequence either to him or to myself. Neither of us seek the "bubble reputation" which is to be gained at the point of a resolution. He, I know, is above it, and I trust I am.

The Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. BALDWIN,] remarked the other day that there were no precedents for this procedure. I think that if he will look back to the period of the first revolution in France he will there discover a precedent in the conduct of Washington himself. When Louis the XVI, communicated to General Washington, then President of the United States, the fact that he had signed the constitution dictated to him by the National Assembly, and that he had given to the French people an extension of the elective franchise and other privileges before unknown, Washington, in a brief message, announced the intelligence to Congress, and it was responded to in separate resolutions by the two Houses, which were transmitted by the President to the King of France. When, at a later period on the establishment of a republic, before the downfall of Robespierre and Marat, we refrained from transmitting congratulatory resolutions; the reason, as will be found in the recollection of Senators, was that we were then in imminent danger of collision with France.

Mr. BALDWIN.—Will the Senator allow me to inquire whether there be any precedent of a joint resolution of the two Houses of Congress, in the name of the American people requesting the President to transmit the resolution to a foreign government?

Mr. HANNEGAN.—I know of no instance of a joint resolution, but the separate resolutions to which I have alluded were of the same import. But I frankly confess, that I dislike the word "precedent," when we are engaged in legislating on such a subject as this! The reason why no precedent has been presented is, that the event itself is without precedent! I have indeed heard objections urged in high quarters. The distinguished Senator from South Carolina has expressed his opinion that we had better defer our action. These and other objections made to the immediate action of the Senate upon these resolutions, I have weighed, as I feel they deserve, with the utmost seriousness. At one time I was inclined—and so expressed myself to the Senator, my friend from Ohio—to postpone action until we should hear of the actual meeting of the national assembly; but all my subsequent reflection tends to the conclusion that we should at once and without hesitation tender to the new republic of France our congratulations. For the life of me I cannot see any evil result in the step. No man will contend against it as an act of interference with the affairs of others, an act that in its remotest consequences can lead to our entanglement in European difficulties. It has ever been the custom of nations to exchange congratulations upon momentous occasions and fortunate results.

In the history of man there has occurred no more signal event than the recent French revolution. It is marked all over, at every step, from first to last, from the highest to the humblest actor, by a moral grandeur that finds its only prototype in the conduct of our own Heaven-guided ancestors. When revolts occur in kingdoms—when man, lashed to phrenzy by all the woes of oppression, rises but to strike a single blow, and fall from the ignominious scaffold to the uncounted grave—when the chains of the oppressor are thus riveted tighter and tighter—when humanity and liberty have been laid together in a common grave—then monarchs have often exchanged congratulations.

At this hour, when emancipated France—emancipated without a crime, without a stain—extends her new-born hand, and from her cradle lifts her smiling front, gazing at us, shall we pause—coldly pause—and give back the look with marble features? or shall we return the smile, and with our heartfelt salutation cheer her to the richer than golden harvest? If there was any thing in these resolutions contrary to the usages of nations, any principle at war with the proprieties of international communication, I should feel bound from this high place to hesitate and weigh every contingent result. But I am unable to discover the rule or the reason against a national salutation from the matron government of republican America to the infant government of republican France. It is in the name of our people that we send the greeting. It is in obedience to the high behests of the ever active, the hundred-eyed genius of our institutions. We send to a recognized government—recognized by all the foreign officials in France, so far as I can learn. Our own minister led the way. I trembled when the first news came, lest he should hang back waiting an example. But I am happy to think he has discharged his duty, he went foremost, and if he had not better for him, far better, that he should never again put his foot upon his native land.

Why shall we not, as representatives of our country and her institutions, salute those who are struggling to imitate us? Monarch can salute monarch, even upon the birth of an infant heir to unlimited despotism, shall we falter in a salutation to the presence of rational liberty. I know the doubt, the fearful doubt, that exists in many of the greatest minds, even some of the most honored fathers that surround me; and I know, too, from conversation on all sides, as well as I can learn, that doubt can only be expressed by the word solicitude—the deep, deep solicitude with which maternal love watches the first steps of the idolized boy. Will he stumble? will he fall? The fine turned limbs, the flashing eye, forbid the thought. He will walk, and walk to noble and vigorous manhood. This feeling inspires some misgivings, not in the purity of intention which discloses this great struggle, but in the detail which is to seal the result. Her national assembly is, perhaps, too numerous; one-fifth the number would have represented all the departments all the interests of the French people, and avoided the dangers of faction and tumult. But I can feel no doubt of the issue; the descendents of the consecrated Gironde, united with the schools Polytechnique, supported by the press and the intelligence France will avoid the terrible obstacle of the Mountain and the Jacobin on their way to regulated, constitutional liberty.

I trust with abiding confidence in the moderation, the wisdom, the public virtue, the intellect of France. I rest as seated on a rock, upon the steady patriotism of the French people, in sustaining those great intellects who lead the way, pointing to the high destiny of France with all the sublimity of faith, all the fervor of the seer. I dread no rising cloud which my friend from Alabama, [MR BAGBY,] pictured the other day; I will not fear the baleful cloud of anarchy, lighted from every verge by concentric fires, and sweeping on the tempest wings to blast with its thunderbolts the new sprung hopes of freedom and mankind. Perish the thought, the prospect shall be lighted only by the lambent fire of exultant hope!

At this hour the spirit of freedom is on foot in lands and amongst people, where its faintest sighs have been unheard for centuries. Italy, the school boy's theme, the land of his golden dreams—the of old liberty loving German, of Cæsar and Tacitus, are again warmed by the celestial flame, Europe is rocked by a moral earthquake. Every successive throe discloses some new breathing place for the subterranean fire, which long suppressed is bursting with more than volcanic power into the light and the approving presence of God.

Sir, our example has done all this. The oppressed and famine stricken of the old world, have annually flocked by thousands for refuge to us, the only resting place for overtasked humanity. They have drank of the cup, which never exhausts, they have fed at the board, whose necromantic supplies are spread with more than "Bacchanal profusion." They have bowed at the altar of their own God unquestioned, and listened to the ministrations of his priest undisturbed. They have walked by day, and slept by night in security, the rude latch their only guard, and no proud emissary of oppression to wither by his tread, the green sward before their humble door. They have found a home

> "Where gods might love to dwell
> And wander with delight
> Or sit amid its sacred shades."

All this they have written, ship load after ship load, to those they have left behind; and thus the silent and invisible power of the Almighty has brought the masses to the aid of the master spirits, that from their closets have so long invoked the blessings of freedom. But perhaps I wander. I will only add that my vote shall be given with heartfelt pleasure at once for these or any similar resolutions, and I trust that the vote may be taken this day, so that the intelligence may be conveyed to France in the Cambria, which sails on Saturday next. I am not prepared however, to stop at this. When the National Assembly, which is to convene on the 20th of April, shall have closed its deliberations by giving to France a constitution after our own model, I would go farther. I would send a solemn embassage; its members composed of the snow-crowned and most honored servants of our republic, those who have given the energy of long life to liberty and their country, and whose mellow but all radiant light still rests upon the theatre of action. I would send such an embassy in the name, and with the spirit of our people, to fraternise with the descendants of those who shed their blood for our freedom.

Mr. ALLEN.—The course of the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations has been just and generous with regard to this resolution and the individual who originally submitted it. But just and generous as that course has been, it has not been more so than all who are personally acquainted with that Senator were prepared to expect. He has said that I was entitled to the honor of originating this movement. Before I appropriate that compliment to myself, it is just that I should say that in submitting that resolution I did no more than I am fully aware many other Senators proposed to do, and it was but a mere accident which gave mine the priority. It so happened—and that will explain the reason why I chanced to submit the resolution—that on the 20th day of March, a discussion was in progress in the Senate upon a kindred subject, upon a proposition of creating a mission to the Papal States in conformity with the president's recommendation of the President. The President had made that recommendation most properly and wisely because he thought that representing this great nation of freemen it was his duty to take some notice of an event which had for its object so large a benefit, not only to the people of Italy, but by its example to the people of all Europe. He, therefore, recommended that an embassy should be created to the head of the Papal government, and based his recommendation upon those salutary changes which the head of that government proposed. I was of opinion that the President acted wisely and justly in that recommendation. The House of Representatives had manifested the same opinion by providing for that mission; and when it came here as a portion of a bill submitted to us, it became the subject of observation. We received intelligence of the French revolution on the 18th of March. The Senate not being then in session; on the 20th, the first day on which the Senate met after the news had reached us, the debate upon the Papal mission was pending. In some remarks which I made in support of the mission, carried along by the feelings which the recent news of the revolution in France had excited, I expressed the desire and the hope that Congress would embrace some opportunity of expressing the national sympathy and congratulations towards France. Having made the observation I felt it to be my duty to follow it up by submitting the resolution. That is the history of the introduction of the resolution, and it explains the reason why it was offered by me and not some one of the several members of this body who thought alike and entertained the same design. I do not doubt—I cannot doubt—I would be ashamed to doubt—that there could be in point of fact any diversity of feeling in the Senate of the United States on so great an event as that which has occurred in France. Men may doubt as to the proper form in which it behooves us to speak to the French people, and doubt with great propriety. But as to the principle itself, of the obligation which our position imposes upon us to speak a word of encouragement and congratulation to the French people, I believe there can be here no diversity of sentiment whatever. I deem it proper that in all the circumstances I should make this statement. Preferring the brief, concise form, which I gave the resolution, I shall of course vote against any amendment of it.

Mr. DOWNS.—When I yielded the floor the other day to the honorable chairman of the committee on Foreign Relations, I expressed the design of making a few additional remarks on the subject before the Senate, when an opportunity should be presented of doing so. But there seems to be a general desire to take the question without further debate, and certainly I should refrain from saying a single word, if I could consult my own feelings alone. I can hardly do so, however, with propriety in the circumstances in which I am placed, as I had promised to submit some documents recently received from France. I shall at all events be very brief, concurring as I do, with the honorable chairman of the committee on Foreign Relations, that the vote ought to be taken to-day, and promptly. The form of the resolution is, it seems to me, of little importance. For myself, I am equally satisfied with either. While I admire the first on account of its simplicity and brevity, finding nothing in its language to criticise, still, since the President's message has been submitted, and the question comes in a more formal manner from the committee on Foreign Relations, there seems to be some propriety in adopting the mere formal resolution. As I have remarked, however, I am indifferent as to what form the resolution may assume, hoping that all discussion on minor points will be waived, and that the Senate will act promptly.

I regard this French revolution as one of the most extraordinary events in the world's history. We have seen revolutions in France before, and we have seen them in other lands, but according to my recollection, I have neither read in ancient history, nor witnessed in modern times, anything like this event. We have seen a king clothed with almost despotic power—surrounded by large armies —with the city of Paris so fortified that it was supposed to be impregnable, and secure from any assault from within or without—no one seeming to doubt, that during the life of Louis Philippe, disturbance was impossible—immediately after an election which had secured a majority for the king, of upwards of one hundred—in the face of all these things, two short days sufficed to hurl him from power, and drive him in ignominious flight to the shores of a neighboring kingdom. Nor was there any particularly overt act of tyranny to excite the people to rebellion. In the full tide of his success, the people rise against the king, and in a marvellously brief period, with little disturbance, little loss of life, little disorder, they demolish the throne which he had reared with such craft and pains, and take measures for the erection of a republic in its stead. This certainly does seem most extraordinary. But when we come to examine the character of the French people, and the structure of French society, the intelligence and capacity for the enjoyment of freedom, which characterize that people, our astonishment will be diminished. Louis Philippe has had the reputation of a wise prince, and perhaps he was entitled to it. But he made one fatal mistake, and to it he owes his downfall. He thought he was safe because he had a majority in the chambers, and an army of some three hundred thousand men. He imagined that he had the people completely under his control. Here was his mistake. I have been very much struck, sir, in contrasting the policy for some years past, of the French and English governments. The history of British legislation for some years past, has been a history of popular concession. The government has yielded to the demand for reform, and the growing intelligence of the people. Catholic emancipation—parliamentary reform—municipal reform—free trade—all these have been concessions yielded to the people by a monarchical government. That government has had discretion enough to see that it ought to yield, and its sagacity in yielding to the people has saved it from destruction. In France the policy has been entirely different. The legislative bodies have been composed of office holders, the tools and ministers of the King, and obstinately resisting any concession to the people, the government has persisted in opposing the demands for reform, till the people taking the work into their own hands, have pulled the government to pieces and now set about the construction of a system of free institutions.

This revolution is not to be compared to that of '98; a great change has come over France since that period. It was intimated here in an early part of this debate, that France had failed in her former revolutions. I read her history differently. I know that there was much to weep over in her first revolution, but she emerged from that scene of horror better than she was before. And the empire with all its tyranny under the direction of that extraordinary man, who held the reigns of power, contributed still more to improve her social condition. It was then that the barriers were broken down which formerly existed between the people and the aristocracy. It was then that a more equal distribution of property took place. And the second revolution was a still greater improvement. With these lessons before them, I hope that the people of France in this third attempt will be entirely successful, and fulfil all the wishes of the friends of France and liberty throughout the world. For myself I have no doubt of their success. The ex-King himself, seems to have abandoned all hope of the restoration of monarchy to France' He has expressed in his memorable declaration, to which the gentleman from New York has referred, his deliberate conviction that France must be a republic.

The prompt adhesion of the new government made by the highest officers of the army and of the navy and by the clergy, presents gratifying evidence of the strength and vitality of republican feelings in France. The revolution of '92, might be said to be a revolution against the authority of the church, nay against Christianity itself as well as against kingly power. But in the present movement I rejoice to recognize that spirit of veneration for religion which is one of the surest safeguards of social order, and good government. The Bishops of Paris and Lyons, and other high dignitaries of the church, have concurred most fully and freely in the great movement for liberty. Those who are little acquainted with Catholic countries and the influence of the clergy, can scarcely appreciate the importance of this revolution. I have lived among them, and know how much influence they exercise, making the people humane and benevolent, soothing and tempering their violence of disposition. I have no fears then, sir, for the result of the revolution in France. I believe it will be successful. It may take some time, but with the union of the masses of the people with the wealthy classes of the country, and with the cooperation and assistance of all with the acquiescence of the nobility—with the approval of the royal family themselves, I certainly think that if there could be any doubt about the result of this revolution, this would afford as a strong assurance of a favorable termination.

I shall not take up the time of the Senate by referring to the numerous accounts of this great event which we have seen in the public prints. But I have been favored with two extracts from letters from private individuals, speaking of the occurrences which took place in Paris. These extracts, I think, will enable us to form a better judgment of these occurrences, than the more formal accounts that we have seen. Here is an extract from a letter of a gentleman residing in Paris, to his friend in this country :

"PARIS, February 25, 1848.

"I assure you that our quarter has been perfectly quiet, even during the two days of fighting. We scarcely heard a dozen gun shots, and those were fired after the victory, as a feu de joie. At the time, or o'clock in the morning, peace is completely restored. Last evening, Mr. G. (a priest) came from his father's at the Faubourg St. Germain, crossing the city through the streets and public squares, which had been the scenes of action through the day, and he only saw persons quietly promenading, and among them a large number of women of all classes—for the ladies were all liberated. Make yourself perfectly easy. I can not certainly be suspected of enthusiasm, but I assure you, I can't help admiring the moral sentiment which pervades this entire population.

Just imagine to yourself the men who had recently carried the Tuileries by assault, and then in possession of the city, acting peaceably to their houses, neither more turbulent nor elated, and only to say with them the same, which they had won. Truly it was a sublime spectacle, with which I was most profoundly moved. My advice is for you to remain in America as long as your business requires, neither alter your labors or projects, and continue zealously your systematic industry as heretofore. All will be the same, and will profit by your exertions, whatever may be its form of government. You are there our surest and best guarantee, and we here, have nothing to fear; Let it contrary to all expectations, we should be at all uneasy, the protection of the most republican mantle will still be with us, I need only to invoke your name to obtain it immediately. You know this as well as I do

"PARIS, 8th March, 1848.

"Believe me, the proclamation of the republic has raised you here at least ten ells. You already know, perhaps, that not only the American manifestation, but the Americans, now in Paris, have waited upon and congratulated the provisional government. This double compliment has had an admirable effect. Never has there been so much anxiety to draw closer the alliance; I should say the intimacy with the United States. Do not think of returning before your labors are terminated. Continue your meritorious work among the Americans, which will be your highest glory. France will second you with more zeal than ever.

"Do not give yourself the least uneasiness. Paris never was more quiet than at present, and personal security never more cared for. It requires really an effort of memory to recollect that there was a revolution last week, and that a memorable overbalance of monarchy has been done away. The only difficulty at present is, a little timidity in the money market, which will not last long. I know a noble Frenchman who is about to invest three millions of francs in a banking house, amply secured. My dear friend, we have a right to say with pride, that no republic ever gave a nobler example of patriotism. Adieu. We drank yesterday, (Shrove Tuesday,) your health. There is no one who does not long to see you; but there is no one who will not make the sacrifice, and encourage you not to abandon, but to persevere in the noble aims which we all know are worthy of you."

Here is also an extract from the letter of a lady, relating to the same subject :

"SHROVE TUESDAY.

"Your welcome letter arrived on the memorable day of the great barricades. We were all closely housed, shutters closed, for fear of some accident, which by the by was entirely useless. We feared, as the people were marching towards the barriers, they might break the windows; but they had no such intention—they were going very quietly to liberate the prisoners confined for debt; and we were delighted and amused to see the people liberated—some with a little bundle in their hands—some in their slippers, (not having had time to put on their shoes,) marching gaily and rapidly as if fearing their liberty might be again restrained. Don't believe any exaggerated accounts you may hear. I assure you Paris has never been more tranquil than at this moment."

Now, when within one week after scenes of this kind have taken place, and such moderation, quiet, and regularity are observed, can any body doubt the fitness of the people and their capability to establish a government that will be permanent? I see no cause to doubt or hesitate. I believe their success is certain. The whole account of their proceedings hitherto, is a sufficient guarantee that such will be the case. I cannot doubt, therefore, for a moment, the propriety of passing this resolution. I am sorry that it has been delayed so long. I wished very much that it could have been passed in time to go by this steamer; and I do hope now that there will be no farther delay.

Mr. DAYTON.—It is no part of my purpose to make a speech upon this resolution; but I should have been much better satisfied if the Senator who introduced it, or the committee from which it in part emanates, had been content that it should have laid over for a month as originally proposed, that is, until the first or second Monday in May next. I trust I am not wanting in all those kind, generous feelings, which have been so well expressed by Senators; but it seems to me as though we were giving way too much to the current of popular sentiment. The Senator from Indiana, in the course of his remarks, referred to the fact that the very day-laborers about the capitol were shaking hands and felicitating themselves when the news of the revolution was received. It appears to me, sir, that the American Senate is engaged in very much in the same way. As individuals we may do it—but as legislators, men acting under heavier and deeper responsibilities, it seems to me that we should weigh well each step that we take in this matter.

If there ever was a season when we, the model republic as we glory in calling ourselves to the world, should be cautious as to what we do, it is now. There is, perhaps, no paragraph in our past history, conveying more of wisdom to posterity, than the last and parting address of Washington—when he told us to beware of entangling ourselves with European politics. I admit that this is not an entanglement within the letter, but it is at least within the spirit and meaning of the words of the great Father of his country. I do not mean to say that we may not, under certain circumstances, express our sympathy with any nation in Europe. We may do so in the language of this resolution, mean what it may, for I hardly know what is meant by consolidation of liberty. But, sir, I want first to be sure that the government does consolidate liberty. I want to have, at least, a reasonable assurance that when the government we are about to congratulate shall be sought after, our minister will not have to make a return of non est inventus. The honorable Senator from New Hampshire tells us that he would not wait until the child attains to maturity before he tenders his congratulations. Nor I, sir. But I would wait until the child is born. France is enciente, only; whether a child will be born, or France have a miscarriage is a thing to be hereafter determined. Sir, there is no government now in France to whom we can tender our congratulations. We are tendering them to the now government of France not to a government that is to be, but to the Provisional government. What is that government? What do we mean by Provisional government? I ask it in all seriousness. It has the name of government, but we cannot regard it as one. With great respect, I say it is no government. Its decrees are no decrees. Its laws are no laws. Its official agents are the creatures, in common parlance, of nobody. We cannot shut our eyes to this fact. Here is a government which puts down the old state of things to-day, and sets up a new state of things to-morrow. By whose act is it done? It is done by the people of Paris. Who are the people of Paris? I mean legally and as compared with the thirty millions of the French people. It is idle, sir, I say it with great respect, to look upon this species of de facto power which, for the time being, keeps a kind of order in Paris. It is idle, I say, to look upon it as an existing government which should receive our congratulations. And permit me to say, that the official agents of this quasi government feel by what a slight tenor they hold their places. A mob has put down a monarchy yesterday and has raised a republic to-day. They gave life to Lamartine yesterday, they may give death to Lamartine tomorrow. The whole course of action of the agents of this French revolution show that they appreciate the position in which they stand. The Senator from New Hampshire has spoken of something for which they are specially entitled to the congratulations of this government. I again say, sir, that this very thing is but carrying out a mere popular sentiment. The manumission which is accomplished by the mere stroke of a pen is an action too sudden to be relied on. Such vast changes, reforms if you choose to call them so, are not to be consummated in a day, and attended with no evil consequences. Again, sir, if we examine the progress of this quasi government we see it pandering to the passions of the populace—we see it raising the wages of labor, opening the bakers-shops to feed the hungry. These are not the ordinary functions of government. We see it redeeming pledges, from the pawnbrokers with the funds of the government, converting the Tuileries into a poor-house, and confiscating the property of the royal family. Can a conservative people like ours be mistaken as to the tendency of these things? The very men who are now legislating thus, feel that they hold their power at the frail tenure of the will of a mob. They feel that they must pander to that mob, if they would maintain the position they hold. Why, sir, I say it with great respect for those intelligent high-minded gentlemen who now hold a species of quasi power—they have done the best they can—but do you call this body of men a government—a government to make laws? Whence comes their authority? And it is to this self-styled government—to this child in embryo, that we are to tender our congratulations. Sir, they show their want of confidence in the stability of their government themselves. And there are other indications which show that it has no security for its stability. The French funds at one time went down to 25 per cent. And this meeting which is to be held on the 20th of the present month, what is it to be? A meeting of nine hundred men elected by a community, who never elected representatives before. Part of them will come from Algeria. There will be some fifteen or sixteen Algerines. Sir, I speak it with great respect, but when we recollect that this great body of men, enough to form a mob of themselves, are to be elected by a people who have had no experience in these matters, I cannot help distrusting the action of that convention. At all events, let it be as able, pure, patriotic, as it may, I would for one prefer, at least, that we should wait calmly and deliberately, until we shall have seen the matured action of the convention. And if they give a constitution to France, having upon it the face and liniaments of our own, I will tender to them the hand of good fellowship and congratulation. Sir, our minister under the circumstances has perhaps done his duty. He has done enough. It seems to me, I speak it with great respect, that it would be more wise, more statesmanlike to wait the development of events. What is done by a government should be done at least, decently and in order. I consider that a month, more or less, will not diminish the value of our congratulations to the French government; and I do hope, that when these congratulations shall be tendered, we shall find there a government to receive them. I repeat that I have no intention to commit myself to any particular course upon this subject, but it seems to me, that the whole current of debate is certainly running in one direction. It appears to me wiser to await the result of events, and if success crown their efforts, then it will be time for us to tender our congratulations. It will then give me great pleasure to vote for such a resolution; but if I am pressed to vote now, I most respectfully decline voting for the resolution, because I vote without knowledge, without light, at least such a light as would be satisfactory to illuminate my mind in regard to the subject.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Georgia.—As I can see no good reason for the postponement of the resolutions of congratulation to France, introduced by the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. ALLEN,] and those introduced by the Committee on Foreign Relations, I shall vote for the action of the Senate upon them at once.

What shall we gain by delay? The principal, indeed the only reason urged by Senators over the way for it, is, that the convention is to meet on the 20th of the present month, and that we should therefore wait until the result of its deliberations, shall be known, so that we may judge how far the efforts of the French people to establish a republican government, will be successful. That this is desirable, I readily admit. But if we should withhold the expression of our congratulations until France shall have fully succeeded, she would scarcely need our sympathies, nor would it reflect much credit upon us to tender them. The organization of a republican government is not the work of a day, or a month. It may and perhaps will, require years, for the people of France to establish a government which will exhibit to the world the evidences of permanence and stability. The transition from monarchy to her present attitude, has indeed taken place with a rapidity which is, at once, wonderful and sublime. But to ensure success for the experiment, much is yet to be done. A constitution is to be framed and adapted to the character, genius and condition of the people of France. Ancient prejudices and customs are to be overcome, long established forms to be remodelled, well settled social habits to be obliterated; and in a word, the entire mass of the population, to be indoctrinated in the great principles of self-government, and fused into a harmonious and well regulated organization. Can all this be accomplished within the time appointed for the meeting of the French convention? They have not the light of experience to illumine their path; they can only see that which is reflected from our government, and that, at so remote a distance, that it will afford them but partial assistance. Why, sir, our government was established under circumstances far more favorable to success, than those by which the people of France are surrounded. The principles of freedom on which it is based, were planted on this soil by the Pilgrim fathers. They grew with the growth, and strengthened with the strength of the people of the Colonies. They animated them under all the difficulties and embarrassments of Colonial dependence. They nerved their arm in the struggles of the revolution. They fired the patriotism and guided the councils of the convention which framed our constitution. Our government is the wisest in its provisions, the most symmetrical in its proportions, and in all respects, the best calculated to preserve liberty, of any that is recorded on the pages of history. Thus far it has proved most successful, and its machinery has operated with beautiful harmony. Yet, sir, we ourselves characterized it, for more than fifty years, as an experiment; the nations of Europe still consider it as an experiment, and are fondly dreaming that it will, at last, prove to be but a splendid failure. Can it be expected then, that France, under circumstances so much less favorble, shall succeed in a few short weeks or months? For many long generations France has been accustomed to view monarchy as by "Divine right," the only legitimate form of government. The habits of the people, their social organization, their modes of thought and feeling, have all borrowed their cast and impress from the institutions of royalty; and they have been taught to regard as disloyal the very idea of self-government. Their condition differs from ours in another important respect. We were separated by the wide ocean from all other governments, and were therefore free from their intermeddling and jealousies. But France is flanked on all sides by despotic governments, who feel no sympathy with her in her struggles, but who would rather rejoice to see her relapse back into the embrace of despotism. Under these circumstances, I repeat, it cannot be supposed, that in a few months she can present to the world an organized republic, dispensing all the blessings of happiness and well regulated freedom. It seems to me, therefore, Mr. President, that to delay as long as is advocated by the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. DAYTON,] so far from securing the object which he desires, would be, to defer our congratulations to a time when France will not need them, and it would be no credit to us, to tender them. Hence, if it be proper for our government in any event, to give any expression in relation to the attitude which France has assumed, there is no controlling reason why that expression should be delayed or why it should not be given at once.

Is it proper then, that this government should tender its congratulations on the occasion under consideration? Upon the first introduction of these resolutions, I did entertain some doubt on this point; that is to say, my judgment did not fully second the warm impulses of my heart. That doubt rested upon the fact, that we had no official information of the great events which have burst so suddenly upon the world. The accounts which we had then received from France, were such only as had reached us through the medium of the public press. We had not at that time been officially informed that any thing had transpired. I, therefore, doubted whether it fully comported with the dignity of this government, to take cognisance of events of this character, upon mere newspaper intelligence. But, sir, that doubt, whether well founded or not, (and I am disposed to think it was not,) is entirely removed by the message of the President, communicating the official action of Mr. Rush, and its approval by the Executive, by which he recognized the existence of the new government, and tendered the sympathies and good wishes of the American people. That message and accompanying documents have been referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and that committee has reported upon them. Thus far, then, our government is committed to the sentiments expressed in these resolutions, the subject is before us in proper official form; and the question assumes a new and more forcible aspect. Before the receipt of this message, the resolutions stood entirely on their own merits—that is to say—they presented the isolated question of the propriety of their passage, and their rejection could have received no other interpretation by the civilized world, than that of a doubt of the propriety of passing them at this time. But now, their rejection will operate as a censure upon the conduct of Mr. Rush; and to censure him, would amount well nigh to a censure of the French people. I am sure the American Senate is prepared for no act, which might even be tortured into such a construction. I trust also, that this message will produce the same effect upon the mind of the honorable Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. BALDWIN,] and upon the minds of those who agree with him, that it has upon my own. For his leading objection to the resolutions was, that it was the province of the Executive to take the initiative in proceedings of this character. That has now been done. The only question then is, do we really feel in our hearts the sentiments expressed in these resolutions? Do we rejoice at the creation of a republic on the ruins of a monarchy in France? If we have those feelings, we have the unquestionable right to express them here or elsewhere; and if both houses of Congress concur in them, we may embody them into the form of resolutions, and offer them to France to cheer her in her hour of trial, and to evince the deep solicitude of the American people in behalf of the cause of republican liberty. And can there be a doubt that such are the feelings and wishes of the people? What mean these public gatherings? What mean the almost unanimous expressions of the press throughout the wide extent of our country? They are but the echoes of the popular voice.

But the honorable Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. DAYTON,] entertains doubts as to the propriety of passing these resolutions on another ground. He says it was the farewell advice of Washington, that we should avoid all interference with European politics, and adhere strictly to the policy of non-intervention. It is true, sir; and the same policy was promulgated again, in a form more authentic, by Mr. Monroe in 1823, when he proclaimed that any attempt on the part of European nations, to extend their system of monarchy to the States of this continent, would be regarded in no other light than as the exhibition of an unfriendly disposition towards the United States. This policy thus proclaimed has received the sanction of all parties in the United States; and I hazzard nothing in asserting that it is considered fixed and unalterable. I, therefore, am disposed to acquiesce with that Senator, in maintaining it, to its fullest extent. It does not become us to interfere with the political affairs of other nations. The golden rule is applicable; we should do unto others as we would they should do unto us. If we will not tolerate intermedling with us, we must not intermeddle with others. But will the passage of these resolutions be a violation of this rule of action? That is the question. I think not. With whom is France contending? Is she at war with any other power? Is any nation opposing her efforts to change her form of government? No, sir, none; nor has any a right to oppose. It is purely an affair of her own. It is purely a civil revolution. With us it is a fundamental doctrine, "that is the right of the people, to alter or abolish their form of government, laying its foundation on such principles, and organizing its powers in such form, as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness." The people of France are but exercising this great right which, for the benefit of mankind, was established by the struggles of our revolution of independence. We, therefore, do not interfere with the politics or relations of any nation, by adopting the resolutions under consideration. We do not take sides with France against any antagonist powers. No, sir, it is a contest between the people of France and monarchy—a contest between tyranny and freedom—despotism and republicanism. In sympathizing with France, and tendering to her our congratulations, we do not depart from our true attitude of neutrality, violate no principle of our government, nor commit ourselves to any line of policy for the future, in relation to that nation. All that can be said is, (and who will not glory in it?) that in a mighty struggle between the principles of liberty and those of oppression, we take sides with the former against the latter. It seems to me, therefore, that the apprehensions of the honorable Senator are not founded on a just view of the question which these resolutions present to the Senate.

In relation to the two sets of resolutions which are now under consideration, I shall feel it my duty to prefer those which were reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations. The objection which has been made to the phraseology of the last resolution of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. ALLEN,] has no influence upon my mind. I allude particularly to the words "consolidate liberty." To such verbal criticism, I pay no more respect, than that which is due to the literary taste of gentlemen who may think proper to indulge in this exercise. But there is an assertion of fact, in this resolution of the Senator from Ohio, which I should be pleased to see modified; and it is this. The congratulations of the American people are hereby tendered to the people of France, upon their "success" in their recent efforts to consolidate liberty, &c. I prefer the phraseology of the resolution of the Committee on Foreign Relations, because more strictly in conformity with the existing state of things. In that, we congratulate the people of France on their success thus far. Now it is true, that a provisional government has been organized, that it has decreed a republican form of government, and ordered a convention of delegates of the people to assemble to carry that decree into execution. This provisional government has been recognized by the United States and other powers. But the great work of framing a constitution, and setting the political machinery in motion is yet to be done. It is, therefore, more strictly correct to say, that France has thus far succeeded, than that she has actually succeeded, in establishing a republican form of government. But whilst I prefer the resolutions of the committee, yet I can very cheerfully vote for those of the Senator from Ohio, if the motion now pending to substitute the former for the latter, should not meet the views of the Senate. I think it due, however, to the deliberation which should characterize the action of the Senate of the United States, that caution should be used not to employ language which conveys more than is strictly consistent with facts as they exist.

It is said, that if we congratulate, it may afford a pretext, for Russia, Prussia, and Austria to abuse, and discourage, and perhaps oppose. But will they not do this in any event, so soon as they may believe their interest, or the cause of despotism require it? Will they be restrained by our silence? Can they gaze with approbation or unconcern upon the heavings of a great political volcano, whose throes may subvert every throne in Europe? No, sir, whenever they shall feel themselves in danger by the conviction, that France is likely to succeed, their murmurings will be stirred; and I shall be most agreeably disappointed if all Europe be not involved in bloody revolutions. Under these circumstances, I feel that France will gain infinitely more by our congratulations, than by our silence. It will encourage the hearts of her people, and make them feel that, while surrounding monarchies secretly desire their failure; yet we, the model republic of the globe sympathize in their every effort, and rejoice in every step of their progress.

The fear has been expressed by some gentlemen, that the whole movement would be a failure. Judging from the past, the opinion has been entertained, that France might ever pass under the yoke of a military despotism, or relapse again into the embraces of monarchy. It is certainly possible, that one or the other of these results may occur. We cannot penetrate the veil of the future, and predict the fate of the people of France. But, sir, whether success or defeat awaits them, I, for one, am prepared to expend our sympathy for, and tender our congratulations to them for the very effort which they have made. It is a noble effort—noble in the feelings in which it originated, and noble in the end which it seeks to accomplish. It is prompted by the love of liberty—devotion to the principles of freedom. It seeks the formation of a republican government on the ruins of fallen monarchy—it aims at the elevation of the masses from the degradation of vassals, to the dignity of freemen.

But, sir, there are many features in the late revolution, calculated to inspire us with sanguine hope of its ultimate success. The manner in which the revolution had its origin, is highly encouraging. It did not spring from the machinations of a few ambitous leaders, seeking their own aggrandizement, by appeals to the prejudices and passions of the popularce. It is not the offspring of infuriated and lawless faction. But it is the spontaneous movement of the people. It is not the angry surges of the ocean which are dashed to pieces by the fury of the element that puts them in motion, but rather the mighty ground swell, whose heaving billows originate in the profound depths of popular feeling and sentiment, at once irresistible and sublime in their motion, bearing before them all opposition. It is the people, struggling for the popular rights of the people; and, sir, where is the power on earth that can bring successful resistance to 36,000,000 of freemen, animated and fired by the invincible resolve to shake off the fetters of oppression? Monarchs may growl and snarl—Russia, Prussia, and Austria, may look with fearful impatience upon the scene, and old England in her heart may contemplate it with scorn; but, sir, this movement in France will awaken such a sensation in the popular heart of all Europe, that these powers will be busily employed in bracing their own thrones against the convulsions of this political eathquake. But, sir, there is another remarkable feature in this revolution which inspires me with strong hope of its ultimate success. That is, the spirit with which it has thus far been conducted. Where else, in the history of the world can you find a solitary example, of a revolution carried on with the rapidity with which this has been accomplished, which has been attended with so little bloodshed, so little violence, so little rapine, so little plunder, so little robbery, so little insubordination? Looking alone to the great and noble end in view—their emancipation from the thraldom of royal oppression—the French people in the utmost fury of their excitement, had scrupulous regard to the rights of property, the claims of helpless innocence, and the obligations of humanity. Are people mad who are governed by a spirit like this? Shall they be called "an infuriated mob," blinded by rage? Sir, if they were mad, there was a method in their madness, and as high unity of design in all their actions, which exhibit the inspiration that fired their bosoms in the cause of liberty.

I will call the attention of the Senate to one striking fact illustrative at once of the origin and operation of the spirit to which I have referred. It has also been alluded to by the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. DOWNS.] It is the fact, that under the most intense excitement of the people, they were not forgetful of the claims of religion, or of the deference due to its ministers. I hold in my hand an authentic account, published in the Baltimore Sun of the 3rd inst., of the treatment received by a Priest, when it was necessary for him to make his way along the crowded streets of Paris. It proves the presence of a power, which, though invisible, is exercising a potential and salutary influence upon the minds of the people. But the statement speaks for itself, and I beg leave to read it to the Senate.

"Sir,—My conscience will not permit me to leave the following facts without publicity. On Thursday, at ten o'clock in the morning, I left, in the costume of an ecclesiastic, the quarter of the Madeleine, to which I had been called for the discharge of my duty. I had to turn to my dwelling in the Rue Potade by the place de la Concorde, but the crowd of people who occupied that place and the constant exchange of fire arms at that time obliged me to gain the Rue de Rivoli. I passed along the Rue de Rohan, the place du Palais Royal, the Rue de Valois, and twenty other streets, as far as the quarter Saint Martin, forced to turn to the right and to the left, and frequently to return back by the way I came. I had to clear fifty barricades. At the entrance of the Rue du Repposir, Place des Victoires, I addressed myself, with confidence, to the men of the people who guarded the barricades. One of them replied, 'Fear not, Monsieur l'Abbe, you are in safety in the midst of us'—Then, entering more than twenty barricades, he said to his comrades, in a loud voice, 'Honor to religion—respect the Priests. Allow this good citizen to pass, and protect him.' I was accompanied to the next barricade with testimonies of respect and words of encouragement. These brave workmen took me by the hand or gave me their arm to conduct me in safety, repeating—'Respect for religion—How this good man is pale.' Frequently stopped by compact masses, and surrounded by armed men, I thanked them for their attention. 'I see (said I to them) that you are the true friends of religion—I have confidence in your generous sentiments—you know that the Priests are the true, the best friends of the people.' 'Monsieur l'Abbe, (replied they with emotion,) we wish certain religious—we wish to respect the Priests—we have need of them for ourselves and for our children.' At one barricade an individual, only one, furiating towards me, cried—'Down with the Priests.' Immediately he was stopped by his comrades, who said aloud, 'Silence, false religious; ever the Priests—we have need of them.' During more than two hours, in the midsts of so many loaded firearms and naked swords, no gun, no sword was directed against the Priest.' At length I arrived at the last barricade, where I was received with the same sympathy. When I reached the top of this barricade, a loud voice in the midst of the crowd was heard crying—Vive M. l'Abbe!' and a great number of other voices repeated the cry. I thanked those brave men—those Christian workmen—and I thank them again. I know not how I can better express my gratitude and my confidence in them than by making known the generous sentiments by which they are animated. In the new era upon which we are entering, the Priests will not be wanting in their duty towards them. They will see that religion and the Priests are the true—the best friends of the people—L'ABBE FONGUET, Prest.'"

The moral which is conveyed by this graphic letter, is of the deepest interest and cannot fail to sustain well founded hope, that a people obedient to such reverence for religion, in an hour of such excitement will succeed in their high and noble purposes. It is a matter of sincere congratulation, that the Catholic church, which is the prevailing church of France fully acquiesces in the new state of things and lends its mighty influence to the cause of free principles. The following manifesto from Count de Montalembert, as an exposition of the attitude of the Catholics of France, towards the new order of things, is deeply interesting in this connexion. I find it also in the Baltimore Sun, as taken from the Paris Univers.

"In the midst of a revolution, the Church remains standing, immortal as truth, liberty, and justice. Under the Republic, as under the Monarchy, we must defend, love, and serve religious liberty. We ought, we can, and we will. We have for pledges of it, on the one side, the unanimous respect with which the victorious people treat religion; and on the other, the firm resolution expressed by the Provisional Government maintain the free exercise of all religion. We have beside, the example of the United States; the French Republic cannot be less just, less liberal, less intelligent than the American one, particularly when the question relates to faith conscience, and family. In this change, so great and so unexpected, we, Catholic above all, have nothing to change; our rights, our duties, our interests remain the same. The colors which we have planted outside, and above all political opinions, are intact. We have not waited until this day to profess the worship of sacred liberty; to declare war on all kinds of oppression and falsehood; to proclaim that the Catholic cause, such as we have always defended it, was not identified with any power, any human cause. We feel inclined to think that the perseverance with which we have for eighteen years preached up the sovereign independence of religious interests, will aid the French Catholics to comprehend and to accept the new social phase into which we enter. Not one of them has a right to abdicate. They will therefore descend into the arena, with all their fellow citizens, to try claim to all political and social liberties which have to be born, developed, the inalienable patrimony of France. They will descend intent to fulfil a sacred duty, a national duty, a Christian duty. They will place unlimited confidence in the impenetrable designs of God, will show an ardent love for their country, an imperishable devotedness to its glory and its happiness."

In addition to this, the provisional government have publicly called upon the clergy of all denominations, to implore the blessings of the Supreme Ruler of the Universe, upon the people of France, and to bespeak wisdom from above, to guide the deliberations of that assembly, to which, will soon be committed their future destiny. Sir, these features of this great popular movement in France, are calculated to encourage in our minds the most sanguine anticipations of success. How different a spectacle does it present, when contrasted with the revolution of 1790, in which the fatal experiment was made, of discarding all religion, and elevating Reason to the throne of the Divinity.

But, sir, we also find that which affords high encouragement, in the character of their decrees. These decrees are very numerous, entering into detail upon many subjects which look rather strange, and some of them, rather laughable to us, who are unaccustomed to the order of things sought to be abolished. But when we examine them carefully, we find that they embrace the great principles of free government and rational liberty. Time would fail to run over them all. I will notice but two or three.

One remarkable decree, is that abolishing all titles of nobility. How strangely this must sound in the ear of European monarchists! But to us, the principle on which it rests is familiar as household words; for it is but another form of declaring that all men are equal, as did our fathers, when they "pledged their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor," upon the altar of liberty. This proposition lies at the foundation of all free government, and France is the first nation of Europe, that has ever ventured the bold experiment of proclaiming it to the world

They have also decreed the freedom of the press and of thought. What fearful weapons are these, against every form of oppression! Freedom of thought comprehends all that is valuable in political, civil, and religious toleration. It was this that kindled the fires of the reformation, and dispelled the dark night of ignorance and superstition, which shrouded the world in the fifteenth century. In the panoply of the invincible armor of a free press and freedom of thought, liberty shall march round the globe, level every throne of despotism and emancipate the nations of the earth. They will be to France, what they are to America, the pillars of the republican fabric.

They have also decreed universal suffrage. What a stride in the cause of freedom! What a striking contrast this presents to the order of things, under the reign of Louis Philippe! With a population of 36,000,000, only about 250,000, enjoyed the right of suffrage. Now every freeman of twenty-one years of age, in the whole republic, is to be entitled to the elective franchise. Population alone, is to be the basis of representation.

We might examine many more of these decrees, and we should find them embodying some great principle, of popular freedom or civil justice. From all which it is manifest, that the revolution is no vague and aimless event, originating in mere enthusiasm, and propelled by a spirit of blind and lawless faction. But that it has its origin in the hearts of the people, and is directed to the accomplishment of a great result, upon sound and rational principles. Therefore, we have more reason to hope for success than to fear defeat; and we may, with entire safety and propriety, tender our sincere congratulations to France, without the apprehension of national mortification at witnessing the failure of her noble effort.

Sir, as a free people, familiar with the blessings of liberty by their enjoyment, we cannot be insensible to any effort, in any part of the globe, to overturn mouarchies and despotisms, and in their stead, to form governments based upon republican principles. We have felt and expressed sympathy with the struggles of other nations. But when we remember that it is France, whom we are called upon to congratulate, it awakens feelings of more lively sympathy. It is the home of La Fayette, in the mention of whose name excites the most pleasant and grateful reminiscences. France was our friend in our own contest for independence, and to her we have ever been united in the bonds of amity. Shall we be unmoved and silent while she grapples with the power of iron-hearted monarchy? I will not, however, indulge in the declamation which these reminiscences are calculated to provoke. Nor will I deny them their legitimate influences upon my mind, in deciding upon the vote which I shall give upon these resolutions.

I had hoped these resolutions, or at least the sentiments contained in them, would have been adopted by the Senate without discussion. Still I respect the opinions of those Senators who entertain honest doubts, as to the propriety of such action at this time. But, sir, I have no language with which to express my regret, not to use a stronger term, that there are certain gentlemen who let no occasion, however unfit, pass without the introduction of a subject always delicate and exciting, and in my humble judgment, disrespectful to the feelings of those Senators who represent the South. I remember that, on the very morning, when a venerable patriot was called from the scene of his labors here, to his reward above—when we were about to engage in paying the tribute of national respect to his memory—when we were called to gaze upon the coffin and the winding sheet, and to contemplate the realities of the future world, this agitating question of slavery was thrust upon the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. BALDWIN.—If the Senator alludes to the resolution which I had the honor to introduce, I will say to him that he is under a misapprehension. The resolution was merely taken from the table, and read without any action being had upon it, and without any desire on my part that it should then be taken up. Senators will bear me witness that I was anxious to postpone informally the consideration of the subject of the resolution, in order that I might have the opportunity of discussing it on some future occasion. This was in accordance with an arrangement which had been made between the Senator from Alabama and myself. I am glad that the Senator has alluded to it now, because it has enabled me to correct a misapprehension which has elsewhere been made.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I am also glad that the occasion for explanation has occurred, for I think some explanation was necessary. It was the character of the colloquial debate which occurred on the occasion alluded to, between the Senator from Alabama, (Mr. BAGBY,) and the Senator from Connecticut—

Mr. BAGBY.—The Senator is under a misapprehension in regard to the occurrence in the debate to which he alludes. I believe that the resolution was then taken up in the morning business, and a motion was made to pass it by informally, failing in that the Senator began the discussion of it. It was at this stage of the proceedings that I addressed to the understanding that had previously taken place between the Senator from Connecticut and myself, and said that I felt bound to adhere to it.

Mr. BALDWIN.—The explanation of the honorable Senator is right except in one particular. He says, that "failing in the motion to postpone informally, the Senator commenced a discussion of the resolution." The fact is, a motion was made by the Senator from Mississippi to lay the resolution on the table; I urged upon the Senate that it should be postponed informally, and commenced stating the arrangement that had been made between the Senator from Alabama and myself. The Senator from Mississippi interrupted me by saying that the motion was not debatable. I appealed to the courtesy of the Senator, not to allow me to debate the resolution, but simply to make the explanation in regard to the arrangement. The Senator replied that it was not a matter of courtesy or something to that effect, and upon that having recently come into the Senate, and not supposing that I had the same right to persevere in making personal explanations that some Senators assume, I desisted.

Mr. FOOTE.—With the consent of the Senator from Georgia, I beg leave to offer a few remarks in response to what has just fallen from the Senator from Connecticut, whose allusion has been both too distinct and pointed, to be allowed to pass unnoticed or unrebuked. The Senator complains that I did not consent to his addressing the Senate, when, at the instance of that gentleman, the Wilmot Proviso was before us, and I had moved its indefinite postponement, (on the memorable morning of Mr. Adams' funeral,) and when I certainly had good reason to believe, that he intended to torture us, and afflict the country by a long, factious, disorganizing harangue—and says, now, that he only rose to make an explanation, without designing to speak at length, in support of his peculiar notions concerning our domestic institutions in the South. The Senator says that when he appealed to my courtesy, I replied, "this is not a question of courtesy." This is true, sir: and I adhere to what I then said. The question which I supposed that the Senator wished to discuss, is with no southern man a question of courtesy, merely. It is one which involves some of our dearest interests, our strongest sensibilities, and puts in peril the safety of the Union itself. It is no question for experimental declamation, or dem gogueical parade. It is not true in point of fact, though, that the Senator from Connecticut, on the occasion referred to, explained his then purpose, as he has now explained it, or surely I should have had no hesitation in permitting even him to be heard. The case is simply this. The Senator from Connecticut, for reasons best known to himself, has thought proper several times to go out of his way to afford to southern Senators, his views on the subject of our domestic concerns, an attitude of which he does not know anything practically, and concerning which, it is to be presumed that his opinions can scarcely be of very surpassing value, either to the present generation or posterity. The bearing and language of the Senator upon this delicate and exciting topic, have been more than once, fierce and menacing. I knew, and the Senate knew too well, the high powers of the Senator as an orator, his volcanic energy as a vehement and soul-rousing declaimer —the resistless majesty of his manner—his astonishing command of felicitous and glorious figures of speech—his herculean potency as a reasoner, and his wondrous capacity for wielding with destructive skill, all the multitudinous weapons of wit, and humor, and sarcasm, to deem it at all safe to permit him to conjure up a hurricane in this hall, whose just effects mights be to shake the Union to its foundations, and bring down upon the devoted heads, all the horrors which our enemies have long desired us to experience. I repeat it, sir, I did say that this is no question of courtesy; I might have said in addition, it is a question of social safety—and, with my consent, no man in the Republic shall ever be permitted, either here or elsewhere, to "scatter fire-brands, arrows and death," expecting, after a while to exclaim: "Am I not in sport?"

The Senator says, that being but a new member of the Senate, he did not deem himself authorized to press his claim to a hearing as the audience was refused him, so pertinaciously as some other Senators have thought proper to do. I understand the Senator well, and were I ten times duller than I chance to be, I could not fail to understand his allusion perfectly. He designs to revive in the memory of Senators the unfortunate collision between a distinguished Senator from North Carolina and myself, which, though marked at the time with more or less unkindness on both sides, has, I am glad to know, resulted in no sentiments of permanent hostility or alienation on either side, or any feelings whatever which could not easily give way to that cordial friendship and reciprocal esteem which, I rejoice to know, characterize our relations towards each other at the present moment. What right has the modest and peace-loving Senator from Connecticut to allude to this affair at all? From what order of social morals, or parliamentary courtesy, will he declare his authority to mix himself up so abruptly in an affair, which in no way stood connected with him? Really the Senator is about the most amiable, and modest, and unpresuming Senator I ever saw; and I doubt not he will descend to the remotest posterity as "the modest Senator from Connecticut." I rejoice to recollect though, that the Senator's modesty has not been quite potential enough to restrain him very strikingly as one of the speakers of this body—his modesty has not yet altogether frozen his powers of utterance, or caused that eloquent tongue of his to cleave obstinately to the roof of his mouth, or even prevented him from delivering a very considerable number, (when not under such special inspiration as it is his high lot sometimes to experience and evince,) of the coldest, crudest, most confused, most tedious, and intolerable harangues which have ever received utterance in a body so grave and dignified as the United States Senate.

Mr. BALDWIN.—I wish to state to the Senate that in the remarks I made, I did not intend to make the slightest allusion to the Senator from Mississippi; nor according to my present recollection, have I ever made the slightest allusion to that Senator in debate, neither is it my intention ever to make any allusion to him.

Mr. FOOTE.—The Senator says he did not allude to me, and "that to the best of his recollection, he has never alluded to me in debate," and goes still farther, and announces the momentous fact that he does not intend ever to allude to me hereafter. Well, sir, this is the most striking and ludicrous case of short or convenient memory. I tell the Senator, and I gravely urge upon the Senate, that not only did the Senator from Connecticut allude to me, (a fact which he has ventured to deny,) but that it is utterly impossible that he could have intended to allude to any other person. He referred most explicitly to a transaction, well recollected in the Senate, with which my honorable colleague, who is present, well knows he had no particular connection, to wit., the motion to subject the Wilmot Proviso amendment to indefinite postponement; and, looking earnestly at me, alluded to "the Senator from Mississippi" by name—complained vehemently of what was my act, and the act of no one else—cites even the very words I used on the occasion brought under review, and which no other person on earth did use, to wit. that the question then before the Senate was "not a question of courtesy;" and now, when I respond to him, the modest Senator from Connecticut has the audacity to declare, in full Senate, that he had no thought of alluding to me at all. The predicament in which the Senator from Connecticut stands involved by his temerity is such as very much to assuage any mortification which it was natural for me to experience at hearing him announce, with such profound and imposing gravity, that he did not intend to allude to me hereafter. The form of opinion that the Senator's sagacity has been very creditably displayed in the adoption of this resolution of abstaining in future from all allusion to me on the floor of the Senate. Unless his powers as a controversialist can be hereafter very much improved, I shall certainly derive no satisfaction from his selection of me as an antagonist with whom to do battle on this lofty arena; and I would admonish him to be somewhat more certain of his facts hereafter, before he ventures to assail the feeblest member of this body. It is hardly necessary for me to say to the Senator from Connecticut, that my reputation as a private gentleman and as a public man, is not all dependent upon his notice of me here or elsewhere. I hold neither his smiles nor frowns to be "guerdon of a glorious lot;" nor is it even possible for the Senator either to do any thing, or to refrain from doing any thing, which could either affect my standing with the public, or come within cannon-shot of my sensibilities. One thing though is certain, and let it never be forgotten, the Senator has averred that he did not allude to me on a particular occasion, and that he had never heretofore alluded to me; and I have proved by evidence irresistible, that the contrary of what the Senator avers is the only correct statement, of which the facts of the case, as attested by our own records and reports, can possibly admit.

Mr. BALDWIN.—Does the Senator mean to say that I alluded to what passed between him and the Senator from North Carolina? Why, it never occurred to me for a moment! In reply to the Senator from Georgia, I alluded to the fact that I had requested the Senator from Mississippi to withdraw his motion to lay upon the table. But it never entered into my imagination to allude to any thing that had occurred between him and the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I must now claim my right to the floor.

Mr. FOOTE.—Allow me a single minute. The Senator from Connecticut said at first that he did not intend to allude to me at all. He now confesses that he did. "In reply to the Senator from Georgia," he now says, "I alluded to the fact that I had requested the Senator from Mississippi to withdraw his motion to lay upon the table." So he did allude to me after all! But he declares farther, that he did not design to refer to the affair between the Senator from North Carolina and myself at any rate. Well, I feel assured that the whole Senate so understood him. But as he disclaims it, I will not press it farther. And now I will say to the Senator, that from this time forward forever, I am willing to recognise him as not saying any thing at all. I certainly never should have noticed what has fallen from the Senator at any time on account of its intrinsic merit; nor have I been persuaded to do so by the attic elegance of his well-turned periods, the cataractic force of his declamations—the profundity of his argumentation—or the imposing majesty of his most peculiar manner. Had I not heard him utter sentiments which I held unworthy the dignity of this body—illiberal and unjust towards a particular section of the confederacy, whose interests have been in part consigned to my care, and dearer to the true honor of this great nation, I should never have thought of remarking upon what has at any time been offered as a speech in this chamber, by the Senator from Connecticut. But whether the Senator will hereafter refer to me in debate or not, I wish him to understand that if his course here shall in aught fail to harmonize with what I think it should be, he will not hereafter escape revision at my hands. I came here to assert my own views and those of my honorable and loved constituents upon questions of high public moment, boldly, independently, and if I should be able, efficiently. I came here to meet and repel falsehood, if it should chance to rear its serpent crest in my pathway—to put down calumny—to refute all unfair argumentation—to explode unsound doctrine by whomsoever advanced, to the full extent of my poor powers—and whether I shall awaken commiseration or provoke contempt, before God and my country I declare, speaking from conscientious lips the "words of truth and soberness," that, unmindful of those ridiculous airs of affected dignity which the Senator from Connecticut has so prettily played off before us, I shall, hereafter as heretofore, never fail under any circumstances to castigate the Senator from Connecticut or any other Senator whom I hear talk unworthily or unpatriotically in this grand council-hall of the republic, until I shall become satisfied that he has received due punishment for his offences. Yes, sir, "I will even beard the lion in his den;" armed with the weapons of truth and patriotism. I will assail any antagonist however potent; if possible, I will overthrow him. I will discomfit him, and if need be, disgrace him before the whole republic.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I congratulate the Senate upon the termination of this dialogue. I certainly did not intend to do the Senator from Connecticut any injustice. It seems I am mistaken in supposing the resolutions touching slavery to which I alluded were not introduced that day, but were called up in their order, having been previously offered. I had not the honor of a seat in this chamber when they were presented to the Senate, and not having heard anything of them prior to that time, my error was natural. But I must be permitted to say that the course of that Senator, and the earnestness which he exhibited in reference to the disposition of the resolutions, struck my mind as being in bad taste, to say the least. And judging from the expressions of other Senators on the occasion, I am sure I was not singular in this impression. I remember well the earnest remonstrance of the honorable Senator from Texas, [Mr. RUSK,] against so exciting a topic, at a time of such solemnity—a topic which he feared might shake the Union from its centre to circumference. I remember well the emphatic tone in which the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. ALLEN,] moved to lay the resolutions "on the table, now and forever."—But, sir, it affords me pleasure to be relieved from any erroneous impressions I may have entertained, by the explanation of the Senator from Connecticut. And whilst I regret the fallacy and danger of the doctrines which he maintains and desires to be adopted by Congress, I give ample confidence to the explanations by which he exonerates himself from the imputation of seeking to violate the solemnities of the occasion referred to, by the discussion of the subject at that time.

But, sir, I cannot be mistaken as to the character of the amendment to these resolutions by the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. HALE.] If there were any doubt as to the amendment itself, the speech by which he has sought to sustain it, discloses fully the object which it contemplates. Did that Senator suppose that such a movement would receive the sanction of this body?—a movement which congratulates the French people upon a decree of the provisional government for the emancipation of slavery in the French colonies? Then why offer such an amendment on this occasion? Have we any right to interfere in any manner whatever with the internal affairs of France or any other nation? Is it a matter of any concern to us whether the new republic shall or shall not tolerate involuntary servitude? Sir, slavery, from its very nature, is, and must always be, a municipal regulation; and I deeply deplore any attempt to seduce the government of the United States to express any sentiment in relation to its existence in this or any other country. I did hope that we might all, on this great occasion of national congratulation, harmonize as brethren of the same great political family, and for once forget all party distinctions and local prejudices, and give prompt and cordial utterance to the sympathies of the American people in behalf of France.—But it seems that this hope may not be realized. The Senator from New Hampshire can see but little, if anything in the late French revolution, save the decree providing for the abolition of slavery, worthy of our congratulations. Sir, if there be any one feature calculated to create a doubt in my mind of the final success of this great movement it is this. It looks like seeking to accomplish too much at a single blow—it looks a little as if the spirit of fanaticism is not entirely absent from the popular mind of France. But this shall not produce the least hesitation in my mind to vote for these resolutions. I should not have alluded to the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire, but that I feel it my duty as a southern man, on all occasions, not only to record my vote against the principle which it contains, but to express as far as I can find adequate language, my utter condemnation of the spirit of fanaticism in which it originates.

Sir, I repeat, our government is already committed to the sentiments expressed by these resolutions. It is committed by the laudable and manly conduct of Mr. Rush, and its approval by the Executive. Their rejection is condemnation of our minister; and I sincerely believe, unjust to the universal sentiments of the American people. Can we hesitate, can we for a moment doubt the propriety of adopting these resolutions. For one, I cannot, I am prepared to vote for either set of resolutions, and as between the two, I prefer those reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. PHELPS.—I shall trespass but a few moments upon the attention of the Senate, and I would not have made even upwards at all were it not for the motion of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, that the vote is to be taken to-day. The attention of the Senate has been directed, in the course of the debate, to a variety of collateral matter which renders it necessary that I should make some explanation with regard to my own position and the course which I am about to take. I do not often trouble the Senate with explanations of my votes, and for the most obvious reason that, in general, the reasons which members take is not likely to be misconceived. Upon the present occasion, however, some explanation seems to be necessary. I do not desire to be set down as hostile to the advancement of liberal principles, nor as advocating the perpetuity of despotism or despotic institutions. I rejoice in the progress of liberal principles. My attachment to liberty has been confirmed by the experience and reflection of my life; but on the other hand, I do not desire to witness the supremacy of the mob. I must pause before I pronounce a decided opinion upon a revolution so unexpected and coming like an earthquake. Who amongst us can anticipate the results of such a revolution? You, sir, and I are old enough to have witnessed revolution after revolution. We have seen the world in commotion. We have witnessed a revolution in France by which the sympathies of the American people were greatly excited, and which proceeded step by step, from anarchy to an incipient despotism. We saw afterwards the despotism that had threatened Europe and the world tumbled into insignificance by this spirit of revolution. Now we behold the very man who was elevated to the throne by the revolutionary movement of the French people, driven forth a wanderer by the very same people. It is impossible then to trace the results of this revolution. Others may be confident, but before I express any opinion I desire to be permitted to consult my own judgment. That the revolution may result in good is my fervent prayer. I will rejoice as much as any other man upon this floor to see it result in the establishment of a constitutional government like our own over a people like our own; a people not only blessed with free institutions, but capable of sustaining them. True, I perceive great differences between the present movement in France and those which have preceded it. There is not now that disorganization of society—the wretched philosophy—the spirit of vengeance—which characterized the first revolution; but still, I repeat, I must be allowed to pause before I pronounce a decided judgment upon the character of the present movement.

When we come to examine this revolution—I will not say a revolution by a mob but by a collection of the masses—and find that its first feature was the sacking of the Tuilleries and the emptying of its cellars, I do not see a very favorable indication of a fortunate result. We have not yet seen a government established, therefore, I desire to wait until we ascertain whether this violent commotion results in peace, good order, stable government, and security of person and property. I desire to wait until I see indications that the experiment is likely to be successful. Mere revolution is not enough to command the congratulations and sympathies of this people. At one time years since the sympathies of the American people and of the American Congress were expressed in behalf of the South America States. I need not go into an examination of the result of that resolution. It is now one of the strong arguments in support of this war, that we shall take into our hands the government of this poor miserable people, incapable of governing themselves, to whom we offered but a few short years ago our heartiest congratulations upon their success in establishing free and republican institutions. Were we confident that the revolution in France would result in good, in the establishment of liberty and the advancement of the best interests of France, I would not for one moment defer our action, but I cannot tender our congratulations when the result may turn out to be not at all palatable to an American Senate. We have yet to see the formation of a constitutional government in France. These individuals, thrown up in the agitation of a moment, and calling themselves a provisional government do not constitute such a government as can be recognized as the creation of the people according to any constitutional rules. I trust the national convention may succeed in forming and establishing upon a permanent basis a constitutional government. I have my doubts as to the success of universal suffrage spread over that population of thirty millions. I have my doubts as to the qualifications of the men into whose hands will be entrusted the administration of republican institutions. We are in the midst of an experiment then, which has never yet succeeded upon the Continent of Europe, and in the face of all experience we are called upon thus precipitately to tender our congratulations. Why, sir, there was a revolution once in England. Charles X, lost his head, a commonwealth was established, and it endured only while Cromwell lived. With his death the commonwealth came to an end, and royalty was again in the ascendant—for good or for evil—some good grew out of it because the adherents and followers of Cromwell took refuge upon this continent and laid the foundations of the liberty which we now enjoy. We present in this country the only example of a people enjoying self-government and capable of maintaining it. I have yet to learn where the people in Europe are to be found who have tried this experiment successfully. I repeat the expression of my fervent desire that the experiment may now succeed in France, and I have alluded to her former attempts to establish free institutions as an admonition to caution and deliberation in our procedure.

I have thus explained, sir, my position upon this question. I cannot vote for the resolution without such explanation, and I cannot say "no" to this resolution because I cannot be supposed to entertain sentiments adverse to the progress of civil liberty, good government, and human freedom. I vote, therefore—if I vote at all—in favor of the resolution with this explanation, an explanation which I might perhaps have given in fewer words by simply saying, in the language of a distinguished editor, Nous verrons.

Mr. HOUSTON then rose and said that he desired to make a few remarks on the subject before the Senate, but as the hour was late, he would, with the indulgence of the Senate, move an adjournment.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—Will the Senator withdraw his motion for a moment?

Mr. HOUSTON.—Certainly, sir.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—I hope that the Senate will not adjourn, but will at once act on one or other of these resolutions. I would call the attention of the honorable gentleman to the fact that on Monday last, by a vote of this body, we refused to consider the resolution of the Senator from Ohio, and the intelligence went out to Europe by the steamer of yesterday. On Saturday next at noon, another steamer sails for Europe, and if we act to-day I am assured that the intelligence will reach the "Cambria" in time to be conveyed by her. If we do not act to-day, it is certain that our action must be deferred till after the meeting of the French National Convention, for the simple reason that many of us are in honor committed to the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN,] to proceed to the consideration of the Judiciary Bill to-morrow and on Saturday. I, myself, am thus committed to the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON,] to go with him for the taking up of the California Bill next week. The question then is, action now or not at all.

Mr. HOUSTON.—I disclaim any intention of delaying action on this subject; nor have I the least hesitation in the course which I shall take. I shall vote for the resolution, and intend to give it all the support which it is in my power to extend; but it really seems to me to be impossible to terminate the discussion to-day. The President's message will go by the "Cambria" and that will, I am inclined to think, afford a pretty fair indication of the feeling of the American people. In that document, the President has announced that he has recognized and approved the action of our minister in Paris. I therefore renew my motion.

The yeas and nays were called for, but the motion was withdrawn.

Mr. UNDERWOOD renewed the motion, and remarked that the argument of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations did not apply, as the joint resolution could not go out in the Cambria. It had first to receive the action of the House of Representatives.

Mr. DOWNS.—The action of the Senate can be conveyed to Europe.

Mr. UNDERWOOD.—That can be communicated by telegraph to-morrow in season to reach the steamer.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—If the Senator from Kentucky will give me leave, I will state, in reply to the remark which he has just made in reference to a telegraphic despatch, that I was apprised last night, and have been again informed to-day, that in case the resolution passed the Senate to-day, a copy of it will be transmitted to New York by express in time to reach the "Cambria."

Mr. UNDERWOOD.—I renew my motion.

The yeas and nays being called for and seconded, were ordered and taken with the following result:

YEAS—Messrs. Badger, Baldwin, Butler, Greene, Hale, Phelps, Spruance, Bell, Underwood—9.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Ashley, Atchison, Atherton, Bagby, Benton, Breese, Clarke, Cuttenden, Dayton, of Mich., Dickinson, Dix, Douglas, Downs, Felch, Foote, Hannegan, Johnson, of Md., Johnson, of Ga., Mason, Moor, Niles, Rusk, Turney, Westcott—26.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. UNDERWOOD.—I would ask if the motion to postpone the consideration of the subject till the first of June be still pending.

The PRESIDING OFFICER.—It is not now pending.

Mr. UNDERWOOD.—I remarked the other day, that France had signally failed to establish a republic. It was not my design, however, to convey the idea that since 1789, France had made no progress in improving her social and political condition. I simply intended to communicate the idea, that in her efforts to establish a republic she had signally failed, and my object now is to prove it, and to state the reason why she has failed. If the report of this debate should ever be read in France, it would give me great pleasure if the few remarks which I intend to make could be considered by the French people, for in them, I believe, if they were duly weighed, they would find something to aid them in their effort to establish liberty, as the great principles to which I desire to direct your attention are everywhere absolutely indispensable, alike in the establishment and maintenance of free institutions.

It is altogether a mistake to suppose that in regard to the abstract rights of man, the French people—at least a certain portion of them—have not been perfectly well informed since 1789. Since this subject has been presented the other day, I have refreshed my recollection by examing some of the historical works in the Library, and I have found that in all the various constitutions adopted by the French people, the rights of the citizen are, perhaps, just as clearly defined as they are in the constitution of the United States. The rights of life, property, and personal liberty are fully defined; and in some of these constitutions there is a division of the government into the several departments of legislative, judicial, and executive. Now what is the reason that these constitutions have not been executed? It has been the fault of the people. The failure is not traceable to any defect in the principles announced and laid down, but to the individuals who have been incapable of maintaining these principles and administering the government established upon these foundations. Allow me to give a few instances of the inability of the French people to carry out the principles which they themselves had embodied in their written constitutions. France adopted a constitutional monarchy by the written constitution of 3d September, 1791, which was the result of three years labor. Under this constitution one legislative or national assembly of seven hundred and fifty-five members, whose unctions were to terminate at the close of every second year, was established. This constitution provided for a monarchy, but the King was only to reign by the law and by its sanctions. The King might recommend subjects of consideration, but the national assembly only could propose and decree the laws. The power of war and peace and the ratification of treaties were taken from the King and put under the jurisdiction and control of the national assembly. The absolute negative or veto was taken from the King, but he might suspend until the two successive legislatures presented the same law, when he was bound to give his assent. When three successive legislatures deemed amendments of the constitution necessary, a convention or assembly of revision was to be elected for the purpose of amending or reforming the constitution, but their proceedings were to be obligatory without submitting them to the sanction of the King.

On the 1st of October, 1791, the national assembly convened under the new constitution. A decree or law against the emigrants was presented for the approval of the King. He refused to give his assent. On the 30th of May, 1792, the assembly decreed the dissolution of the King's guard. On the 20th of June, 1792, an insurrection commenced against the King and constitution, which became perfectly successful on the 10th of August, by two decrees, one suspending the functions of the King and the other ordering the convocation of a new national convention. On the 2d and 3d of September horrible massacres commenced. On the 21st of September the convention held its first session and abolished royalty. On the 25th of September a republic was proclaimed.

Having passed through scenes of horror, on the 24th of June, 1793, a constitution for a republic was presented to the people, beginning with an excellent declaration of rights in which four terms, "equality, liberty, safety, and property" embraced all. The terms are now reduced to three, "liberty, equality, and fraternity." The constitution of the 24th of June, 1793, in place of the King substituted an executive council of twenty-four members, to be chosen by the legislative body from candidates nominated by the electoral assembly of the departments. This constitution, it is believed, was never put into operation, but was superseded by a decree of the 10th of October, 1793, vesting all authority in a committee of public safety until peace should take place. On the 16th of October, 1793, Marie Antoinette was beheaded. On the 10th of June, 1794, the revolutionary tribunal to punish the "enemies of the people" was created, and this tribunal sent to the guillotine all those suspected of being aristocrats. Blood flowed in torrents. The Christian religion was torn down and denounced, the "goddess of reason" was set up, and Robespierre celebrated the fête or procession in honor of the Supreme Being.

On the 22d of August, 1795, a new constitution was presented with another excellent bill of rights. This constitution made some progress. It divided the legislative body into a council of ancients and the council of five hundred, and prohibited their members from exercising executive or judicial functions. The council of ancients was to consist of two hundred and fifty members, not less than forty years of age. The members of the council of five hundred were required to be thirty years old. The council of ancients could only approve or reject the resolutions of the council of five hundred. Under this constitution the executive power was vested in five directors, to be chosen by the council of ancients from ten persons nominated by the council of five hundred. This constitution was adopted by the people, by a vote of 1,057,390 to 49,977, and went into operation.

Soon, however, the two chambers began to disagree; the directors exercised the most tyrannical powers; two of the directors, fifty-two members of the councils, and scores of other citizens were transported to Guiana, in South America. At length, in the midst of every sort of confusion, Bonaparte, in November, 1799, puts an end to the council of five hundred and the directory with the bayonet, and another constitution, on the 13th of December, 1799, was promulgated. This constitution established the three consuls for ten years indefinitely re-eligible, with Napoleon as premier, a senate of eighty members for life, and a tribunate of one hundred members to be kept up by electing a fifth part yearly, its members indefinitely re-eligible, and a legislative body of three hundred members. By this constitution the consuls alias the government, were to propose all laws. The tribunate might discuss them and by a vote adopt or reject. The tribunate were to send three speakers to the legislative body to explain its views in regard to the projects of law proposed by the councils and the legislative body was to decide without discussion. The senate was to have a supervision of the acts of the legislative body and of the government, and to decide their constitutionality, and to suggest what laws ought to be proposed, and what laws ought to be passed, and what improvements ought to be undertaken. The senate was chiefly an advisory, but not an authoritative body. This consular constitution was adopted by 3,011,007 votes to 562. The senate became all powerful in overturning republicanism and establishing the empire. On the 18th of May, 1804, the senate amended the constitution and made Napoleon Emperor as the head of a new dynasty, and made many other changes to establish the empire. Once more, on the 22d of April, 1815, Napoleon "Emperor by the grace of God and the constitution" gave a long amendment to the organic law. This was during the one hundred days' reign.

On the 4th of June, 1814, Louis the XVIII, after he was placed on the throne by the allies, gave the French people a constitution, and on the 9th of August, 1830, Louis Philippe adopted a constitution, which the late revolution has subverted.

I have thus briefly reviewed the forms and the fate of the various constitutions which the people of France have adopted from time to time. It will be at once perceived that the failure of the French people to establish liberal institutions heretofore has not been owing to their ignorance of the principles of free government. The great point to which the attention should be directed is, the necessity of unwavering adherence to the principles of free government. Would to God I could impress on every man in France the importance of that adherence! Every where, when the rights of man are involved, at home or abroad, the paramount duty is to obey a rule. We have French Dorrism in America, and wherever it exists the stability of government is threatened. Unless the principles of free government be adhered to, there can be no liberty. The French people have heretofore committed the fatal error of allowing legislative assemblies to be supreme. Unless they can now act with deliberation, good sense and strict fidelity to principle and rule, there is no hope for them; and I wish them to know that as an American Senator that it is my earnest wish that they may so act.

With respect to the resolutions before us, I was of opinion that we should have postponed any action on them until the future had been somewhat more clearly indicted. But it is manifest that the Senate will act immediately. I shall not renew my motion to postpone, which I am informed is no longer pending. I shall vote for the resolution on the ground, that every effort made by any people to obtain free government does aid in qualifying them for sustaining popular institutions. The effort itself, even if unsuccessful, is salutary. It is like the child learning its lesson Nations cannot be taught the principles of liberty in a day. We did not so acquire our liberties. Our progress was gradual, until now the principles of free government have taken deep root in the American mind.

If the expression of our sympathy will afford any encouragement and support to the French people, they will have it with all my heart It is my fervent prayer, that they may be imbued with that spirit and those principles, by which alone their success can be anticipated and secured! But in justice to myself, I have deemed it proper to make these remarks in order to exhibit the ground on which I desired a postponement of our action.

Some conversation then took place relative to a few verbal alterations in the resolution reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations, which had been suggested, and in which the chairman expressed his concurrence.

The question being called for by several Senators, it was taken on the following amendment offered by the Senate from New Hampshire, [Mr. HALE.]

Add in the 5th line, after the word government, these words:

"And manifesting the sincerity of their purpose by instituting measures for the immediate emancipation of the slaves of all the colonies of the republic."

The yeas and nays were demanded, and being seconded were ordered and taken with the following result:

YEAS—Mr. Phelps—1

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Atherton, Bell, Bradbury, Breese, Butler, Calhoun, Cass, Crittenden, Davis, of Mississippi, Dickinson, Dix, Douglas, Downs, Felch, Foote, Hannegan, Houston, Johnson, of Maryland, Johnson, of Georgia, Lewis, Mason, Moor, Niles, Rusk, Sprunce, Underwood, Westcott.—28.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CASS.—Mr President, I do not mean to exhibit so much want of tact, as to make a formal speech upon this subject, when the Senate is evidently impatient to come to a decision. I have but little to say, and that little I shall say briefly. It concerns rather the preference, which I have for the resolution of the Senator from Ohio, over the resolutions of the committee, than the general topic under discussion to which there appears to be little positive objection.

What do we propose to do sir? To congratulate the French people upon the liberty which they have just acquired, and the free principles they have established as the basis of their government. We believe that our congratulations at this time will not only be acceptable to them, but useful to the great cause of freedom throughout the world. This tribute, from the oldest and unfortunately I may add, from almost the only republic free from internal dissentions, to a great nation just entering into the career of self-government, will be received and welcomed in France as a proof of interest and solicitude, naturally arising out of the past, and encouraging for the future. And especially will it be acceptable at the commencement of the great work, when the new-born republic finds itself surrounded with powerful monarchical governments, jealous of the progress of liberty, and whose very existence may be put to hazard by the portentous event, which is fixing the gaze of mankind. The expression of our sentiments under these circumstances was a duty due to France, to ourselves, and to the great cause of human freedom; but that duty has become still more imperative by the discussion in which we are now engaged. We cannot halt in our course, and withhold our congratulations, without giving the most serious offence to the French people, and without in fact announcing to the world that the struggle in which they are engaged, will terminate unfortunately, and that they are unfit for those political blessings, which their fathers aided our own to acquire, and which we hope will go down unimpaired to the latest posterity. And what is the objection to the annunciation by Congress of that sympathy which the whole people feel so deeply, and express so plainly? I see none sir. None at all. There is no internal dispute in France as to its government. There is no contest between authority on one side, and rebellion or revolution on the other. The old government has disappeared. The dynasty of the younger branch of the family of the Bourbons has passed into history, as much as the dynasty of the older branch; or as that of Napoleon; aye as much as the dynasty of the Pharoahs. The wise man tells us, that there is a time for all things. These things have had their time, and that time has passed away. It is with the years beyond the flood. The people of France have resumed that power which belongs to them, and I hope and trust they will exercise it wisely, and provide for the establishment of a government protecting the rights of all, and securing internal peace and social order.

I prefer the original resolution of the Senator from Ohio to that reported by the committee. I do not think it is liable to the verbal criticism with which it has been assailed. I think its meaning is clear and obvious. It founds our congratulations upon the successful efforts of the French people to consolidate or strengthen liberty by the establishment of its just principles. This is definite and true, and its great merit in my eyes is, that it throws no doubt upon the future. And because the other resolution does so, is one principal reason why I object to it. I speak of what has been done "thus far," and uses other terms of uncertainty.

Mr. President, doubts hang over this revolution, as they hang over all the works of man. But it seems to me it would be in very bad taste in a public act of sympathy and congratulation like this, to speak in hesitating terms, and to express our doubts at the very moment we tender our good wishes. Certainly the French people are making a great experiment, and how long since we were making one? How long since our own government was an experiment, rather than experience? Mr. Jefferson called it so in his inaugural address, and here in this very Senate, in this sanctuary of liberty, since I have had a seat here, more than once have we heard the most dismal forebodings, the darkest auguries, the wailing, if not the warning-cry, that the death-knell of liberty was tolling, and that we had little else to do, but to prepare her grave. If no nation is to be congratulated upon its progress in the principles of free government, till no clouds of uncertainty rest upon its future, we must content ourselves with being silent spectators of the great and interesting events around us, shutting our hearts to all sympathy, and taking counsel from dishonorable caution, and not from rational hope.

Our desire is to congratulate the French people upon what they have actually done, leaving to Him who holds in his hand the fate of nations, to guide their future destiny by his own good pleasure. They have done enough to merit congratulations from every human being who loves liberty, or who hopes for its enjoyment by the nations of the earth. They have resisted oppression; a series of efforts which, if not resisted, would have shown that they were fit only for the bonds preparing for them; the least of which would have roused up twenty millions of Americans, as one man, to fight the battle of liberty—and to gain it. They have overturned the late government and established one of their own, and with a spirit of wisdom and moderation, which, under all the circumstances, has been rarely equalled in the world. The act of the provisional government—the temporary Fourth of July declaration, I may call it, of the French people lays down many of the just principles of human freedom, which will find a responsive echo in this country.

I fully agree with the honorable Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. UNDERWOOD,] in his excellent remarks, upon this branch of the subject. Whatever may be the result of this movement, the cause of freedom must gain by it. Nations, which have long slumbered in the quiet of despotism, cannot suddenly awake and wisely exercise the new power they find in their possession. Time and experience, and knowledge, are necessary to teach us how to guard general principles by just securities; and while sustaining the rights of all, how to check the passions of each. But, if every struggle is a trial, it is also a lesson. Something is learned at every step. The movement cannot be long either stationary or retrograding. Since the great revolution of 1789, the French people have passed through many trying scenes. They had much to learn, and they have learned much. They have shown, at any rate, that they are not fit for monarchy, or rather that monarchy is not for them. Since that period there have been, I think, twelve or thirteen fundamental changes in the government, about one to every five years. And in the present century, there have been seven different phases of monarchical government, including the temporary and permanent consulships, both of which belonged essentially to that class of power. Now, what chance is there, that such a form of authority can survive the attacks to which it must and will be exposed; especially considering the rapidly advancing opinions of the French people? It cannot be. The experiment of monarchy has been tried and found wanting. The decree has gone forth, and is already executed. There is a vast deal of intelligence in France, and as much true patriotism as in any country under Heaven. The people are high-minded, generous, nimble, impulsive, indeed, but yielding always to noble sentiments. Most cordially do I wish them success, and I will not suffer my hopes to be clouded by apprehensions. Certainly there are difficulties in their way. What people, bond or free, are without them? But there are none, that time and moderation cannot overcome, and none, I persuade myself, that the French people will not overcome. Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof. If this trial succeed, the destiny of France is fixed and safe, as much so as belonging to any great political effort in the world. If not, it is a step the nearer towards the great consummation of freedom, and the lesson the more for those who are to bring it about.

The question then being on the adoption of the resolution as reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations, a reading of the resolution was called for, and it was read as follows:

A joint resolution tendering the congratulations of the United States to the people of France.

Resolved, &c., That in the name and on behalf of the American people, the congratulations of this government are hereby tendered to the French people, upon the great change in their form of government and their successful efforts thus far to found for their country institutions similar to our own.

Be it further resolved, That the moderation, humanity, regard for order, and veneration for christianity, manifested by the French people, in the accomplishment of their freedom, inspire the confident hope that their deliberations in the organization of the new government will be so directed, under Providence, as to insure the liberty, the true glory, and enduring happiness of a great and enlightened nation.

And be it further resolved, That Congress fully approves the conduct of our minister, Richard Rush, in his prompt recognition of the provisional government of France.

And be it further resolved, That the President of the United States be and he is hereby requested to transmit these resolutions to the American minister at Paris, with instructions to present them to the supreme authorities of the French republic.

On this question the yeas and nays were demanded, and being seconded, were ordered and taken with the following result:

YEAS—Messrs. Bell, Butler, Calhoun, Clarke, Davis, of Mississippi, Dix, Johnson, of Maryland, Johnson, of Georgia, Lewis, Mason, Niles, Phelps, Turney—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Ashley, Atchison, Atherton, Breese, Cass, Crittenden, Dickinson, Douglas, Downs, Fetch, Foote, Hannegan, Henston, Moor, Rusk, Spriance, Underwood, Westcott—19

The question recurring on the original resolution offered by the Senator from Ohio—

Mr. CRITTENDEN said: I wish to occupy the attention of the Senate for only five minutes on this subject, and it is rather because I differ from some of my respected friends, than with the expectation of enlightening or instructing the Senate, that I desire to make any remarks at all. Some of my friends have supposed that the Senate of the United States ought not to express, because they have no power to express, the congratulations of the American people to the French government in the form of this resolution. I do not consider that there is any question of power involved. We do not exercise any power. We express a sentiment or opinion, and that is all, and that is a right belonging to every individual. It would be strange, then, if we had not that right. It would be strange that on the occurrence of a scene of so animating a character, the Senate of the United States was the only body in Christendom, which was to be perfectly paralyzed, standing as a sort of caput mortuum in the midst of the civilized world. No, sir, we have a right to do this. But it is said we ought to delay the expression of our congratulations; that enough has not yet been indicated to enable us to pronounce judgment. I concur in that—enough has not occurred to enable us to pronounce a final judgment; but the question is now presented whether enough has not occurred to make us rejoice and offer congratulations to France and to the world. If we are to wait until all the consequences of the revolution are known, before we make up our minds to congratulate them upon what has been done, when will that time come? The youngest man here will not live to see that day. Either for good or for evil these consequences will extend beyond our day. It is one of the great events of the world—an event full of mighty consequences to mankind. There is no exaggeration in using such language in reference to it. It is the greatest movement in social and civilized life that has occurred within our knowledge—one of the great signs and marks and wonders of the time. It is an event exciting the hopes and fears and tremulous anxiety of mankind.—

I have my fears about it, but I allow my hopes to preponderate. It is, indeed, a mighty work, requiring a great degree of virtue, intelligence, and experience, which is rare in the midst of alarmed Europe. In the midst of hostile crowns and principalities they have made this great experiment. I hope, sir, that the God of truth and liberty will go with them in this mighty trial, and that they are destined to be successful. But whether this revolution itself is to form the basis, to be the proximate cause of a great amelioration in the condition of mankind, I know not, I cannot anticipate. But however that may be, of one thing I am satisfied, that its ultimate consequences cannot but be for the good of humanity. The French revolution in 1792, with all its carnage and tumults, and terror which it spread through the world, of it who can say that from all that blood and carnage good to mankind has not accrued? The earth and the sea have covered up the victims of that revolution. They are no more. They have disappeared from the sight of mankind and we can only look back and mourn over them as over other events that have occurred. But the great principles of liberty involved in that contest, have lived to grow and increase and spread abroad among mankind. A new world of intellect has been opened—a new sense of freedom has been spread through the civilized world. The ideas and principles to which it gave rise, though for a time they seemed to be trampled on by the iron heel of tyranny, yet live; and I trust in God will become more universally extended. So it will be with this revolution. Gentlemen, for reasons no doubt which appear to themselves satisfactory, imagine this to be nothing more than a temporary ebullition of popular feeling, and that it will finally go down in crime and disaster. It may do so, but what has it not already done? It has shown to the world the power of public opinion. Here is an established government with its army of an hundred thousand men at the command of the reigning sovereign, a sovereign who has been seated permanently for seventeen years upon the throne of his ancestors, tracing back his royal descent for centuries, suddenly finding its ramparts broken down; and by what? It was not by the power of a mob under temporary excitement—not by a sudden outbreak of popular feeling. No, sir, there was a great and majestic feeling pervading the whole mass of the people; that feeling it was that took from the sword of his army its edge. The ultima ratio of kings was here at an end. Public opinion overruled it. A mighty moral change was proclaimed by a power that is above all thrones—greater, more exalted, more irresistible than all their impregnable ramparts and fortifications! The change is strange and grand! The movement of the people, produced as it was by a deep sense of what was due to themselves, is to be applauded.—Sir, I congratulate them. France may have to go through many disastrous convulsions before she attains her great aim—the establishment of a system of free government. I wish I could believe that this revolution is to be the proximate cause. I am by no means confident that it is so; but I see enough to give me hope. I see enough in the event that has occurred to induce me to congratulate the French people. They have done a great work. It is for this that I congratulate them. It is a work which will be the source of future intellectual and moral influence upon the heart of man. It cannot be otherwise than productive of good, and it is for this we congratulate France, and bid her God speed!

Mr. BUTLER.—Lest my vote upon this subject should be mistaken, I beg to detain the Senate a single moment. If I have manifested any hesitation in regard to this matter it has not been from an aversion to congratulate France upon the formation of a republic. But when the Senate of the United States are called upon to be the organ of the people in the expression of their congratulations, it appeared to me to be proper that any resolution which might be adopted, should be characterized by simplicity of elaboration, and should go forth under the sanction of a beautiful propriety, becoming the great occasion on which we are called upon to act. Had it been left to me, I would have preferred that we should have had all the securities of law—that we should have had the recommendation of the Executive upon which we might act. It was for this reason that I preferred the resolutions which came from the Committee on Foreign Relations. Not that I would detract from the merits of the resolution of the Senator from Ohio—I had another reason. I heard doctrines avowed that were calculated to alarm me. When I offer congratulations to the goddess of liberty, I will not do it with a firebrand in my hand. When I offer congratulations to that goddess, I do it as if she were associated with her sister, the goddess of wisdom. It may be in the wild excitement of France, that we shall see the light of her republic only in the fires that are destroying the very frame-work of society. I have had some distrust, sir, arising from the experience of the past; and if I manifested any distrust on this occasion, it has been from no disinclination to sympathize with France upon forming a republic under the guarantees of a well defined constitution. I am willing, sir, to sanction what the people of France have done; I am willing to give every encouragement to the developement of an enlightened and irresistible public opinion, but I will not sanction all the doctrines and opinions that have come from the provisional government. If I have hesitated it is because what I do, I would do deliberately. I have detained you, sir, longer than I intended.

Mr. PHELPS.—I did not intend to trouble the Senate again, and I shall certainly not detain them long. In reference to the remarks which fell from the distinguished Senator from Kentucky, I have to say, that his course of reasoning rather tended to confirm my doubts. He spoke of the progress of public opinion.—What evidence have we of its progress? In the first place the national guard, who were charged with the safety of the kingdom, broke their trust—the hundred thousand bayonets which were to protect the throne, were pointed against the throne. I am not the advocate of crowns nor of thrones, but what assurance have we that this same public opinion which brought the multitude of Paris, and the hundred thousand troops in concert, may not be brought to bear upon the provisional government, and if it should be, the provisional government could not exist for a moment? If I were satisfied that this combination of opinion would all tend to the establishment of a government which would be permanent, I should be the last one to withhold my vote. But let us look at the probabilities. They are a people that are disposed to revolutions.—When the heir to the throne was presented to the people, and a voice from the gallery cried out, "It is too late!" did it not exhibit a determination to destroy, to listen to no reasoning? Perhaps the man that uttered the expression was not aware of the effect it would produce. But its effect only shows us how slight a thing is sufficient to influence the popular will in that country. If I could anticipate that the result would be the establishment of a free government, I would sympathize most heartily in the movement—it is my fear which prevents me.

Sir, there are considerations connected with this subject from which we all revolt. When the wheel of revolution begins to revolve, who can affect to tell where it will stop? When the doctrines of universal equality are preached, who can tell what effect is to be produced? I am approaching a subject that I have uniformly avoided—a subject from the discussion of which I uniformly shrink. I know its dangers, and if these doctrines of universal equality are to be preached, if they are to receive the sanction of Congress, it behooves gentlemen to inquire of themselves to what extent they will carry us. If we are to give our sanction to every revolutionary effort which prostrates at once existing governmental establishments and domestic relations, it may well become us to inquire to what extent such a movement is likely to be carried. There is one feature in the decrees of this provisional government of which I do not by any means approve. A decree—not a theory on the subject of human liberty—but a decree, cutting up by the roots an existing institution, has been adopted by the provisional government. It is a question affecting ourselves. We have a set of people among us (you may call them fanatics if you please) who in their liberal notions of human liberty, are disposed to quarrel with certain institutions which exist under our government. Sir, I would leave to every portion of the nation the management of their own concerns. But if we are to endorse all the revolutionary movements that are made, where are we to stop? Why, we may have a thousand fanatical theories in our own country, some of them perhaps well founded, but others of the most wild and extravagant description. No man ever saw a revolution in which the doctrines which gave rise to it were not carried to extremes. Before we give our unqualified approbation, then, to what has been done, in my humble judgment, we should await patiently its final consummation; and I confess I am somewhat surprised to find gentlemen on this floor ready to give their unqualified approbation to the proceedings of the French provisional government, whilst they would not listen a moment to petitions humbly presented to Congress upon the point upon which that government has acted. It is suggested they have revoked this decree. If they have, they still stand on the footing that all men are free and equal, that every man has a right to vote, Algerines and all, every man except Negroes. And the very revocation of that decree shows the insincerity of their professions. If an Algerine is entitled to the privileges of a French citizen—if there is equality among all sorts, all grades, all classes, as regards political privileges, upon what principle, in the name of Heaven, is the colored race excluded? I go with the French people in any proposition which to my mind appears rational, but if they in the first place declare this equality, and in the next place make it unequal, I will have nothing to do with any such proceeding. I have made these remarks simply to show that there are very strong grounds to doubt as to what the results of this revolution will be. I hope for the best, but I fear the worst; and, as I said before, I shall prefer that this expression of congratulation for the present be withheld.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—I listened this morning with great attention to the very able remarks of the Senator from Vermont, and I thought that I noticed an allusion to an unfortunate expression of mine. Like the Senator, I fear for the result, but as far as the revolution has gone it has been marked by nothing but what we must all recognize as favorable, particularly since they have cast off the little piece of extravagance to which the Senator has alluded. I merely wish to acquit myself, sir, of having in the slightest degree approved of that proceeding on the part of the provisional government.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi.—I must ask the indulgence of the Senate for a few minutes, for a purpose similar to that avowed by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER.] This is rendered necessary by the intimation which has been given, that the absence of so many Senators from the chamber rendered it unadvisable to record the votes upon the final passage of the resolution before the Senate; without such record and without explanation, the preliminary vote given by me would be subject to misconstruction. I voted for the substitution of the resolutions reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations, because they seemed to me coextensive with all which has occurred in France, claiming and receiving the approbation and sympathy of the people of the United States, and because the committee acted upon information officially communicated by the President, by which the matter was first brought properly before the Senate.

Ever ready, in whatever quarter of the globe it may appear, to welcome a new republic into the family of nations, ever prompt to cheer a people struggling for the establishment and maintenance of popular right, it was not for me to stand listless by when the tidings came of the great, the glorious achievements of our ancient friend and ally, France. Sooner, sir, would I encounter disappointment, sooner see our sympathies come back shorn than refuse to send them forth on an occasion like this. Yet it becomes us to consider the time, the manner of expression used to convey our sympathies—deliberately to consider the extent, and the subject of our congratulations. When a people not prepared, as were the fathers of our republic, by the inheritance of free institutions, are suddenly invested with sovereign power, errors and excesses may be reasonably expected, and whilst it is not our province to correct or condemn, it may be useful, as it is surely proper, to discriminate in our approbation. This appeared to me well and prudently done in the resolutions offered by the committee as a substitute for those of the Senator from Ohio, and constituted the ground of my preference; but I was prepared to vote for either, and have no opposition to offer to those which the Senate in committee have chosen.

With our sympathies for the effort of the French people to establish republican government, we may well mingle our congratulations for the extraordinary exhibition which, in the heat of revolution, they have given of moderation, of self-control, and of regard for human life, that great test of the progress of civilization.—These are high evidences of the fitness of the French people for self-government, and justify the hope that they are prepared for that universal suffrage and equality which they have asserted, and which the Senator from Vermont has chosen as the object of his special condemnation. Equality among the citizens is the only basis on which republican government can rest; it is the foundation on which our own was placed, and where it now securely stands like the house which the wise man built upon a rock, whilst palaces lie crushed upon the sand, or threaten to fall. To assert political equality is to vindicate the dignity of man, to insure the adaptation of government to his condition, and therefore to render it permanent. Revolution is the remedy for violated nature—it can never be directed against a government which rests on the broad basis of popular will, speaking through universal suffrage. The only power to overturn is that which supports such a government, and as it has been called the most advanced, so I think it may be called the most durable form of human institutions. Wherever a class or a family claim to govern by prescriptive right, there must be a struggle between the rulers and the ruled; because the one cannot sympathize with the feelings, or appreciate the wants and the interests of the other. True, all people are not qualified for the highest form of government, and no other country presents so many instructive lessons upon governmental changes as that, the recent revolution in which we are now considering.

Cæsar conquered ancient Gaul and governed it as a province. The inhabitants became citizens of the Roman empire, but their domestic condition was little affected. Rome was extended, but the Romans remained in Italy. When Alaric and Attila descended from the plains of Asia upon the richer regions of Europe, the inhabitants of Germany, driven from their homes, descended in their turn upon Gaul; they came not like the Roman legions, prompted by military enthusiasm and seeking the glory of conquest, but as houseless wanderers to take from the weak, as they had surrendered to the strong. Then the lands of Gaul were wrenched from the original possessors and divided among the conquering chiefs. Now, for the first time in Gaul, the decree of nature was violated, and the inheritance of the land was violently transferred from those who possessed to cultivate it. The progress has been steady, though slow, to return the soil to the people—to bring power from its overshadowing height to the level of the governed. And it is the steadiness of this advance which sustains my confidence in future progress. The grand vassals of the Frank dynasty, like twelve mighty columns, supported the throne high above all contact with the people, alike despising their assistance or assault. These columns fell in the time of Louis XI. and the grand Seignieurie was established by Francis I. The height and size of the columns were diminished, but their number increased, and then came the period of the reformation. The minds of men asserted the right to inquire. The Seignieurie gave way, and the throne sunk for its support to the heads of the aristocracy. It was now within the reach of the people; it had been lowered until, in the language of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HANNEGAN,] blood might flow over it. The convention of 1792 proved the power of the people to reach the throne—it showed the ability to destroy, but not the capacity to construct. The assignats gave the people the power to buy and add to the subdivision of the lands of France. Heretofore the throne had approached people by oppression, thenceforward the operation of leveling was to be two-fold—the people were to rise as royalty sunk.

When Napoleon declared on the Champ de Mars that the right of the ruler was wholly derived from the consent of the governed, he uttered a truth understood by those whom he addressed, and which was sentence of condemnation on the divine right of kings. The next step in the natural order of things was to break the line of descent. This was done by the selection of Louis Philippe, to be crowned, not for France, but as King of the French. The throne was now brought down to the heads of the two hundred and sixty thousand landed proprietors. It had now descended to the last step, and it was foretold, I trust truly foretold, that Louis Philippe was the last who should wear a crown in France. For years past many eyes have been turned to France, and speculation has been busy as to the consequences likely to follow on the death of the reigning monarch. Events have been hastened by the abdication of the king, and the conduct of the French people under the severe ordeal they have unexpectedly undergone, proves how worthy they are to possess the power of sovereignty. The throne which had been for fourteen centuries sinking, until it approached within one step of the ground, was borne on the shoulders of the uprising masses and offered a holocaust to the genius of republican government. Why shall we distrust the capacity of the French people for self-government? Who has served a longer probation or passed through schools of harder experience? France, the land of science, with a popular press teeming with political intelligence, —her great capital, the controlling mart of the country, filled with daily papers, and a population of whom it is said not a cook or a boot-black but can tell the name of the chief of each bureau of the government, and the general nature of his duties.

Men fly to a remedy and expect relief which cannot be given. Those who hope from a republic to have their wants supplied must meet with disappointment. Such a government can have nothing to give, save that which it takes from the people. In the language of one of our greatest statesmen, Mr. Van Buren, "too much is expected from government." May this truth, so unpalateable to those to whom it was addressed, be early learned and appreciated by our brethren in France. It was not my purpose to do more than express thus briefly the opinions I entertain, and to announce my approval of the resolutions now to be acted on. They are anticipative of future events in France which, I hope, will soon enable us to pass specific resolutions of congratulation, and to embrace our earliest friend as a brother in the family of republics.

The question recurring on the passage of the resolution, it was decided in the affirmative, without one dissenting voice, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Ashley, Atchison, Atherton, Bell, Bradbury, Breese, Butler, Cass, Clarke, Crittenden, Davis, of Mississippi, Dickinson, Dix, Douglas, Dawson, Felch, Fromentin, Hannegan, Houston, Johnson, of Maryland, Johnson, of Georgia, Lewis, Mason, Moor, Niles, Rusk, Spruance, Turney, Underwood, Westcott—32.

SEC. 2. And be it further resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to transmit this resolution to the American minister at Paris, with instructions to present it to the French government.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

On motion, it was

Ordered, That when the Senate adjourn, it be to Monday next.

CONGRATULATIONS TO THE FRENCH.

Mr. MANGUM.—I desire to inquire whether the resolutions which were passed last night, are now in the possession of the Senate subject to a motion for reconsideration or not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER.—They are out of the possession of the Senate.

Mr. MANGUM.—Had they been in the possession of the Senate, I should have requested some friend to make a motion to reconsider the vote by which they were passed, with the view of giving gentlemen who were accidentally absent from the Senate when the vote was taken, an opportunity of recording their votes. With regard to myself, I should have voted for the resolution which passed the Senate, with very great cheerfulness. Yet, I would have preferred the resolutions which I had the honor to move yesterday [illegible] and which I have adopted, my vote would cheerfully have been given for the resolution which was adopted by the Senate. The resolutions which were rejected, were the production of the committee on Foreign Relations. They were prepared by the chairman of that Committee, the Senator from Indiana. He entered most cordially into the spirit of any resolution, expressing our congratulations to the French people. And he had committed himself in advance to go for the resolution of the Senator from Ohio. He felt bound, therefore unless he had been voluntarily released, to vote in favor of that resolution. I regret the more, therefore, my absence, from the fact, that owing to the delicate relations which the chairman of the committee bore to the resolutions of the Senator from Ohio, had I been here, my duty would have been to have taken them in charge and presented them under the most favorable circumstances that I could to the Senate. I would desire, and I had hoped, that after the yeas and nays were taken, and there was found to be perfect unanimity in the body, the journal would have been so amended as to have exhibited the unanimous concurrence of all the members. I rise, sir, simply with the view of indicating that the resolution meets with my hearty concurrence.

Mr. ALLEN.—I did not call for the yeas and nays for the very reason given by the Senator from North Carolina. I thought it would be better that the vote should appear unanimous.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion by Mr. ATHERTON, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Finance be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of Ward and Smith, merchants of the United States residing at San Francisco, Upper California, and that it be referred to the Committee of Claims.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ATHERTON, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives, making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with the various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1849, and for other purposes, reported it without amendments, and gave notice that he will ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of this bill on Tuesday, the 18th instant.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. UPHAM, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Robert Piatt, son of Daniel Piatt, deceased, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WESTCOTT, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Sarah Hubbard, submitted a report, asking to be discharged from its further consideration; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. UPHAM, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Nancy Haggard, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. WESTCOTT, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of Charles Waldron, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report on the subject; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. DOWNS, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, who were instructed to inquire into the subject, reported a bill for the relief of Henry D. Gratiot; which was read and passed to the second reading.

Mr. RUSK, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of Frederick Vincent, administrator of the estate of James Le Caze, deceased, reported a report accompanied by a bill for his relief.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

SAGANAW TREATY.

Mr DOWNS, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom were referred certain documents relating to the claim of T. S. Wendell, submitted a report accompanied by a bill to provide for the school lands purchased by the United States from the Saginaw tribe of Chippewa Indians in the State of Michigan.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed, with the accompanying documents.

SETTLERS IN FLORIDA.

Mr. WESTCOTT, by unanimous consent, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill for the relief of the bona-fide settlers under the acts for the armed occupation and settlement of a part of the Territory of Florida; which was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

FEDERAL COURTS IN NEW JERSEY.

Mr. DAYTON, by unanimous consent, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill in relation to the terms of the Circuit and District Courts of the United States in and for the District of New Jersey; which was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

THE VOLUNTEER BILL.

Mr. CASS moved that the prior orders be postponed and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill providing for the further prosecution of the existing war between the United States and the Republic of Mexico.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—I confess that I am very much surprised at the motion of the honorable Senator. He set it out heard the arrangement that was made for taking up the Judiciary bill on this day. The orders of the Senate seem to be no longer of any force. In fact they only seem to apprize gentlemen that they must be very active in getting possession of the floor. I do hope that the gentleman will not at this moment press this motion.

Mr. CASS.—It would give me great pleasure to yield to the wishes of the honorable Senator, but I gave notice long ago that I would embrace every opportunity for pressing the consideration of the bill which I have named. It has already been superseded at various times by pressing business, and I must say that I feel wholly uncommitted as to any arrangement for permitting any other business to take precedence of it. I understand that the Judiciary bill will occupy much time, and indeed I stand committed before the Senate at all times to press the consideration of the bill for raising the volunteers.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—Did not the Senator vote to make the Judiciary bill the order of the day for to-day?

Mr. CASS.—The volunteer bill was made the order of the day several weeks ago, but orders of the day are superseded almost every day.

Mr. RUSK.—Under ordinary circumstances I would vote to take up the bill which is proposed now before any other business. But yesterday there seemed to be a distinct understanding that if the Senate from Kentucky would give up his right to take up the resolutions of congratulation, we would take up his bill to-day.

Mr. ALLEN.—I am quite anxious to proceed to the consideration of the bill which is the subject of the present motion, but I would suggest to my friend, the Senator from Michigan, that if, as seems more to be the impression, there was an understanding yesterday in regard to proceeding with the bill of the Senator from Kentucky, that it would be but just and proper that the arrangement be acquiesced in, at all events for this day. But if the discussion extends extends beyond to-day then let the bill take its chance of being taken up in preference to any other.

Mr. CASS.—I stated yesterday that I was entirely opposed to proceeding with any other business. I am no party, therefore, to any commitment in favor of the bill of the Senator from Kentucky in the slightest degree, but as it seems to be the prevailing wish to proceed with that bill this day, I will withdraw my motion.

The motion was accordingly withdrawn.

ADULTERATED DRUGS AND MEDICINES.

Mr. DIX, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom were referred the resolution of the Legislature of Mississippi, the memorial of the college of Pharmacy of the city of New York, and sundry other memorials on the subject, reported a bill to prevent the importation of adulterated drugs and medicines; which was read and passed to the second reading.

SHIP ISLAND MADE A PORT OF DELIVERY.

Mr. DIX, from the same Committee, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives to make Ship Island, in the collecting district of Pearl river, a port of delivery, and to authorize the appointment of a Surveyor for said port, reported it with amendments.

Mr. DIX said that with the consent of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN,] he would ask the immediate consideration of this bill, as its speedy passage was important, and if it went upon the calendar it might be some time before it could be reached.

Mr. CRITTENDEN said the Senator must excuse him, but he was extremely anxious to take up the Supreme Court bill without further delay.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, explained that there was urgent necessity for the immediate passage of the bill, and that it would take but a few minutes as there would be no debate upon it.

Mr. CRITTENDEN said if there would be no debate he had no objection to taking up the bill.

The bill was then read a second time, considered as in Committee of the Whole, and the amendments reported from the Committee were agreed to.

No further amendment being made the bill was reported to the Senate, and the amendments were concurred in.

Ordered, That the amendments be engrossed and the bill read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time, as amended, and the title was amended.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives in the amendments.

THE BAY AT CUMBERLAND ISLAND.

Mr. HANNEGAN, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, to whom were referred several memorials on the subject, reported a bill to provide for the repair and improvement of the dam at the head of Cumberland Island in the Ohio river; which was read and passed to the second reading.

THE SUPREME COURT.

The Senate resumed the consideration, as in Committee of the Whole, of the bill from the House of Representatives supplemental to the act entitled an "An act concerning the Supreme Court of the United States," approved June 17 1844.

Mr. BUTLER.—I have no special interest in this bill, but I am one of the committee who reported it. It has already been announced that the committee were divided, and that the bill not come here, therefore, with the sanction of the whole of the Judiciary Committee. Perhaps it would be proper, however, for me as a member of that committee, to give the more obvious reasons which influenced a majority of the committee. At this time there are on the docket of the Supreme Court 170 or 180 cases, and it is impossible that these cases can be disposed of by the judges under the present arrangement. Probably some of them will remain undecided for years—certainly for three or four years—unless some special legislation is adopted on the subject. The more prominent objections which have been urged to this bill have come from the honorable Senator from Missouri, that it is one of a series of measures which are calculated to cut loose, as he expresses it, the Supreme Court from connection with the States by separating it from its circuit jurisdiction. Mr. President, I have no such purpose myself, and in advocating this bill I am influenced by a desire to do an obvious act of justice to the parties who have appealed their cases, and who have a right to have their appeals disposed of. But this cannot be done without legislation. We have it in our power to remove the difficulty, and it seems to me it is incumbent on us to do it. The bill proposes to afford the required relief by authorizing the Judges of the Supreme Court to extend their sitting from three months, which is now their usual session, to twelve months. That is the essential feature of the bill. I do not understand it to be the purpose of this bill to effect any radical change in the judicial system of the United States. I trust there is no such purpose. If you do not adopt this bill, what will be the consequence? New cases will go on accumulating as fast as others are disposed of, and you will always have the docket so burdened that there must be a delay of three or four years before a case can be heard and determined. If you do pass the bill what will be the consequence? No injury can accrue that I am aware of. It is the contrary, a very great benefit will accrue to parties who have cases in litigation before that court. A delay of justice is almost tantamount to a denial of justice. What amount of interest may be involved, I am not prepared to say; but whatever the amount may be, the parties who instigate the suit have a right to be afforded an opportunity of having their claims decided. I would be opposed to the bill, if I supposed for a moment that it would have the effect that is attributed to it by the Senator from Missouri, of cutting off the supreme bench from connexion with the States. I have no such design. I am influenced by the mere obvious purpose, that of removing the difficulty under which that court labors.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—I was one of the minority of the committee who opposed the bill, and I still retain the opinions which influenced me in making that opposition, not only for the reason so forcibly expressed by the Senator from Missouri, but for some additional reasons that I will now address. I regard the passage of this bill as paralyzing the effect of the most important part of the business before all the circuit courts of the United States for the next two years. The district judges, it is true, have the power to sit when the circuit judges have not; but there are cases which they are not permitted to determine, and all such cases are necessarily suspended during the time that the circuit court does not sit. A judge cannot try the appeal or writ of error from his own court, and I beg leave to make on one remark in relation to the delay in the Supreme Court. I have taken some pains to ascertain whether it is attributable to the court or to the vast accumulation of cases, and I do not find anything to justify me in saying, that the court is at all in fault. I find that cases are decided as soon after they are brought into court, as they are in the Supreme Court of New York, Massachusetts, and the other large States of the Union. In the State of Virginia, I find that the delay in their highest court is as great. They are not decided for some three or four years after they are taken up. Besides, many of the cases in the Supreme Court, which are cited to us as evidences of delay, are cases which are not pressed. They are passed over by the consent of the parties concerned. I have had cases in that court, and I have found no difficulty in getting decisions upon them. I do not see that there is any delay that need be complained of. I believe that the cases may all be disposed of, in the time which is allotted for the sitting of the court, as the law now stands. For these reasons, and for those urged by the Senator from Missouri, which I regard as all important, I trust the bill will not pass. It is an innovation, a dangerous innovation. If this court is to be constituted into a great central judiciary power, there must be a total reorganization of the judiciary system. There must be circuit courts established with the judges of which this court will have no connexion. I trust the system will not be changed. It is getting along very well. It is a part of the government that ought not to be meddled with without reason, or for the mere convenience of the judges.

Mr. ASHLEY then addressed the Senate at length in opposition to the bill. His speech is given in the Appendix.

Mr. DAYTON.—I desire to make a very few remarks on this bill. Of course I do not propose to follow the chairman of the committee from whom this bill came, through all his objections. We considered them in committee, and did not regard them as militating against the merits of the bill, which lie within a much narrower compass than that which has been assumed by the honorable Senator from Arkansas. It is proper, in the first place, to look to the evil which this measure is designed to remedy. There are data upon the list, as I am informed by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN,] one hundred and sixty-four cases undisposed of; fifty-two cases having been disposed of at the last session of the court. Assuming then that the same progress shall be made at future sessions of the court, it will require three or four years to dispose of the calendar, while if the present measure of relief be granted, you can dispose substantially of the aggregate of the calendar in a single year—rubbing out old scores, and giving the court a new docket. Such is the present state of the calendar of the Supreme Court, and such is the object sought to be attained by the bill now before the Senate.

Now, what are the objections urged against the passage of the bill? Why, first, it is objected that the bill originates with the judges, and that every other bill relative to the Supreme Court, from 1789 to this hour, originated with them, or through their instrumentality. Now, who are properly to be supposed to be most familiar with the business of the court, and most anxious for its prompt despatch? Sir, we are not to assume that the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States are any other than high-minded, upright and honorable men, desirous of discharging with fidelity and efficiency the high functions imposed upon them by law. It is surely no more than just to those gentlemen, to give them that degree of credit. The court is, then, the very source from which such a measure should emanate with propriety, because it is a source that acts with light and knowledge. And, pray, whence does that very bill which the Senator from Arkansas now proposes as the bill upon which Congress ought to act, emanate? From a majority of the judges of that court; and permit me to say that from consideration of the measure in committee, I am satisfied that if adopted it will produce the very evil which the Senator, and those who think with him, deprecate so much—the separation of the court from the State judicatures, and its continual session here as a central, absolute power. That is the measure of all others most likely to produce the result which the Senator dreads. But I refrain from any remark on that bill till it come before us. At present we have to deal with this temporary law. It provides for the evil. It applies a remedy suggested by the court itself. Is there anything really in the objection that the design is to undermine the present system, and obtain for the court the power of sitting here continually, cutting itself altogether loose from the States? I appeal to the intelligence—to the knowledge of members of the Senate, as to the character of the judges presiding in that court, and ask whether it is possible that such a design can be entertained by them? Those most deeply interested in that court, come here and say—our docket is encumbered by upwards of one hundred and sixty cases. A case coming up now cannot be reached within several years. We ask of you only to allow a prolongation of the term, from three months to one year. We ask no additional remuneration—no additional privileges. We ask only the privilege of laboring continuously for one year, for the purpose of disposing of all the cases on the docket." Such is the appeal and request of the court; and now gentlemen object that this merely covers a design to undermine the present system, and establish a court that is to live here for all time to come, independent of the states! Permit me to ask the Senate with all respect to look at the case as it really exists. There are one hundred and sixty cases on the docket, and that court, with no disposition in the world to put off of labor, ask only that instead of being compelled to adjourn at the end of three months, they may be allowed to labor till the end of the year. One might reasonably imagine that this was a case in which any impeachment of the motives of the court was utterly impossible.

I know perfectly well that there are some inconveniences which may result from the passage of this temporary law, growing out of the condition in which appeals from the district courts may remain during the current year. These appeals may to a certain extent remain undisposed of, but is a comparatively small evil, as compared with the great good which is to be accomplished by the relief of the docket. Gentlemen tell us that delay is not unusual—that in the courts of New York, for instance, cases stand for some legth of time. I grant it, and that very evil has put the courts of New York under foot. It has destroyed them—it has uprooted and overturned the whole judicial system of that state. The evil has gone on increasing from year to year, till the people demolished the courts altogether. Permit me say that the evil, if unchecked, will have the same result here. No business community will, for any great length of time submit to the suspension of business operations for three or four years together, simply because the court has not sufficient power to dispose of the cases on its docket. Something must be done, and the measure now before us if adopted will enable you to apply the remedy in the most unexceptionable manner. No permanent change is sought or intended. I submit, then, whether the objection of the gentlemen is not altogether inapplicable? Whether this be a good bill to afford a permanent remedy is not the question. The Senator informs us that the bill by which it is proposed to apply a permanent remedy has the favorable consideration of a majority of the judges. I believe that the present bill has the approbation of them all. All are willing to come here and labor continuously for a year in order to relieve the docket. This is the whole case, and I submit that the bill ought to pass.

Mr. ALLEN.—I have a very few words to say on this subject. The United States Supreme Court has a jurisdiction, both as regards territory and subject matter, greater than any other judicial tribunal in the world. Every thing, therefore, which relates to the organization of that court, becomes a matter of the gravest importance, and is entitled to the most serious consideration. The judges of the court are elected by the Executive. They are appointed for life. In that respect, the organization of this court is not in harmony with the balance of the political system of this country. It has about it no one single feature by which it is connected either with the States of this Union, or with the people of these States, except it be the circuit feature, which gives the members of the court a direct intercourse and communication with the States and the people of this confederacy. It is in that circuit feature that the strength of this tribunal consists, and the day that that feature ceases to exist in its organization, will the public opinion of this country move upon the subject, and never cease its action, till the tribunal itself is entirely re-organized. If, therefore, I was ever so much disposed to attack this tribunal, and to break it down, the thing that I would first do, would be to encourage the concentration of the tribunal permanently at the capitol of the United States; and its total withdrawal from any communication with the States and people of the Union. I say this to those who may lay a greater estimate upon this tribunal than I do, that if they do not want it to be passed through the burning crucible of the public will, and re-cast in all its elements de novo, they had better let this circuit feature remain untouched.

It is proposed here, to relieve the judges of this court from circuit duties for one year. For, it is a bill of relief from the labor and expense of travel. It is a bill of relief and repose. But it is limited to one year. Now, I have observed, and all who have seen as much of legislation as I have, must also have observed, that when you commence legislating by instalment, you never end. You commence in this case by giving this court one year's relief, and the next year, the same reason existing for a repetition of the act, the precedent of the previous year is pleaded as an additional argument for an extension of the relief one year longer. It is the grant of an exemption from the labor and expense of travel, to the judges of the court; and the same force which is now brought to bear in favor of this bill, through the instrumentality of the present contest of Congress with the judges of the court, will be brought to bear with added strength next session; all the reasons that are now urged being poured forth with the additional one that Congress once did the act. Now, though I have no idea that the gentlemen who advocate this bill, intend any such thing, as I do not suppose that there are any members of this body, who would vote for the permanent concentration of this court here, yet I am convinced that that result will inevitably follow from the adoption of this measure. You commence this business of relief from circuit duty—I care not what the excuse may be,—it is the commencement of a system of relief from circuit duty, freeing them from the labor and expense of travel; and when you commence it, the same reason applying next year for the continuance of it, the same motives which induce us to pass this bill now, being equally influential then, the bill will be renewed and so on ad infinitum.—I view this measure, then, as simply a bill to change the judicial system of the United States, though not so designed, yet in its consequences tending to that point inevitably. Viewing the matter in that light it next becomes a subject of inquiry, what will be the effect upon our political organization? What will be the effect of the existence of a fixed and tribunal, acting, the supreme tribunal, composed of men who hold their places for life, and all men all communication with the States and the people of the States—a Washington city star-chamber, under the influences which act upon the capital where the political powers of the nation are all concentrated temporarily? When that kind of a spectacle is presented to the people of the United States, as a permanent institution, and stood twenty-five years, it would become the supreme power of the government. Power is a thing which generates itself—which enlarges itself—which contains within itself the means of its own expansion, sustenance and support. It wants nothing but time to gratify the cravings of its ambition. Whether it be judicial or not, duration is all that it wants to make itself permanent over any other power that is living and trying and struggling for power; if it were permitted to stand twenty-five years, would render the whole constitution a perfect nullity. In less than ten years it would take the place of your Attorney General in all the decisions of the Executive upon law questions, and thereby connect itself with the administrative portion of the government. The idea would be perfectly natural that the Executive would connect itself with the judiciary—would consult its law-officer employed—uniform—and thus the two would mutually strengthen each other, and engross the powers and energies of the government more and more in one spot in Washington city.

Besides, the permanence and existence of the court here would give it large influence over our deliberations in these halls. The very fact that nine men armed with great power, having great repose in and beyond the reaching popular control, being permanently located here, in Washington would react upon the objects of adulation and importunity and court, and men at a distance who wished to achieve illicit objects in this capitol. It would become a cabal. These results would flow inevitably, if it were not for the fact that such a power would call down upon it the curses of the nation too soon to allow it to take hold and mature itself.

I have always been of opinion that the members of this tribunal ought to be elected for a term of years, and that by the people; and it will not be many years before it will be found that I have more lips than mine. All this idea of life tenure of office is akin to that of hereditary power. an idea which is fast losing its hold upon even the European mind. The nature of this judicial organization is altogether inharmonious with the balance of our political system. It destroys the symmetry of our system; and is founded upon an idea which is utterly ridiculous when applied to American society and institutions. It is founded upon the idea of rendering the judiciary independent of the people; and hence we hear it said on all hands—we read it in our horn-books before we come to the bar—we hear it from the bench and the bar, that the judiciary ought not to be elective. The idea of the independence of the judiciary in England was an idea of liberty. It originated in the fact that by the fiction of the English constitution the King was supposed to administer the laws in his own proper person, and to be present on every bench declaring what the law was. When, therefore, the King was absent, he undertook to supply the place of his presence by sending a court to give their judgment, and mandates, which were implicitly obeyed by the juries. It became essential to the liberties of England in this state of things, that the court should be made independent of the crown, and therefore the judges were appointed for life. But ours is an inversion of the English system; and the only mode of reasoning truly with regard to our system is to reason reversely of what would be true with regard to the English system. That which is true of the English system is for that very reason false here.—There should be no independence of any judiciary here. To make the case analagous, the word independence should apply as between the appointing power and the court, and not as between the people and the court. And to make the case still more analagous, there would have to be a supposition that the appointing power had the right to adjudicate, and in virtue of the right, the power to control those whom it had appointed to adjudicate; both of those positions being false, and not entering in anywise into our system. There should be no tribunal in this country independent of the wholesome influence of public will. Our government rests upon that influence. It is that public will which gives sanction and legality to the acts of our government. It is not the thing which we call a constitution that forms the government of the United States. "Ink and paper cannot form a christian," said a celebrated divine more than two hundred years ago, in a sermon preached before the House of Commons Ink and paper cannot form a government, nor can they make a freeman. Government consists in the will of the people—a will dictated by their interests, and the union of their interests constituting the interests of the nation. The public sympathies, the manners, the morals, the sentiments, the reason of the people, constitute our government. The constitution is to the government what a fence is to a farm, and no more. It defines its limits, and keeps out stray cattle.—But the source, and authority, and power of the government is within—in the hearts and sympathies of the people, to be found at the firesides, and in the family circle, in the neighborhood ideas, and associations. There is the government. and in that sense there should be nothing not amenable to the people

This feature, then, in the organization of the Supreme Court is not in harmony with our system; and I would admonish those gentlemen, who do not think as I do on these points, but wish to maintain this judiciary in its present features, that if they do not wish to sound the death knell, they had better not separate the judges for an hour from circuit duties, and direct intercourse with the people of the States. That is the only feature in the system which connects them with the nation; and if that be struck out, the striking out of the court will follow as naturally as the snuffing of a candle issues in darkness.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—I intend to occupy the attention of the Senate only for a few moments. I regret that gentlemen have chosen this occasion, so unimportant in itself, for the purposes of debating questions and principles which, according to my judgment, are not included in the subject under our consideration.—To what purpose is it to debate the question as to the political character of the Supreme Court of the United States—to debate the question whether it were best to appoint the judges in the manner prescribed for in our constitution, or to change that constitution and make them elective? Where is the necessity of inquiring into the nature and extent of the jurisdiction of the court? Where the propriety, on this occasion, of inquiring into the individual or collective competency of the judges? In no one of any of these particulars, in no regard to any principle or question involved in it as a system, does this bill touch the subject. It takes the court as it is established, as it is organized, as it has always been established—without change or alteration of its jurisdiction, and simply proposes—what? That because of an inconvenient accumulation of business in the Supreme Court of the United States, rendering it impossible for the court to dispose of the business before it in less than two or three years, a remedy should be applied, by which this evil may be obviated. And what is the remedy? This bill simply proposes to authorize the judges of the Supreme Court to hold one session of the court of the year besides that to which they are now limited for the purpose of despatching this accumulated business. Now, what principle is involved in this beyond the simple question of providing a remedy which all admit? Sir, if I understand all the arguments that have any application to this subject, gentlemen would have no objection to this measure if they did not apprehend that it was in ended as a wedge or the commencement, as they expressed it, of another system, having for its object the suspension of the judges of the Supreme Court from all duty in the circuit courts, confining them to the duties belonging to the Supreme Court. Gentlemen imagine this and, therefore, refuse to apply the proposed remedy for an acknowledged evil. They do not suppose that the evil is so great but that it may be borne So it may. And gentlemen speak of the danger of the remedy. Let us examine it. The bill provides for a single year. According to existing laws the next term of the Supreme Court will commence on the first Monday in December next. We are now in the first week in April. Four months of the year have then expired. The three corresponding months of the next year will be occupied by the Court in the transaction of its business, so that the whole peril of the proposed measure lies within the compass of eight months. But, forsooth, if we indulge the Supreme Court—for gentlemen seem to regard it as an indulgence—by granting them permission to come here and despatch the business of the court in that period, great danger is to arise—a new system is to grow up—a new principle is to be evolved which is to relieve the judges of the Supreme Court from all other duties except those belonging to the Supreme Court—and what not serious political consequences will result! I do not apprehend any such thing. The bill itself seems to guard against any such consequences by its limitation to one year. It is proposed solely as a particular remedy for a particular case. But are not these consequences [illegible] I can judge from the opinions that I have heard expressed, who is willing to change [illegible] so far as to separate the judges from the circuit court and limit them to the Supreme Court. I am glad to believe that there is not a single Senator who entertains that opinion. When the Senate then have the issue and consequences in their own hands, I ask, what solid ground there is for any apprehension? Is there any danger that the Senator from Arkansas will be, even in these revolutionary times, so perfectly revolutionized in his opinions as to come back prepared to reverse all his opinions which he has expressed here to-day? Here is an evil which we can correct. This bill proposes to correct it. The only objection is, that the remedy proposed is one out of which dangerous consequences may hereafter grow; and we have no security for ourselves that that will not be the case. Why, sir, we are afraid of ourselves! If I believed that ever so remotely or possibly this measure could be perverted to such an object as gentlemen seem to apprehend, I would be one of the last to vote for it. But I do not desire to go into this subject. I desire rather to have this bill voted upon than any thing else. If the Senate be against it let it go.

Another remark or two I must be excused in making. It is supposed that this is a bill for the relief of the judges of the Supreme Court. Relieve them for what? It relieves them by requiring them to hold a term of the Supreme Court and discharge all the arduous duties of their office. What relief is there in that? Are these labors less arduous and fatiguing than travelling in the season of the year which has now come, and in any portion or climate of this country from this period till December next? Are these labors less expensive to them individually than travelling in their circuits would be? I apprehend not. But relief it is obvious, is no part of the purpose of this bill. It is only to make it their particular and exclusive duty, within a limited period, to discharge the highest of their duties, the decision of the cases which have accumulated in the Supreme Court of the United States. But the honorable Senator is apprehensive that some cases may not be tried according to law—that some admiralty cases may be delayed to the most tremendous and incalculable detriment to all the parties. And there is another case of which we hear—appeals to the circuit courts. Now litigation may be infinitely more active in the part of the country where the honorable Senator practices his profession so much more profitably than I do; but in the section of the Union from which I come, in twenty years there has not been a case of appeal from the district to the circuit court. And as to the Spanish pirates, the gentleman will agree with me, that our entire coast is free from such a pestilence! But if such a case should occur in these eight months, and a ship-load of pirates should be brought into any port from New Orleans to Boston, this bill permits one of those judges to go there, and hang those pirates secundum artem, and as nicely as the Senator can desire!

Mr. ASHLEY.—I extended my remarks to all cases of felony and murder.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—Well, then, the keeping of a felon out of the penitentiary for a few months in the only possible contingency that may occur. I dare say that in our widely-extended empire, such cases might happen. But do they deserve serious consideration in such a case as that now before us? Some petty robber of your mails—some post boy, or something of that kind, and for the important reason of trying him, all things else must be forgotten, and this remedy for existing known evil, is not to be applied! It seems to me, Mr. President, that the honorable Senator has got his mind a little fevered on this subject, and that he does not view it with that calmness and discretion which usually characterize his labors as chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary. I apprehend that he has allowed his mind to run off, in fact, from the consideration of the particular subject before it, to other principles and questions not at all involved in it, or to minor difficulties that ought not to be allowed any weight. His mind is evidently prejudiced He apprehends that the judges, consulting their own experience, had suggested this bill as a proper remedy for the existing evil, and that that is a sort of Nazareth, out of which no good can come. But as my friend from New Jersey has said, who so well qualified to suggest a remedy as the judges of the court, and are not their suggestions subject to our consideration and judgment? I do not know that the judges have suggested this thing. I know nothing about the fact, but admitting it to be as the gentleman supposes, I derive no prejudice against the measure on that account. Not at all. The judges are very competent persons to suggest a remedy, and the measure is commended to us from that very circumstance.

I do not wish to debate this question; I would rather avoid debate. I desire the decision of the Senate. I have no doubt the minds of Senators are sufficiently made up, and to their judgment I shall bow with all the deference to which it is entitled. I hope, sir, the question may be taken.

Mr. BENTON.—I always regret, sir, when debate takes a personal turn—and when the intentions or wishes or motives of Senators become the subject of remark—the discussion may be regarded as losing become personal. In the little I have said and the little I may say, I leave out of view entirely the intentions of every Senator. I impute to no one a design to separate the Supreme Court of the United States from the States, but I reason from the nature and effect of things. The effect of this measure will be that separation, and it is perfectly immaterial what are the intentions of Senators, or what obligations they may impose upon themselves never to do this again. If a Senator says that he will vote this once and never vote it again, certainly he will do what he says; but it is altogether a personal matter; it depends upon his life—upon his coming here—upon this Senate continuing in time to come, to be exactly what it is to-day. The moment we go into the intention of Senators in regard to our legislation, we fall into the absurdity that the Senate is not only permanent as a body, but permanent in its constituent members—that they are always to sit here, and that having done the thing once they will not do it again. But we are to have successors, and God knows there have been examples enough to show that successors are not at all bound by any resolves of those who preceded them. As reasonable men we would be bound on a recurrence of the evil that now exists to apply the same remedy. That is the point of view in which I regard this question, and while I am ready to admit that every Senator will redeem his pledge and vote against it, I must say that it is only by virtue of his pledge he will be bound, because if this divorce of the Supreme Court from their duties in the States is an appropriate remedy for a surcharged docket now, it must be the remedy in all time to come. Just so often as there is a surcharged docket, this will be the remedy if we agree to it now. Here lies the difficulty. The danger is in admitting this to be the appropriate remedy, thereby making it the remedy in any case which is to occur hereafter, until it become habitual, just as habitual as to pass the bill every year. Thus the application of this remedy will become a matter of course, till at last there will be a general law to divorce the Supreme Court from the States forever.

For myself I look upon this one year plan as the application for the wood which is to make the handle to the axe. Grant but a little bit of wood and the whole forest will be cut down. Begin with these yearly instalments of relief, and where will you end?—Fortified, strengthened, stimulated by this encouragement, that best of all arguments, precedent, will be urged, and the separation of the Supreme Court from the States will be inevitable. That there is a great evil I do not dispute, all admit it. The docket is locked up, and the court cannot meet and despatch causes as they arise. The question is, what is the appropriate remedy? In the first place I say that the remedy we propose to apply is a greater evil than the evil itself; and, secondly, that it is no remedy. The docket will be as it is at present, for we know that if we pass this bill, the appeals must be more numerous than heretofore. I desire time for deliberation in order that the attention of the Judiciary Committee may be directed to the subject. I recollect very well that some years ago a judge of the Supreme Court told me that he could get on very well if it were not for the business of this district—that there is very little limitation with respect to the cases arising here—that the counsel and the parties all live here, and that the court is blocked up with the business of the District of Columbia, which there is no reason in the world to bring before it. It seems to me that there might be some additional limitations imposed which would diminish the number of appeals, but I have not examined this subject for the purpose of ascertaining the appropriate remedy. I can only express the belief that the evil may be remedied without falling into a far greater evil than the one of which we wish to get rid. I am in favor of a remedy ample and complete, or none at all. I am against the application of a little half-way remedy—a temporary instalment remedy—for I believe it will be like all other instalment remedies, renewed until it become habitual.

The judges have separated—they have gone away—some of them are near the discharge of their duties in the circuits.—I think it will be best, in all the circumstances to recommit the bill, and as we have a long session before us, devote time and consideration to the subject; which may result in the application of a permanent and safe remedy, relieving us from the necessity of recurring year after year to a species of remedy, which after all, does not meet the case, and produces a greater evil than that which it was designed to remove.

Mr. BADGER.—I feel great reluctance in rising to say any thing on this bill. I see around me friends who are anxious for its passage, gentlemen whose wishes I delight to promote, and for whose deliberate judgment I entertain the highest respect. But I am deeply impressed with the conviction that the measure now proposed for the action of the Senate is mischievous in its tendency. Without reference to the motives and considerations which have induced its introduction into Congress, and before I make two or three observations on the merits of the measure, as some gentlemen who have spoken on this subject, have stated views in reference to this court in which I did not concur—permit me to say, that I am in every sense of the term, a friend of that court—I regard that institution as one of the wisest provisions of the great charter of our liberties, which our ancestors devised and transmitted to us. I am not opposed to the independent tenure of office, by which, the judges occupy their seats on that bench. I look upon that as the very provision of the constitution of the United States which renders the court not only in the highest sense valuable, but which alone renders it safe; and I should look with horror upon a tribunal of last resort, vested with such high powers, if its members held their office by the tenure of Executive caprice or popular passion and prejudice. Neither am I opposed to this bill on the ground that it may have been suggested by the judges, and is intended to afford them relief. I shall always feel myself prompt and ready to afford any relief, to the gentlemen who occupy a place upon that bench, provided it be in my judgment consistent with the public welfare; and other things being equal, it would be to me a strong recommendation of a measure that it was calculated to afford relief, and manifest a generous consideration on the part of Congress, for those high functionaries upon the efficient discharge of whose duties everything which is in the highest degree valuable to us as American citizens in my opinion greatly depends. Still I am opposed to this bill—I am opposed to it because I am a friend to the court—I am opposed to it because I believe it to be the commencement of a system by which the moral influence and power of that court will ultimately be overthrown; and it will remain either an incubus upon our institutions pressing them with a weight injurious to the community, or perhaps producing such a state of things in the public mind, as ultimately to destroy the institution itself, or overthrow that independent tenure of office which to me is its highest recommendation. I have no doubt, sir, that the measure is sincerely brought forward simply as a temporary relief for an admitted evil—that it is designed to operate only for a present emergency. But I believe the consequence of it will be, not the necessary and inevitable, but the natural and probable consequence—the ultimate separation of the judges from their circuit duties. We are not to take this bill and look upon it as an isolated measure. This is not the first time within a few years, that Congress has been called to act in reference to the accumulation of business in that court and the means of relieving its docket. In June, 1844, Congress passed an act, having in view the same object and containing two provisions; the first, directing that the term of the Supreme Court should commence not on the second Monday in January, but on the first Monday in December, so as to add five weeks to the term of the court; and the second, declaring that the judges of that court should be discharged from their obligation to attend two terms of the federal courts each year, and should thereafter be under an obligation to attend only one term each year. Now, in my opinion, this second provision in the law of 1844, involved an unwise alteration of the system. I believe that the great difficulty with regard to the connection of the judges of the Supreme Court with the circuits, is, that they do not hold, and from the nature of the case, owing to the extent of our country, cannot hold circuit courts enough; and that, therefore, when Congress authorized a judge of that court to absent himself from one term in the year, they did much to impair the efficiency of the members of the Supreme Court. In my view, it is absolutely essential that the judges of every court of last resort, should be judges constantly in the habit of trying causes in the court below. After all, whatever questions of admiralty law may fall under the jurisdiction of the court of the United States, the most important part of their functions as judges consists in administering the old common law of England, as modified by the different States of this Union. Who formed that common law? Five or six gentlemen in their private chamber or public court at Westminster Hall? No! It was the result of the application of wise and intelligent minds, to the practical operation of the rules they themselves first educed, from the transactions of mankind, and then applied to regulate them. Does any one believe that such a system as the common law, could have been built up in any other way? If so, are we to trust to powers who occupy the highest station, the great paramount authority of preserving, perpetuating and defending these very principles which they were incapable of building up, isolated from the ordinary transactions of judicial business, and sitting in this capitol to publish their decrees to the American people? I have said that in my view, the relaxation afforded by the act of 1844 was unwise and dangerous, but I have alluded to it now, in order to show to what this course is tending. Four year ago, Congress, for the purpose of facilitating the dispatch of business, and enabling the court to reduce it to manageable bounds, added five weeks to the term of the court, and discharged the judges from sitting one term in the circuit courts. What was the result? Was the docket relieved? Is the court now able to control its business? Why we are now called upon to discharge the judges from the obligation, to attend any court in their circuits for one year. They are now by existing law, discharged from riding one of their circuits in the year, and now it is proposed to discharge them for one year, from holding any jury courts whatever!

I think that in view of the past legislation of Congress, and of the consideration suggested by the Senator from Missouri, there is every reason to believe that at the next session of Congress, the necessity for further relaxation will not only not be removed or diminished, but will be increased and urged as a reason for a continuance of more strongly relief. If appeals be so numerous now, when the circuits below do have occasionally two judges for the purpose of hearing and deciding important causes, what may we expect when for a whole year, the determination of every cause important or unimportant, involving whatever amount of property, or whatever perplexing question, will be thrown by the necessity of the case on a single judge? I think that in every important cause, there will be a writ of error or appeal to the Supreme Court, and that twelve months hereafter, you will have just as much reason, nay, greater reason for the passage of a special law.

Then, as I apprehend, if Congress act consistently, applying this remedy from year to year, toties quoties, it must come to this, that we shall have three presiding as judges of the Supreme Court of appeals, not mingling with the ordinary transactions of business [illegible] in the courts below—not seeing the rules of evidence practically applied to the cases before them, [illegible] the United States, [illegible] and [illegible] ing them as it were in the administration of their high office—not felt and understood, and realized as part and parcel of this great popular government; but sitting here, alone—becoming philosophical and speculative in their inquiries as to law—becoming necessarily, more and more dim as to the nature of the law of the various States, from want of familiar and daily connection with them—unseen, final arbiters of justice, issuing their decrees as it were, from a secret chamber—moving invisibly amongst us, as far as the whole community is concerned, and in my judgment losing in fact, the ability to discharge their duties, as well as, that responsive confidence of the people, which adds so essentially to the sanction of all the acts of the officers of government.

These are the consequences to which, in my judgment, the measure tends. I am willing, promptly and cheerfully, to extend to the judges, for their own benefit and at their own request, any reasonable indulgence and relaxation which may not be inconsistent with the public good. But the gentlemen who advocate this measure say, here is an evil and we propose to remedy it by special legislation. Now, it has been well said in ancient fable that when the aid of Hercules was supplicated by the unfortunate wagoner, the answer which the god gave was, "Lay your own shoulder to the wheel, and if, after putting forth your own powers you find yourself not adequate to the emergency, then Hercules will help you." I apprehend that the court has no right to expect or ask any special legislation until after it has put its own shoulder to the wheel—until it has fairly applied all the powers with which it is vested by law, in order to accomplish this desirable result. Now, has the court done so? What occasions this accumulation of business? During a session of upwards of ninety days the court decided, as the Senator from Arkansas informs us, about forty cases.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—Upwards of fifty cases.

Mr. BADGER.—My friend from Kentucky says, from the statement of the clerk, upwards of fifty cases have been decided. I imagine that the two statements are quite reconcilable. The clerk puts down all the cases that have gone off the docket; several cases being involved in one opinion, and some merely docketed and dismissed. Why were not there more cases disposed of? We are all somewhat familiar with the manner in which cases are argued in that court. Now, Lord Bacon has informed us in one of his essays—and no man understood better theoretically, than he, the duties of a judge, whatever might have been his practical discharge of those duties—that one of the offices of a judge, was, "to moderate length, repetition, and impertinence of speech," using the latter term of course in its original and appropriate signification, not as meaning insolence, but irrelevancy. Now, has that remedy been applied by the court? Has the court taken upon itself the responsibility which it ought to have exercised, in order to prevent a waste of the public time by those who happen to gain the ear of the court a little earlier, in debate, indulging in idle and frivolous discussion, felt by the court themselves to be totally immaterial to the decision of the cause? Has the court been careful to prevent discussion of questions which might be regarded as axiomatic in this country—dissertations or scholastic essays, like those delivered to young men prosecuting their studies in a lawyer's office, in the expectation of obtaining a license? It is quite familiar to us all, that in a case which attracted some attention, one of the learned counsel occupied the entire day for the purpose of demonstrating this very difficult proposition in America, that the people are sovereign; and then pursued his argument on the second day by endeavoring to make out the extremely difficult conclusion from the first proposition, that being sovereign they had a right to frame their own constitution! Well, now, if the court sit quietly while gentlemen, from whatever motive, either to gain distinction from an exhibition of their polemical powers, capacity for didactic discussion, or any other reason, occupy the attention of the court with such discussions, what hope, what expectation can be entertained, that this bill will supply any remedy for the evil of a surcharged docket?

I have no doubt if the court had met on the 1st of December, with the resolute purpose of confining the argument of counsel to the questions on record, and refusing to listen to any discussion of any points, which the court considered to be clear and settled, a good deal more than forty cases for the court might have decided one hundred and forty. Gentlemen around me know, that we belong to a profession exceedingly discursive, and that when we have looked into a subject, and imagine that we can make a display, we are very apt to occupy time without consideration of the just claims of those who are to come after us.

A SENATOR—(in his seat.)—And abuse the court if they stop us!

Mr. BADGER.—Yes, and abuse the court if it administer even a gentle admonition. But I ask why was the Supreme Court made independent as regards the tenure of office, and the salaries of its judges placed above control? Surely that it might be independent. I mean to cast no reproach upon the court, far from it. I am aware that the duty to which I have just alluded is one of great delicacy. I can readily appreciate the reluctance with which the court would interpose this rightful power—this unpleasing remedy; and, therefore, if the court had time, I would have no objection to their amiable sufferance of irrelevant discussion. If they could dispose of their business, I have no objection to their [illegible] is equivalent to the [illegible] same thing, as regards us and suitors, or in their grave and difficult question. But there is a case in which the public are interested, in which it is not the time of the court, that is occupied, but the time of the suitors, whose cases are delayed, and whose interests suffer. I insist that in such a case, it is the duty of the court to lay aside all considerations of personal courtesy, and—not with rudeness—for that never can be the duty of the judge; but with moderation, firmness, and decision, to inform counsel, that the time of the court must be strictly applied to the business before them. Independently of the consideration which I have stated, that in my view, the natural and probable result of the adoption of this measure will be the ultimate discharge of the judges from attendance on circuit altogether; which I would look upon as fatal to the usefulness and moral influence of the court. I object that this is an application to Congress for a special act of legislation to apply a special remedy for a special grievance; and before we shall entertain favorably such an application, it ought first to be shown that the ordinary remedies placed in the hands of the tribunal, have been resorted to, and have proved inefficient. Now, so far from that being the case in the present instance, give me leave to say that all are perfectly aware that the court has interposed no such authority, to shorten needless debate and enable them to dispose of the cases on their docket. But sitting there, and gaining universal favor by allowing every body to talk ad libitum, they are obliged to seek this special act discharging them from circuit duty for a year, in order to sit here and accomplish in that time the business which I have no doubt could have been disposed of in the four months in which the court was in session.

Believing then, that the experiment is a dangerous one, on account of the consequences which may flow from it; and, believing, that at all events, it is an application for an act of special legislation, to afford special relief when the ordinary powers of the court, if exercised, would have enabled them to discharge their duty without the necessity of special legislation, I for one cannot vote for the measure now before the Senate.

Mr. PHELPS.—I regard this judicial system which has been in operation some fifty years, and with a very slight interruption ever since the organization of the government, as the best that can be devised for the general government and for the people. I deprecate as much as the Senator from North Carolina, or any other gentleman on this floor, the separation of the judges of the Supreme Court from their circuit duties. The consideration that the separation of the judges of the Supreme Court from their circuit duties would operate very much to the prejudice of the country, is not to be overlooked. I have had my fears, however, that this system, admirable as it is, would have to be abandoned; and that apprehension has been founded upon the fact, that in the first place, the judges have not time to attend to their circuit duties; and that in the second place, the docket of the Supreme Court had became so loaded, that the business of the court cannot be despatched—the very evil which I apprehended as likely to grow out of the extension of our territory, and the utter impracticability of having the duties of the circuit court discharged by such a number of judges as would be proper to be congregated here. If you increase the number of the judges of the Supreme Court with a view to enable them to discharge all the duties of the circuit courts, you have a court too numerous. On the other hand, they cannot, if they be limited to their present number, discharge the duties of the circuit courts. What is to be done? Some remedy must be applied. In my humble judgment, we have this alternative before us. We must either afford temporary relief, or abandon the system altogether. This is the issue presented. Well, not being disposed to abandon the system—preferring to retain it, and for the very considerations suggested by other Senators—I desire to apply some remedy to relieve the court from the accumulation of business here. In my judgment, if an extra session of this court can dispose of this accumulation of business, the court can attend in future to the ordinary discharge of its duties. If this be not done, what is the result? Why, if the docket of this court is allowed to accumulate and increase from year to year, and the community becomes satisfied that the business of the court cannot be despatched, we are driven irresistibly to the very measure which gentlemen deprecate—the separation of the court from the States. In these circumstances there is but one alternative, we must either change the system or we must adopt some temporary measure of relief. I am decidedly of opinion that we should resort to some measure of temporary relief and preserve the system. It is really a choice of evils, and I prefer that course which looks to temporary relief, to either than that which must result in an entire change of the system. As to the recommendation of the Senator from North Carolina I have only to say, that it is easy to talk on this floor about the manner in which the judges should discharge their duties. I confine myself to the subject before us, and allow the judges to go on in their own way.

Here a motion to adjourn was put and lost.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—What, let me ask, is the condition of the law now? The judges of the Supreme Court may continue in session throughout the whole year, can they not?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, (in his seat.)—Certainly.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—There is no limit to the session of the court except what their own discretion imposes. By law the court can now sit throughout the whole year, so long as there is any business before them. What does this bill propose to do? It says, "and the business of the Supreme Court shall receive the undivided attention of the court for one year." They can then obtain this relief by the law as it now stands. But if we order them to do what they can do without an order, lo and behold, infinite danger results to the whole system, and the chamber is filled with grave alarms! I admit that it is wise to be jealous. But that jealous wisdom must have its limit. What do gentlemen fear? If they apprehend evil, why not change the law now? Gentlemen fear a consequence which exists only in their own argument. Does any body desire this consequence? Do not all deprecate it and disclaim it? And yet gentlemen are greatly alarmed at the tendency of this measure—a tendency which they have in their own hands! In this case, literally, men flee when no one pursueth. I hope that the vote may now be taken.

Mr. FOOTE.—Until the debate occurred to which we have just listened, I confess that I was decidedly favorable to the passage of this bill. But some objections to its becoming a law have been preferred, which are too cogent to be resisted, and I shall, contrary to my first inclinations, vote against it. The merits of the bill have been so fully debated, that nothing which I could now say, would aid the Senate in coming to a wise decision concerning it; I shall, therefore, content myself with responding to a single suggestion which has just fallen from the Senator from Vermont. That gentleman seems to be particularly horrified at certain animadversions in which honorable Senators have indulged touching the conduct of those who preside in the Supreme Court of the Union. He appears to be of opinion, that we ought not, under any circumstances, to find fault with the action of a co-ordinate department of the government, and especially with the judicial department. The Senator may, or may not be right in the general doctrine which he asserts; and yet, it is most evident to me, that if any one of the three departments of government decreed by the constitution to be separate and independent of each other, should be allowed to interfere with the action of another in any case, the exception to the general rule should be admitted in favor, either of the Legislative or Executive in preference to the judiciary. Nor do I imagine that there will be much difference of opinion as to the correctness of this proposition among Senators, who attach sufficient importance to the fact, that the judges of the supreme court are appointed, (not elected, either by the people or otherwise,) for life, and are only responsible to the country through the medium of impeachment—a proceeding long since ascertained to be wholly inefficient for the purpose of punishing an unworthy judicial functionary. The occasion is not such as to allow of my objecting in form to the mode in which the members of the Supreme Court of the Union are appointed to their high stations, or to their peculiar tenure of office, which induced Mr. Jefferson to declare this tribunal to be a solecism in our system. I shall not now undertake to review the history of the courts for the purpose of showing how deadly the tendency of its decisions has generally been to what we call republican principles. I shall confine my observations to a single act of one of the judges of the supreme court, of very recent perpetration, which I had hoped would have been long since suitably noticed, and denounced by some other member of this body of more weight and influence in the country than myself; but which having heretofore escaped revision here, I shall take leave now to remark upon. Sir, one of the judges of the supreme court has lately taken it upon himself, whilst the country was engaged in war with a neighboring nation, to throw the whole weight of his personal character and official influence against his own government, and in favor of the public enemy. He has declared the war with Mexico unjust, cruel, and unchristian. He has done more. He has undertaken to dictate to Congress as to the legislation proper to be adopted in relation to this war; and has recommended measures such as would have disgraced the nation, and which no true friend to his country in either house of Congress could ever have sanctioned. He has urged that no supplies should be granted for the support of our army in Mexico—that no authority should be given to Congress for the issuance of Treasury notes, so that the government might be compelled, if the war should be continued, to resort to the most grinding taxation for its sustenance, by the influence of scenes suffering upon our people, to constrain them to demand of the President the recall of our brave troops from Mexico, and the termination of the war without such indemnity for the past and security for the future as can alone secure the national honor. Sir, I have no words strong enough to express the contempt which I feel for such sentiments as this judicial functionary has dared to avow. I know not which most to condemn, the unpatriotic views which he has promulged, or his unblushing audacity in attempting to dictate to Congress as to the course proper to be pursued at this delicate and difficult juncture of our affairs. It is certain that he has been guilty of a high offence against public decency—that he has expressed sentiments which, if acted out, would consign him to the scaffold as a traitor to his country—that he has soiled, and deeply soiled, the pure ermine of justice, with which he stands invested—that he has shown himself anything but a true American in heart, and a wretched devotee to faction in its worst and most accursed form. I will not say that his conduct has been precisely as bad as that of the notorious Arnold; but I do say that our public councils have been profaned by insidious harangues that Lucius Cataline himself would have been ashamed to pronounce; and even the high tribunal where a Marshall was once seen to preside with a majestic dignity which acknowledged no affinity with the low feelings of partizan warfare, has been so discredited by a Presidency-seeking official, that neither gentleman nor patriot can consent hereafter to be elevated to the noblest and most sacred office in the republic, without feeling that he is disgraced even by the attempt to advance him.

Mr. DOWNS.—I confess I agree with the Senator from North Carolina, that much of the evil that we complain of might be remedied by the court itself, still I think it is necessary that the bill should pass. It is not an act for the relief of the court, but for the relief of those who are engaged in litigation before that court—for the relief of the people of the United States. It is said that if this measure be not adopted, another measure will be brought forward that will remedy the evil. I shall be happy to see a remedy applied, and I see an opportunity now for the adoption of a remedy. There is in my State a large amount of property in litigation. A case was carried to the Supreme Court before the act of 1844 was passed, involving some hundred thousand acres of land, and it still remains undecided, how many years more it will take I do not know. The delay has become positively intolerable. But if the court could be allowed to sit through the year, the docket might be cleared off, and we should then have time to adopt such measures as may be necessary to prevent a recurrence of the evil.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I rise simply to state in a very few words, the reasons that will govern me, in giving my vote on this occasion. It must be admitted on all sides, that this is intended to be only a temporary measure, and that the present system ought to be continued. I believe this is the general impression; such is mine, very strongly. This bill is presented on the ground, that the cases upon the docket have so accumulated, that it requires an extraordinary law—to relieve the judges from their circuit duties for one year—in order to clear them off. Well, what possible assurance have we, that at the end of the year the same reason will not exist for enacting such a law for the next year? It appears to me, that we are inverting the order of things. The first object should be to adopt some measure that would prevent the accumulation of cases in future, and then some measure for disposing of those which now exist. But proceeding as we are, it appears to me, it will be tantamount—without intending it to be so—to a permanent change in the circuit system. Now, I believe there are very few Senators prepared for this; I believe the judges themselves are not. We have ample time during the remaining part of the session—it will probably last three months yet, I should be very glad to think it would terminate in three—surely this will furnish ample opportunity to the Judiciary committee, or if that committee be overloaded with business, to a select committee to take the subject into consideration, and propose some measure that will prove an effectual remedy for the evil that is complained of.

Mr. DAYTON.—The Judiciary committees in both houses have had the subject under consideration. A bill has been reported and is now before the House of Representatives, but any bill that is passed should be a bill calculated to sweep away the accumulation of the cases with which the docket of the Supreme Court is now lengthened. They must be disposed of irrespective of any bill for the regulation of the judiciary hereafter.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I was not aware that there was a bill before the House relating to this subject, but that being the case, it is a reason why this bill should lie upon the table until that bill passes. Let us apply first the general remedy, and then adopt any additional measure that may be necessary. Being strongly desirous that the system should not be changed, and fearing that this bill if adopted will change it, I feel myself compelled to vote against it.

No amendment being made the bill was reported to the Senate.

On the question—"shall this bill pass to a third reading?"—Mr. BAGBY demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered and taken with the following result:

YEAS—Messrs. Bell, Berrien, Bulter, Clayton, Dayton, Dix, Evans, Greene, Hamlegan, Johnson, of Maryland, Mangum, Mason, Miller, Pearce, Phelps, Rusk, Underwood—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Atchison, Badger, Bagby, Benton, Calhoun, Dickinson, Fitzgerald, Hannegan, Houston, Huntington, Jarnagin, Lewis, Niles, Sebastian, Sevier, Simmons, Spruance, Turney, Westcott—19.

THE CALIFORNIA CLAIMS.

The Senate resumed the consideration, as in Committee of the Whole, of the bill for ascertaining and paying the California claims.

Mr. BENTON.—Mr. President: These claims grow out of the conquest of California, and are supported by a mass of depositions taken by the Military Committee of the Senate, and printed by its order. These depositions constitute a document of eighty pages, and are full of material, valuable to the public history of the country, as well as to the private rights of the claimants. The Senate, on the application of the committee, have ordered twenty thousand extra copies of this document to be printed—a fact which sufficiently announces its public and national importance; for no extras, much less twenty thousand, are ever printed of merely private papers. It requires a public interest to be concerned before such a thing can be done; and that is eminently the case in the present instance. These depositions concern public history; and no one can understand the history of the United States, as connected with the conquest of California, without understanding them.

The conquest of California was commenced, and its first act finished, before the existence of the Mexican war was known in that country; and this fact standing out incontestably among the events of the times, and presenting a presumptive case of aggression against the United States, very naturally attracted the attention of the committee, and commanded their most searching and thorough examination. The result is before the Senate, in the depositions referred to, and may be examined in detail by every Senator. For myself, I propose only to make a brief, connected story from their ample contents, to rebut in the first place an injurious presumption, and to exhibit afterwards in lucid order the summary of events which gave rise to these California claims, and show that they ought to be paid.

In the month of May, 1845, Mr. Fremont, then a brevet captain of engineers, set out on his third expedition of geographical and scientific exploration in the Great West. War had not then broken out between the United States and Mexico; but affairs were critical between them, and Mr. Fremont was determined, by no act of his, to increase the difficulties, or to give any cause of complaint to the Mexican government. His line of observation would lead him to the Pacific ocean through a Mexican province—through the desert parts first, and the settled parts afterwards, of the Alta California. Approaching the settled parts of the province at the commencement of winter, he left his equipment of sixty men and two hundred horses on the frontier, and proceeded alone to Monterey to make known to the governor the object of his coming, and his desire to pass the winter, for the refreshment of his men and horses, in the uninhabited parts of the valley of the San Joaquin. The permission was granted, but soon revoked under the pretext that Mr. Fremont had come into California, not to pass the winter, but to excite the American settlers to revolt against the Mexican government. Upon this pretext troops were raised, and marched to attack him. Having notice of their approach, he took a position on the mountain, hoisted the flag of the United States, and determined, with his sixty brave men, to defend themselves to the last extremity. Waiting there four days, and not being attacked, he quit his position, descended from the mountains, and set out for Oregon, that he might give no further pretext for complaint by remaining in California.

The United States consul at Monterey, Mr. O. Larkin, gave official information of these events to the Secretary of State, (Mr. Buchanan,) and from these I will read what is necessary to verify the statement which I have made:

"Capt. J. C. Fremont, of the United States army, arrived at the United States consular house in Monterey, on the 24th of January, 1846. Being very anxious to join his party of fifty men at the second place of rendezvous, without the settlement, they having missed the first place by mistake, he remained but two days, in which time, with myself, he visited the commandant general, prefecto, alcalde, and Col. Alvarado, informing them that he was surveying for the nearest route from the United States to the pacific ocean. This information, and that his men were not United States soldiers, was also, by myself, officially given to the prefecto. Having obtained hands and supplies from myself, he returned to his camp; it being well known in Monterey that he was to return when he collected his men. Some fifteen or twenty days after this Capt. Fremont, with his party, encamped at a vacant rancho belonging to Captain Alvarado, (about eight miles from here,) to recruit his men and animals. From thence he proceeded towards Santa Cruz, making short journeys. On the 3d of March he encamped on the rancho of Mr. E. P. Hartwell, where he received letters from the general and prefecto, ordering him out of the country, and to obey the order without any protest whatever, as immediate measures would be taken to compel him to do so. This not corresponding with assurances received at Monterey, it was not answered, and the commandant general ordered the troops to march, and their respective protection his men were to look to. From the 7th to the 10th of March they fortified their camp with a breastwork of logs. Encamped on a high hill, which commanded a view of the surrounding country, with the use of spy-glasses, their movements general and his troops, numbering about two hundred men, at their camp, in the mission of St. John's preparing their cannon. On the 9th instant I sent duplicate letters: one by an Indian, also by two Americans, and the other by a Californian to Capt. Fremont, informing him of the movements of the Californians. The California courier returned to the consulate in about nine or ten hours, bringing a letter from Capt. Fremont, having travelled on that time sixty miles. He reported being well treated by Capt. Fremont and his men; that their breastwork of logs commenced would be sufficient to compel him to leave the country, although his party was so small."—letter, 25th March, 1846.

"Capt. Fremont was well received in this place, and to the last day we heard of him, by the natives individually, who sold him provisions and liked his presence. During his encampment, thirty or forty miles from here, despatches were received by the commandant, General Jose Castro, a native of Monterey, from Mexico, ordering him to drive Capt. Fremont out of this department; which order, with one hundred and seventy or two hundred men present, and over one hundred more daily expected, he pretended to execute. Capt. Fremont left his camp a few hours after he received the undersigned's letter of the 9th of March, (not from fright of General Castro,) as he had been preparing the week before to travel. It is supposed he has gone to St. Barbara, where an American was sent by the undersigned in February with funds and provisions for his use.

"The undersigned has not supposed, during the whole affair, that General Castro wished to go after Capt. Fremont, and was very confident that, with all California, he would not have attacked him, even had he been sure of destroying the whole party, as five times their number could have taken their place before the expected battle. Capt. Fremont received verbal applications from English and Americans to join his party, and could have mustered as many men as the natives. He was careful not to do so. Although he discharged five or six of his men, he took no others in their place."—Letter, April 3, 1846.

This is the official history of the first difficulty with the Californian authorities, and presents the conduct of Mr. Fremont in the most unexceptionable point of view: halting his command upon the frontier; going alone to Monterey; asking and obtaining permission to winter in an uninhabited valley; only raising the flag of the United States when in danger of being attacked; leaving the country as soon as the danger was over; and refusing to receive any of the American settlers into his service, (even to supply the place of discharged men,) that there might be no room for misconstruction of his conduct or for false accusations against the settlers.

The hoisting of the United States flag on this occasion is the only act which requires a word of explanation or of justification. It was complained of as an act of aggression: it was no such thing, but an act of self-protection and of self-defence. It was an appeal to their country, and a proper appeal for an American officer to make when in danger of being unjustly attacked. Mr. Fremont, in his reply to the Consul's communication, in a brief note written in pencil and in view of the enemy, gave the reasons for the act which justified it, and exalted it into an act of devotion and heroism. It was in these words:

"I this moment received your letters, and without waiting to read them acknowledge the receipt which the courier expires immediately. I am making myself as strong as possible in the conviction that if we are unjustly attacked we will defend ourselves, and refuse quarter, trusting to our country to avenge our death. No one has reached our camp, and from the heights we are able to see troops with the glass, marching at St. Johns and preparing cannon. I thank you for your kindness and good wishes, and would write more at length as to my intentions did I not fear that my letter would be intercepted. We have in no wise done wrong to the people or the authorities of the country, and if we are hemmed in and assaulted here, we will die, every man of us, under the flag of our country.

"Very truly, yours, J. C. FREMONT.

"P. S. I am encamped on the top of the Sierra, at the head waters of a stream which strikes the road to Monterey, opposite the house of Don Joaquin Gomez.

"THOMAS O. LARKIN, Esq.,
"Consul for the United States, Monterey."

Such was the reason for raising the flag. It was raised at the approach of danger: it was taken down when danger disappeared. It was well and nobly done and worthy of our admiration—sixty of our countrymen, three thousand miles from home, in sight of the Pacific ocean, appealing to the flag of their country, unfurling it on the mountain top, and determined to die under it before they would submit to unjust aggression.

Turning his back on California, and looking to Oregon as the field of his further labors, Mr. Fremont determined to explore a new route to the Wah-lah-math settlements and the tide-water region of the Columbia, through the wild and elevated region of the Tlamath lakes. A romantic interest attaches to this region from the grandeur of its features, its lofty mountains, and snow-clad-peaks, and from the formidable character of its warlike inhabitants. In the first week of May he was at the north end of the great Tlamath lake, and in Oregon, the lake being passed near its south end by the parrallel of forty-two degrees. On the 8th day of that month a strange sight presented itself—two men riding up and penetrating a region which few ever approached without paying toll of life and blood. They proved to be two of Mr. Fremont's old voyageurs, and quickly told their story. They were part of a guard of six men conducting a United States officer who was on his trail with despatches from Washington, and whom they had left two days back while they came on to give notice of his approach, and to ask that assistance might be sent him. They themselves had only escaped the Indians by the swiftness of their horses. It was a case in which no time was to be lost or mistake to be made. Mr. Fremont determined to go himself; and taking ten picked men, four of them Delaware Indians, he took down the western shore of the lake on the morning of the 9th, (the direction the officer was to come,) and made a ride of sixty miles without a halt. But to meet men, and not to miss them, was the difficult point in that trackless region. It was not the case of a high road where all travellers must meet in passing each other; at intervals there were places—defiles or camping grounds—where both parties must pass; and, watching for these, he came to one in the afternoon, and decided in his own mind that, if the party was not killed, it must be there that night. He halted and encamped, and, as the sun was going down, he had the unexpressible satisfaction to see the four men approaching. The officer proved to be Lieutenant Gillespie, of the United States Marines, who had been despatched from Washington the November previous to make his way by Vera Cruz, Mexico, and Mazatlan, to Monterey, in Upper California, deliver despatches to the United States consul there, and then find Mr. Fremont wherever he should be. His despatches for Mr. Fremont were only a letter of introduction from the Secretary of State, (Mr. Buchanan,) and some letters and slips of papers from Senator Benton and his family, and some verbal communications from the Secretary of State. The depositions taken by the committee show the nature of these verbal communications, which were, in substance, that he should watch and counteract any foreign schemes in California, and conciliate the good will of the inhabitants towards the United States. Upon this intimation of the government's wishes, Mr. Fremont turned back from Oregon, in the edge of which he then was, and returned to California.

This is the letter, and I think it right to show it, and to read it, lest any one should suppose it to be of more importance than it is:

"WASHINGTON, November 3, 1845.

"MY DEAR SIR: The bearer hereof, Mr. Archibald H. Gillespie, is about to visit the northwest coast of America on business, and has requested me to give him a letter of introduction to you. This I do with pleasure, because he is a gentleman of worth and respectability, and is worthy of your regard. I do not deem it probable that he will fall in with you; but, if he should, allow me to bespeak for him your friendly attention. He will be able to communicate to you information of the health of Mrs. Fremont and of Col. Benton and his family. From your friend, very respectfully,

"JAMES BUCHANAN.

"J. C. FREMONT, Esq., Oregon."

This is the letter; and of itself signified nothing. But it accredited the bearer, and gave the stamp of authority to what he communicated, and upon this Mr. Fremont acted; for it was not to be supposed that Lieut. Gillespie had been sent so far, and through so many dangers, merely to deliver him that letter on the shores of the Tlamath lake. Mr. Gillespie, in his testimony, has explained all the reasons of the mystery of this letter, and of the verbal communications, and shown that they were precautions to avoid detection in his perilous journey through Mexico in the fall of 1845.

This is not the time or the occasion, Mr. President, to show amidst what dangers and hardships, scientific discovery was pursued by Mr. Fremont in these remote and unexplored regions.—The time may come for telling these things. But the events of a week on the shores of the great Tlamath lake, sketched with the brevity which the occasion requires, may give a glimpse of these hardships and dangers, and of the courage and fidelity with which he was supported by his men.

The night he met Mr. Gillespie presented one of these scenes to which he was so often exposed, and which nothing but the highest degree of vigilance and courage could prevent from being fatal. The camping ground was on the western side of the lake, the horses picketted with long halters on its shore to feed on its grass, and the men, (fourteen in number,) sleeping by threes at different fires; for, though in May, the elevation of the place and the proximity of the snow-clad mountains made the night intensely cold. His feelings joyfully excited by hearing from home—the first word of intelligence he had received since leaving the United States a year before—Mr. Fremont sat up by a large fire, reading his letters and papers, and watching over the safety of his camp while the men slept. Towards midnight he heard a movement among the horses, indicative of alarm and some danger. Horses, and especially mules, become extremely sensitive to danger under long travelling and camping in the wilderness, and manifest their alarm at the approach of any thing strange. Taking a six-barrel pistol in his hand, and, without waking the camp, he went down among them. The moon shone brightly—he could see nothing. Encouraged by his presence the horses became quiet—poor dumb creatures, that could not tell what they had seen—and he returned to the camp supposing it was only some beast of the forest—some wolf or bear prowling for food, that had disturbed them. He returned to the camp-fire; Lieutenant Gillespie woke up, talked with him awhile, and then laid down again. Finally, nature had her course with Mr. Fremont himself. Excited spirits gave way to exhausted strength. The day's ride and the night's excitement demanded the reparation of repose. He laid down to sleep, and without waking up a man to watch, relying upon the loneliness of the place and the long ride of the day as a security against the proximity of danger. It was the second time in twenty thousand miles of wilderness explorations that his camp had slept without a guard—the first was in his second expedition, and on an island in the Great Salt Lake, and when the surrounding waters of the lake itself constituted a guard. The whole camp was then asleep. A cry from Carson roused it. In his sleep he heard a groan—it was the groan of a man receiving the tomahawk in his brains. All sprung to their feet. The savages were in the camp; the hatchet and the winged arrow were at work. Basil Lajeunesse, a brave and faithful young Frenchman, the follower of Fremont in all his expeditions, was dead; an Iowa was dead; a brave Delaware Indian, one of those who had accompanied Mr. Fremont from Missouri, was dying—it was his groan which awoke Carson. Another of the Delawares was a target for arrows, from which no rifle could save him—could only avenge him. The savages had waited till the moon was in the trees, casting long shadows over the camp: then approaching from the dark side, with their objects between themselves and the light, they used only the hatchet and the formidable bow, whose arrow went to its mark without a flash or a sound to show whence it came. All advantages were on the side of the savages; but the camp was saved, the wounded protected from massacre, and the dead from mutilation. In the morning Lieut. Gillespie recognized, in the person of one of the slain assailants, the Tlamath chief who, the morning before, had given him a salmon in token of friendship, and who had followed him all day to kill and rob his party at night—a design in which they would certainly have been successful had it not been for the promptitude and precision of Mr. Fremont's movement. Mr. Fremont himself would have been killed when he went to the horses had it not been that they counted upon the destruction of the whole camp, and feared to alarm it by killing one before the general massacre.

It was on the 9th of May—a day immortalized by American arms at Resaca de la Palma—that this fierce and bloody work took place.

The morning of the 10th of May was one of gloom in the camp. The evening sun of the 9th had set upon it full of life and joy at a happy meeting: the same sun rose upon it in the morning stained with blood, ghastly with the dead and wounded, and imposing mournful duties on the survivors. The wounded were to be carried, the dead to be buried, and so to be buried as to be hid and secured from discovery and violation. They were carried ten miles, and every precaution taken to secure them from the wolf and the savage; for men, in these remote and solitary dangers, become brothers, and defend each other living and dead.

The return route lay along the shore of the lake, and during the day the distant canoes of the savages could be seen upon it, evidently watching the progress of the party, and meditating a night attack. All precautions, at the night encampment, were taken for security—horses and men enclosed in a breastwork of great trees, cut down for the purpose, and half the camp constantly on the watch. At leaving in the morning, an ambuscade was planted—for the foe was known to be lurking about—and two of the Tlamaths were killed by the men in ambush. At night the main camp, at the north end of the lake, was reached. It was strongly fortified, and could not be attacked; but its whole neighborhood was infested, and scouts and patrols were necessary to protect every movement. In one of these excursions the California horse, so noted for his spirit and docility, showed what he would do at the bid of his master. Carson's rifle had missed fire at ten feet distance. The Tlamath bow, arrow on the string, was bending to the pail. All the rifles in the party could not have saved him. A horse and his rider did it. Mr. Fremont touched his horse; he sprang upon the savage, and the hatchet of a Delaware completed the deliverance of Carson.

It was in the midst of such dangers as these that science was pursued by Mr. Fremont, that the telescope was carried to read the heavens, the barometer to measure the elevations of the earth, the thermometer to measure the temperature of the air, the pencil to sketch the grandeur of mountains and to paint the beauty of flowers, the pen to write down whatever was new or strange or useful in the works of nature: it was in the midst of such dangers as these, and in the wildest regions of the Farthest West, that Mr. Fremont was pursuing science, and shunning war, when the arrival of Lieut. Gillespie turned him back into California, and engaged him in the operations which gave rise to the bill which now claims the attention of the Senate.

Mr. Fremont turned back to California, and arrived in the valley of the Sacramento at a most critical and exciting time. Three great operations, fatal to American interests, were then going on, and past remedy, if not arrested at once. These were the massacre of the Americans and the destruction of their settlements in the valley of the Sacramento, the subjection of California to British protection, and the transfer of the public domain to British subjects, and all with a view to anticipate the events of a Mexican war, and to shelter California from the just reclamations of the United States.

The American settlers came to the camp of Mr. Fremont, in the valley of the Sacramento, laid all these dangers before him, and implored him to place himself at their head, and save them from destruction. General Castro was then in march upon them; the Indians were excited to burn their wheat fields and to attack their families. Juntas were in session to transfer the country to Great Britain; the public domain was passing away in large grants to British subjects; a British fleet was expected on the coast; the British Vice Consul, Forbes, and the emissary priest, MacNamara, ruling and conducting every thing, and all their plans so far advanced as to render the least delay fatal. It was then the beginning of June. War existed between the United States and Mexico, but that was not known in California. Mr. Fremont had left the country at peace when he set out upon his expedition, and was determined to do nothing to disturb their relations; he had even left California to avoid giving offence; and to return and take up arms in so short a time, was apparently to discredit his own previous conduct as well as to implicate his government. He felt all the responsibilities of his position; but the actual approach of Castro, and the immediate danger of the settlers left him no alternative. He determined to put himself at the head of the people, and to save the country. To repulse Castro was not sufficient. To overturn the Mexican government in California, and to establish its INDEPENDENCE, was the bold resolve, and the only one adequate to the emergency. That resolve was taken, and executed with a celerity that gave it a romantic success. The American settlers rushed to his camp; brought their arms, horses, and ammunition; were formed into a battalion; and obeyed with zeal and alacrity the orders they received. In thirty days, all the northern part of California was freed from Mexican authority; independence proclaimed; the flag of independence (the bear flag) adopted; Castro flying to the south; the American settlers saved from destruction; and the British party in California counteracted and broken up in all their schemes.

The effects of this decisive and rapid movement can only be conceived from a careful perusal of the depositions. From them it will be seen that deep laid plans, conducted by the British Vice Consul, Forbes, and the emissary priest, MacNamara, were going on to shelter California under the British crown, and to vest its domain in British subjects; that every thing was verging to a crisis, and a British fleet expected upon the coast, when this rapid and successful movement broke up all these designs. And when Admiral Seymour arrived on the 16th of July, instead of an invitation from the California Junta to take the country under British protection, and an invitation from the grantees of principalities to take British interests under his protection, he found the American flag flying over Monterey; Fremont and his riflemen encamped over the town; the British party extinct, and the American triumphant. The effect which the appearance of this daring body of Western riflemen produced upon the minds both of the British and American naval officers, is well stated by Lieut. Minor in his deposition; and, in justice to those men as well as to the truth of his tory deserves to be read here. He says:

"The undersigned was on duty on shore when Captain Fremont arrived with his force at Monterey from the north. The undersigned believes that the appearance of this body of men, and the well known character of its commander, not only made a strong impression upon the British admiral and officers, but an equally impressive and most happy one upon those of the American navy then in Monterey. For himself the undersigned can say, that, after he had seen Captain Fremont's command, all his doubts regarding the conquest of California were removed."

This is the testimony of a disinterested witness—one who himself, in the subsequent operations in California, rendered good service on land, there being no chance for him on the water. It shows that the timely and successful movement of the California battalion, and its sudden appearance at Monterey, simultaneously with the arrival of the American and British fleets, was the turning point in the fate of California. It showed the country was in arms to resist, instead of asking, British protection; and it encouraged the navy to believe that the whole country could be conquered; for without a land force, the naval forces could only have operated along the coast.

And here a great fact presents itself—one which these depositions have consecrated to history, and which belongs to the chapter of events which determine the fate of countries. It is the fact that Fremont's operations determined the action of Commodore Sloat, and induced him to take possession of Monterey, contrary to his intention when he anchored before that town; and thereby anticipated Admiral Seymour, frustrated his designs, whatever they were, and induced him to leave Monterey as suddenly and as mysteriously as he had arrived. The depositions establish this fact, and some reference to their contents will prove what I say; and, first, of the effect of these operations in deciding the action of Commodore Sloat. It is in proof that he entered the bay of Monterey as a friend, on the 2d of July, offering to salute the town, which the authorities declined, on the ground that they had no powder to return it, but probably because the British admiral was expected. On the 5th day of July, the operations of Fremont were heard of, and on the 7th, Commodore Sloat took the town. The testimony of the naval officers (Messrs. Minor and Wilson,) and the Commodore's own correspondence, (pages 70 and 73,) show circumstantially that his action was induced by hearing of these operations; and the testimony of Messrs. Fremont and Gillespie, pointedly prove it. Mr. Fremont says:

"I came down to Monterey with my command, upon the request of Commodore Sloat, to co operate with him; and immediately on my arrival waited upon him, in company with my lieutenant Gillespie, on board the frigate Savannah. Commodore Sloat appeared uneasy at the great responsibility he had assumed. He informed me that he had applied to Lieutenant Gillespie, whom he knew to be an agent of the government, for his authority, but that he had declined to give it. He then wished to know under what instructions I had acted in taking up arms against the Mexican authorities. I answered him that I had acted solely on my own responsibility, and without any authority from the government to justify hostilities. Commodore Sloat appeared greatly disturbed with this information, and gave me distinctly to understand that in raising the flag at Monterey, he had acted upon the faith of our operations in the north. Commodore Sloat soon relinquished the command to Commodore Stockton, who determined to prosecute hostilities to the complete conquest of California."

Captain Gillespie says:

"In reply to the above question of the General's committee, I beg leave to state that at an interview between Commodore Sloat, Captain Fremont, and myself, held on board of the United States frigate Savannah, lying in the harbor of Monterey, in July, 1846, Commodore Sloat manifested a feeling of dissatisfaction that Captain Fremont and myself had not reported ourselves, and the force under our command, to him, and said, addressing both, as near as I can recollect, 'I do not know by what authority you are acting. I can do nothing. Mr. Gillespie has told me nothing; he came to Mazatlan, and I sent him to Monterey; but I know nothing. I want to know by what authority you are acting.' Captain Fremont replied, 'He had acted upon his own authority, and not from orders of the government.' Commodore Sloat then expressed much surprise and distress, and said: 'I have acted upon the faith of your operations in the north.'"

Coincident with these statements is the letter of Commodore Sloat, of the 6th of July, to Commander Montgomery, of the Portsmouth, then in the Bay of San Francisco, who had sent down a launch with the news of Fremont's successes. The letter is dated from the flag-ship Savannah, Bay of Monterey, July 6th, 1846:

"Since I wrote you last evening, I have determined to hoist the flag of the United States at this place to-morrow, as I would prefer being sacrificed for doing too much than too little. If you consider that you have sufficient force or if Fremont will join you, you will hoist the flag of the United States at Yerba Buena, or any other proper place, and take possession, in the name of the United States, of the fort, and that portion of the country."

This settles the great fact that Mr. Fremont's operations determined the action of Commodore Sloat—induced him to change his mind after he had been four days at Monterey—encouraged him to take the town, and to send out orders to hoist the United States flag at other places. On the 16th, Admiral Seymour, in the Collingwood, of 80 guns, arrived; the frigate Juno was previously on the coast: the largest squadron that the British government had ever had in the Pacific ocean was then there; and all the evidence combines to show that the object of this squadron was to watch Commodore Sloat, to follow him wherever he went, to anticipate him in getting to Monterey, and to be in readiness to take California under the British flag, and to do what the protection of British interests might require him to do. This is well and fully shown by the testimony. Lieutenant Minor says:

"The undersigned being in command of the southern district of California, during the latter part of 1846, was informed by Pedro C. Carrillo, and he believes the information thus obtained, founded on facts, that he the said Carrillo, was a member of a junta that was called at Santa Barbara, in June, 1846, for the purpose of declaring the independence of California, and of asking the protection of the United States, or Great Britain; that the minds was represented by all of the inhabited portions of California, that a majority of the same were for claiming the protection of England; that these resolves would probably have been executed, had it not been for the war, and their fears of an armed force, then on the north side of the bay at San Francisco, under the command of Captain Fremont. The understand has understood from other sources entitled to confidence, that a majority of the people of California desired the protection of England; the opinion for this formed was strengthened by the speech of an English deputy, the June, had, about the time the junta met, landed an English subject, named Macnemara, at Santa Barbara, of whom it was said that he had obtained a grant from the Mexican government, of a large and fertile portion of California, embracing the whole valley of the San Joaquin, from its source to its mouth, a valley, as the understand believes, comprising one third of the richest portion of California. The understand believes that the British squadron in the Pacific, commanded by Rear Admiral Sir George F. Seymour, consisted then of a larger force than they ever had upon that ocean, were employed in closely watching the movements of the American commodore. Being aware of this fact, Commodore Sloat, when he heard of the first battle on the Rio Grande, set out anxiously in the frigate Savannah, and anchored off Monterey, for the sole purpose of proceeding to California; in English vessel of war accosted him after the Savannah, and stood in the direction of San Blas, which it was known the admiral was. After entering in the gulf of Mexico, the commodore returned to the bay of Magallan, when another English ship of war came, and stood in the direction of San Blas. The under signed believes that the manœuvre of Commodore Sloat was intended for the deception of the English admiral. On the 7th of June, 1846, Mr. Macnamara again made sail, and after a passage of twenty three days, during which a press of canvass was carried, she arrived at the port of Monterey, in Upper California. The Collingwood, of eighty guns, the flag ship of Admiral Seymour, entered the harbor on the 19th July, and the undersigned believes that the admiral was disappointed when he saw the American flag flying on shore."

Midshipman Wilson says:

"On the 29th of the same month Admiral Seymour, who had been following us for several months, arrived, and anchored in his flag ship, the Collingwood, 80."

"Upon his vessel's appearance in sight, Commodore Sloat sent orders. I understood, to his commanders of vessels not to be engaging our squadron, to be in readiness, on receipt of the first word from the commodore, to sail for Mazatlan. This evidently became the impression on the minds of his officers that Admiral Seymour must have intended to have prevented our squadron from taking possession of California. All those facts led to the supposition, but for the opposition, and the known intelligence of Colonel Fremont and his party in the north, then by influencing the commodore in his movements, such I fear would have been the result."

This testimony, as to the presumed designs of the British Admiral is fully corroborated by all that was going on in California itself, while Admiral Seymour was watching and following Commodore Sloat on the coast of Mexico and California. During all that time juntas were held, under the management of the British vice consul Forbes, to place the country under British protection, the public domain was passing to British subjects, the arrival of a British fleet in the course of the summer to take possession of California was confidently foretold, and, as a preliminary to this measure, the expulsion and destruction of the Americans was resolved upon, the bando or proclamation for their expulsion actually issued, and troops raised and Indians excited for their destruction. The expected arrival of the British fleet connected itself with all these operations, and all these would have been successful had it not been for the success of Mr. Fremont and the people, and so says all the testimony. There is too much of it to read; and, besides, a part of this labor has been anticipated, and well performed, in the luminous and statesmanlike observations of the Senator from New York, [Mr. DIX,] in what he presented to the Senate a few days ago in favor of this bill, and in his exposition of British designs upon this continent. He read some passages from the depositions which show these designs in California; I will read a little more for the same purpose, and especially to show that a British interest was to be created, to claim his protection as soon as the Admiral arrived, and the Americans to be expelled or destroyed to prevent their opposition:

Capt. Gillespie's deposition.—Extract.

"Having joined Lieut Col Fremont upon the 9th May, 1846, upon the northern end of the Tlamath lake, I returned with him to the valley of the Sacramento, and arrived at the settlement upon the 24th of the same month, which was when an news from below, so soon, however, as it became known to the settlers that Capt. Fremont had returned, they came to the camp, bringing to the information that the Indians of the valley were leaving their rancheros and going to the mountains. In some parties they had shown a very hostile feeling, and certainly had been stirred up some foreign influence. Remaining at Lawson's two days, we proceeded down the valley and met Manuel of Neal and Swanton's, upon Bear creek, the report we had received were confirmed, the Indians in that section having taken to the mountains, and had killed an Indian boy in the employ of Mr. Dutton because he had refused to join them. On the 26th the encouragement of hostile disposition on the part of the Indians, men and women, came to Capt. Fremont, begged him to take part against the Indians, and ask them protection.

"About June 30th I learned that the junta which was to have assembled at Santa Barbara upon the 15th June, and which had been planned and arranged by and though the agency of Mr. Forbes, the British vice consul, and an Irish Catholic priest by the name of Macnamara, had been prevented by the counter movements of the insurrection of the settlers. This junta was proposed for the purpose of asking the protection of England, and of giving an immense tract of land in the valley of the San Joaquin for the settlement of ten thousand Irishmen, to be brought to California under the direction of Macnamara. All this intrigue of British agents was broken up by the timely and prompt operations of the settlers, under the direction of Captain Fremont.

Capt. Hensley's deposition.—Extract.

"I have resided in California, where I have resided since the autumn of 1843. In the month of May, 1846, I went to San Francisco, where I met with General Vallejo, one of the most prominent and influential men in Upper California. I understood from him that he had recently attended a convention, composed of Gen. Castro, himself, and other officers, delegated from the different districts of California, at which the proposition had been made and decided to negotiate from Mexico and establish a government in California, under the protection of some foreign power, believed by us to be England. The foreign general pointed out to me the majority was not in favor of peace, the county under the protection of the United States, though he himself was. Gen. Vallejo was of course guarded in conversing on so dangerous a subject as this was at that time, but the above is the substance of his remarks, as understood by myself and others who heard them.

"About the time I heard that Capt. Fremont had returned from the northward, and was then in the upper part of the Sacramento valley. I immediately repaired to his camp, where I informed him of all that I had learned respecting the condition of the country and the designs of the leading men among the Californians, giving it as my opinion that the American residents would have to leave the country or fight for their homes at the same time saying I was sure we would not leave the country.

"Captain Fremont resolved to join the Americans for their safety, and to overthrow the Mexican force in that province.

"The fourth of July was duly celebrated, and on the fifth we organized the 'California battalion,' adopting the 'grizzly bear' as our emblem, requesting Captain Fremont to take command of the battalion and of all the forces and resources of the country, which command he accepted. As soon as it was known that Captain Fremont had accepted the command, the Californian population seemed to become well pleased with the change in affairs, and brought in their property and means of warfare, which they placed at Fremont's disposal. He restored to them and to the American settlers all the horses which had been previously captured or pressed into the service by the Americans, retaining only a number sufficient for the actual wants of the service. He then marched on with the battalion in pursuit of Castro, by way of the Sacramento, sending me with a small party to communicate with Dr. Marsh. When I arrived at Marsh's, I learned that war had been declared between the United States and Mexico, and that Commodore Sloat had arrived at Monterey and raised the Alpine ensign. Returning with this intelligence, I found that Captain Fremont and already learned it, and was on his way to Monterey. I followed and joined him at the mission of San Juan, near Monterey."

Captain Child's statement—extract.

"I know that Gen. Vallejo left Sonoma for the purpose of attending a general council at Monterey, about the time the Irish priest, Macnamara, arrived in California, and a short time before the revolution in that country; and I recollect hearing that the English consul, Mr. Forbes, accompanied him to the Pueblo de los Angeles, for the purpose of seeing the governor in relation to obtaining a grant of land, upon which it was said a colony of British subjects was to be established.

"The revolution, to the best of my knowledge, put an entire stop to such grants and sales."

Captain Owens's deposition—extract.

"The settlers made many applications for help to Captain Fremont, on the ground that they were American citizens. We went down and encamped at the Buttes, about sixty miles above Sutter's. There was a good deal of correspondence between the settlers and our camp, and as the danger seemed near at hand, and there was no other way to get out of it, it was finally agreed to join the settlers and fight the Californians. In this was the revolution began. The settlers were divorced at in self defence. But I do not think that it would have taken place, or that they could have been united together without the advice and protection of Captain Fremont. They had not confidence enough in their own strength to undertake the war without support. Captain Fremont's party was strong and well armed, and went together like one man. The strength of this party and the name of Captain Fremont, as I understood, at once gave confidence and kept the people together both during the revolution and in the war afterwards."

Lieutenant Lakers's deposition—extract.

"About the time Castro was raising men to drive Colonel Fremont out of the country, I was staying at Sutter's Fort, in the Sacramento valley; there was also a large number of American settlers around and near the fort, and Castro's movements excited a good deal of excitement, so much so that many of them wanted to go to Fremont's assistance immediately, and would have gone had not the colonel forbidden any to go on the American fork; after he had left for the Tlamath lake there was a good deal of talk about England taking possession of the country, and many foreigners of the highest standing in the country asserted that they knew that English ships of war were on the coast; and that a British man of war was on the northwest coast, and would be down in the course of the summer to take possession of California. Soon after Colonel Fremont left, Major Gillespie arrived, started after, and brought him back; then commenced the revolution, which, had he not countenanced and aided, I know not what would have been the consequences to the American settlers, women and children included; for, just before his return, there was a meeting of the principal men of the country at Monterey, they there thought it advisable to order all foreigners to leave the country, and published a bando to that effect, ordering all foreigners to leave the country by a certain day, or force would be used to compel them to leave; women and children were included in the banishment; and Colonel Fremont returning in the country about that time, and finding that the men in the valley much excited, and the alarm of the women, could not have acted otherwise than he did."

Dr. Baldwin's deposition—extract.

"I again entered Mexico (city) on the 14th of September, 1847, and remained there until the 15th of November; during that time I made the acquaintance of Don Ernest Macnamara, and, from sources entitled to credit, I was informed that he had, under the auspices of the British legation, projected a plan to colonize Californias with emigrants from Ireland. His project had met the approbation of the Mexican government, and he went to California to perfect his plans. In the mean time it was ascertained that the ulterior views of Macnamara were to promote the interest of the British government, and not the Mexican government. A fierce opposition was contemplated by the republican members of Congress when he should return with his matured plans from California; this resistance became unnecessary in consequence of the conquest of California by the arms of the United States. Macnamara lived in the family of either the British consul or charge des affaires in Mexico."

This is a small part—a small part only—of the depositions which establish the great points which I have mentioned, that there was a plan in progress at the time of Mr. Fremont's return from the Tlamath lake to place California under British protection—to transfer the public domain to British subjects, and to expel or destroy all the American settlers; and that this plan was frustrated by the heroic determination of Mr. Fremont to put himself at the head of the people, and to overturn the Mexican government in California. But it is not all the proof which shows the British desire to possess California, and especially the magnificent bay of San Francisco. That desire is no new passion with that power. From the time of the great navigator, Capt. Cook, her eyes have been fixed on the northwest coast of America. Three times, within half a century, have British national vessels surveyed that coast, and especially the bay of San Francisco. Vancouver, Beechey, and Belcher, have each surveyed it, and the bay itself, with all the particularity of the survey of a British sailor. Here is a chart of this bay made by Beechey in 1828, published at the Royal Hydrographic Bureau, exhibiting the most commodious and capacious harbor upon the face of the earth, large enough to hold all the navies of the world, an easy and defensible entrance from the sea, opening out forty miles to the right and left, sheltered from every wind, receiving two handsome rivers, draining a basin of five hundred miles of fertile valleys and picturesque mountains, a healthy and delightful climate, and backed at the distance of one hundred and twenty miles by the lofty ridge of the Sierra Nevada, crowned with eternal snow. Upon this bay Great Britain has had her eyes fixed for half a century; and, in June, 1846, at the moment of Mr. Fremont's return from the Tlamath Lake, all her long deferred and cherished inclinations seemed to be on the point of realization. The revolt of the settlers frustrated this ripened hope, in the apparent moment of fruition, and placed the coveted prize under the flag of the United States.

This finishes the first act of the conquest of California. It fin-jobs the revolutionary movement in favor of independence, and brings Mr. Fremont and his victorious battalion to Monterey—their flag of independence exchanged for that of the United States—themselves uniting with the naval forces—and turning over all the fruits of their successful enterprise to the government of the United States.

The committee, appreciating at its full value all the importance of this revolutionary movement, both as it concerns nations and individuals, and the truth of history, have instituted into it a most searching examination; and the result is what I have stated, and what the document of evidence proves. And their opinion was unanimous that, although this movement was made without the authority or knowledge of the government, and without the knowledge that war existed at the time between the United States and Mexico, yet such being the fact, and the United States having received all the benefits of the movement, they are bound in honor and in conscience to pay all its expenses.

Commodore Sloat returned to the United States; Commodore Stockton succeeded to the command; and here commenced his connexion with the conquest of California. He proposed to complete the conquest by pursuing Castro to the south, and taking the "city of the Angels." But the aid of a land force was indispensable to this enterprise; and here the American settlers again showed their courage and patriotism. Commodore Stockton applied to Fremont and Gillespie to join with their battalion—to serve under him, and obey his orders. They agreed to do so, both men and officers, and this was fully sworn by Commodore Stockton before the late court martial. On receiving the command from Commodore Sloat, he says:

"Immediately sent to Major Fremont to inform him of what had occurred, and to let him know that, if he and Lieut. Gillespie, with the volunteers who were with them, would volunteer to serve under my command so long as I might be in possession of California and do and their services, that I would form a battalion by appointing him Capt. Fremont, major. This was all done in the course of the day, and the next morning, when they were ordered to embark on board the United States ship Cyane, to be landed at San Diego. These men were not of the kind of personnel which sometimes compose regular armies. They were principally free American citizens, who had settled in California. They were men of respectability, of influence, and of property; they were no ordinary men, because, when told that I had offered them so per ten dollars a month, they said, as I was told, that they would not accept that pay, that it would not pay their expenses; but that they would volunteer to serve under my command without any compensation."

Thus the men of the battalion passed into the service of the United States without a stipulation for fixed compensation, but with the full expectation that justice would be done them. Mr. Fremont, actuated wholly by public and patriotic considerations, took command under Commodore Stockton. He gave up his independent position; become subordinate to Commodore Stockton; carried with him the men of the country, and ensured the complete conquest of the country; for, without land forces, the conquest could not have been accomplished.

This was the last of July. Leaving their horses on shore, the men immediately went on board the Cyane, sailed down the coast five hundred miles to San Diego, and marched for Los Angeles, distant one hundred and fifty miles. This city (the capital of the Californias) was taken early in August; and with its capture, the conquest of California was complete. But the conquest was to be preserved. The orders to the naval officers were to conquer, hold, and govern California, and to do that, the services of land forces was further wanted. The seamen and marines were wanted on board the vessels; no troops of the United States were there. The further services of Fremont's battalion became indispensable. They demanded twenty-five dollars a month, (which is very near the amount allowed by law to mounted men,) and only remained in service upon condition of receiving it. So testifies Captain Hensley, an officer of the battalion, and a gentleman of character and intelligence, who was examined before the committee. He says:

"I was present when the California battalion was inducted into the service of the United States, and the men then positively refused to serve for eleven dollars per month. They remained in the service without any rate of pay being specified, until, in August, 1846, at the City of Angels, Colonel Fremont ordered me to inquire of my company at what rate of pay they would consent to remain in the service. They unanimously demanded twenty-five dollars per month, and refused to remain any longer in service unless that amount was promised them. I considered the rate of pay demanded by the men as reasonable for that country, and under all the circumstances."

Upon these terms they remained in service to garrison the country.

But a new, and more arduous service was required from the California battalion. In the fall of 1846 an insurrection broke out in Southern California, and the battalion was called upon to join in its suppression. Most of them had returned to the North. Another campaign to the South was required, and many recruits necessary to complete its strength. A body of emigrants had just arrived from the United States, and stopped in the valley of the Sacramento. Leaving their families slightly provided with shelter and subsistence, above two hundred of them joined Mr. Fremont for this new expedition of near seven hundred miles distance. At first it was attempted from the San Francisco bay by sea. Baffled in that attempt, after twenty days' contest with adverse winds, a return to Monterey, and an overland march to Los Angeles, became unavoidable. It was the beginning of winter—the cold rains already set in—a country of defiles and mountains, and in a state of insurrection, to be traversed—and every thing to be procured, and without money. In a few weeks all was ready—cannon mounted, beef cattle procured, six hundred horses collected. It was a march of extraordinary hardship, as well as requiring military skill. Every day many horses perished of hunger and cold, and on Christmas day above an hundred died on the Santa Barbara in a storm of wind and rain, black with the tempest from the Pacific ocean. The march required skill; but it was with something more than a soldier's eye that Mr. Fremont felt it to be his duty to survey the field before him. He knew that the Californians against whom he was going were themselves revolutionists—successful insurgents against Mexican authority—and conscious that they must come either under the American or British flag. Conciliation was his policy. To gain over these people by mildness and justice, instead of crushing them by arms, became his object; and to the attainment of this object all his military movements became subordinate and subservient. San Luis Obispo, a focus of insurrection, the seat of a commandant, and distant one hundred and fifty miles, was to be taken and passed. He conceived the design of a secret march—a surprise—a capture without bloodshed—and the seizure of the insurgent chiefs: and he accomplished that design. The secret march was made—town surprised—and the arrests effected—and effected with the quiet and order of so many civil arrests in one of our peaceful cities. Don Jesus Pico, and some thirty others, were taken. Then an event occurred which gave a decisive turn to the character of the war, and ensured its peaceful and happy conclusion. Don Jesus Pico was particularly obnoxious to the Americans. He had broken his parole—been active in the insurrection—and had sent out an expedition in which Capt. Borrows and some brave men had been killed. He was placed before a court martial, condemned, and ordered to be shot. Mr. Fremont pardoned him, and in that act consummated his policy of conciliation, prevented further resistance to his march, and prepared the way for the capitulation of Couenga. Don Jesus was connected with all the principal families by blood and marriage. He was cousin to Don Andres Pico, a principal chief of the insurrection at Los Angeles. He attached himself to Mr. Fremont; took the side of peace and conciliation; went with him in his march; and contributed to quiet the towns through which they had to pass. The people remained in their houses, offered no resistance, and received no harm. A corps of observation which hung upon his march yielded the maritime pass of the Punto Gordo without resistance, and galloped about without giving or receiving any serious attack. The main body of the insurgents at Los Angeles; hearing of his approach, and that he had passed Santa Barbara, marched out to meet him; then, changing their minds, they turned back to the south, and fought the actions of the 8th and 9th of January, with Commodore Stockton. Repulsed, but not routed. (for Commodore Stockton's command was all on foot, and the insurgents all mounted,) they turned again to meet Mr. Fremont, and took post in the pass of San Fernando. They undertook to defend the pass, which being turned by the riflemen, they fell back into the plain of Couenga, famous as a battle field in the strifes of California. Mr. Fremont sent them a message. They agreed to meet him. He went out alone to see them, attended only by Don Jesus Pico, (who had attached himself to him for life and for death since his pardon,) and had an interview with Don Andres Pico and other chiefs. They agreed to capitulate to him, and to nobody but him, declaring that they would take to the mountains "and die like wild beasts," before they would submit to any one but him. The terms were agreed upon, and they were conformable to the law of nations, and to the law of common sense and justice. The insurgents gave up their cannon and public arms, retired to their homes, promised submission to the American authority, and aid in preserving order, and in return were to receive protection, and not to be required to take the oath of allegiance to the United States until a definitive treaty of peace with Mexico should fix their political condition. These terms, agreed upon in person, were reduced to form by commissioners appointed on each side, approved by the respective commanders-in-chief, (Commodore Stockton and Don Andres Pico,) and the war not only terminated and peace established, but the fruits of peace acquired and enjoyed.

This was the conclusion of the war, and was so related by the United States consul at Monterey, (Mr. O. Larkin,) who was a prisoner in the hands of the insurgents at the time of Mr. Fremont's approach to Los Angeles. He says:

"On the 3d or 4th of January news reached the Puebla that Colonel Fremont was south of Santa Barbara, marching to meet the Californian forces. The latter then mustered all they could, to the number of 400 to 500, and encamped two or three days at the mission of San Fernando, awaiting the arrival of the riflemen, and appeared very anxious to have a fight. Information now reached General Flores that Commodore Stockton, with 600 men from San Diego, would soon be in his vicinity. He immediately ordered all the Mexicans and Californias to leave San Fernando, and march to the opposite site of the Puebla to meet the marine forces. * * * * * * *

"On the 13th of January the capitulation of Couenga was signed. * * * * * * *

"The war in California is now over, as far as the Californians are concerned, and if their manners and customs are tolerated, and common protection afforded them, they will gradually fall into the new order of affairs. They have had, in different parts, nine hundred men under arms, every man with good horses and a lance, most of them with swords, pistols, rifles, or carbines, every one of them countrymen, to aid them either by choice or force; a perfect knowledge of every hill and valley; yet they did not succeed, and have found their losses in horses and waste of time so great as to prefer peace for the future, under a guaranty of good treatment."

The capitulation of Couenga was the happy conclusion of the war, and is so testified by many witnesses. Midshipman Wilson, a captain in the Californian battalion, says:

"We had frequent skirmishes with parties of the enemy until the capitulation of Couenga, which acted almost magically in restoring peace and tranquility to the country; and but for that capitulation, so beneficial in its results, my impression is that the Californians would have carried on a system of guerrilla warfare, by which many lives and much property would have been sacrificed."

Col. Russel, who was chief staff officer in the battalion, and one of the commissioners for making the capitulation, says:

"At the capitulation of Don Andres Pico to Col. Fremont, he and other Californians boldly declared their determination never to submit to any other officer than him, and on the terms granted in the capitulation of Couenga, of which I was one of the negotiators.

"I hesitate not to give it as my decided opinion that the capitulation of Couenga on the 13th January, 1847, was the main cause of saving the country from a bloody, vexatious, predatory warfare, that would necessarily have been protracted for a considerable length of time.

"I remained at Los Angeles over two months after the capitulation, and became well acquainted and conversed much with the families in that part of the country, and from all I could learn the good results of that treaty in preventing a guerrilla warfare was fully confirmed."

This was the conclusion of the war, and the restoration of peace, and its fruits. The capitulation of Couenga was the pacification and reconciliation of California. It was the last act in the drama of the conquest, and, like the first movement in the valley of the Sacramento, was done upon the responsibility of Mr. Fremont alone. From the day it was signed, peace and good-will prevailed in the country. Travelling and living became as secure as in any part of the United States. Mr. Fremont could have gone back alone, without arms or guards, upon the line of his march from Los Angeles to Monterey, without interruption from the people, except in the manifestations of their gratitude and affection. He did go back upon it in that extraordinary ride with Don Jesus Pico, and was greeted every where by the hospitalities of the people. He afterwards lived two months as Governor in the capital of the Californias, like any Governor would live in the capital of one of our States, without guards or sentries, or any semblance of military protection, the battalion being sent off ten miles to keep it out of the town.

And thus the same men who began the war finished it. The California battalion, formed out of the California settlers on the Sacramento and the men of the topographical party, (reinforced afterwards by later emigrants from the United States,) finished on the plains of COUENGA the movement which had commenced at SONOMA, and in the same spirit of justice, moderation, and patriotism. In conjunction with the sailors and marines they had twice conquered California before the United States troops arrived in the country. They did it without aid from the United States—without quartermasters, commissaries, and paymasters to carry, feed, and pay them. The fruits of all their labors have been received by the United States, and the bill rendered is only seven hundred thousand dollars—a fraction only of the amount paid to those who arrived after the work was done. It should have been provided for in one of the public bills. It is an appropriation, and of a public nature, and of the most sacred nature. It should at least have had a place in that "deficiency" bill of fourteen millions which lately passed Congress; for what can be more deficient than non-payment, for almost two years, for such extraordinary services? Even if this bill is passed at once, and with the least possible delay from legislative forms, it will still be almost half a year before the claimants can begin to touch their pay.

The bill is carefully drawn, both with a view to public and to private justice. It is intended to settle up and pay up at once all just claims, and to close the door for ever upon all false ones. A commission acquainted with the subject, familiar with every transaction, is to go to California, visit every district in which claims originated, call all before them, allow the good, reject the bad, and bar all that are not presented to them. In this way, and in this alone, can justice be done to all parties, just claimants saved from the depredations of agents and speculators, the United States saved from paying false accounts, and California prevented from becoming a mine for the production of false claims for half a century to come. The great and main facts, that services have been rendered, that the United States have received the benefit of these services, and that they have not been paid for, are established by the depositions; the mode of settlement, and the detail of payment is directed by the bill.

Mr. DAYTON then took the floor, with a view of addressing the Senate to-morrow, and the bill was, by unanimous consent, passed over informally.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion by Mr. HANNEGAN, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business, and after some time spent therein, the doors were opened, and

TUESDAY, APRIL 11, 1848.

COMMUNICATION FROM THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanied by a report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 22d January, 1847, respecting the quantity of public lands sold, after having been subject to private entry, at different periods

Ordered, That it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. DICKINSON presented a resolution of the Legislature of the State of New York, in favor of the enactment of a law allowing full pay to the widows of officers and soldiers killed in battle, or who die of wounds received in the service; which was ordered to lie upon the table, and be printed.

PETITIONS.

Mr. BRADBURY presented a petition of citizens of Corinna, Maine, praying that an inquiry may be instituted by Congress, whether the slave-trade is carried on in the District of Columbia, and under what authority; the motion to receive which, was laid upon the table.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, presented the memorial of John S. Skinner, of the City of New York, praying, in behalf of the agriculturists of the country, an appropriation of money, to be applied under the direction of the State governments, or as Congress may otherwise direct, to the establishment of institutions for instruction in geology, mineralogy, and vegetable and animal physiology, in civil engineering as applied to road making, bridge building, and other rural architecture, and to instruction in the mechanical principles on which depend the labor-saving properties and efficiency of agricultural implements and machinery!

In presenting this memorial, Mr. JOHNSON said: In presenting this paper, Mr. President, I cannot but express my gratification that it has been committed to my charge. The memorialist himself is not only known, but justly distinguished for the zeal, ability, and efficiency with which, for a period of near thirty years, he has pursued and promoted the great cause of agricultural science. It may, I think, with truth be said, that its present improved condition amongst us is more or less to be attributed to his long and continued efforts. He has not only been its first pioneer, but he has been throughout, and still is in the advance, earnestly striving to remove all remaining obstructions, and to bring it to a state of ultimate perfection. Such is his object in the present memorial; and if he succeeds, as, looking to the real honor and interest of the nation, I trust he will, what incalculable benefit will he have conferred upon the country? Military glory may cause the nation's heart to beat high with gratitude, but it more often dazzles to delude than ends in permanent strength and renown. It is the achievements of civil life which impart to human power its highest value; and, of all the departments of civil employment, the most worthy, the most to be cherished, and especially under a government like ours, is agriculture. To say nothing of the incalculable value of its productions, capable as they are too of continued increase by the proper intellectual improvement of its followers, what strength is not given to free institutions by the uniform and almost necessary virtue of such a population.

And yet, sir, whilst millions have been and are still being expended by us for the arts which teach the destruction of life, how much has been given to this noblest of all sciences, which instructs only to promote, to prolong, and to render life happy and virtuous? Nothing, literally nothing. Sir, the memorialist states, and I have such confidence in his accuracy that I am sure the statement may be relied upon, that of the amount of the disbursements of the government eighty per cent. is for military and naval expenses; that is to say, eighty dollars of every one hundred dollars paid by the people into the treasury is appropriated to the keeping up our military establishments and preparations for war; whilst for agriculture, which exists only for peace and through peace, which brings no wo, but only immense good, not one dollar is given. He reminds us also, and it is a fact eminently worthy of the public attention, that during the whole period of Washington's administration our military expenses were only $11,000,000, whilst for a similar period of eight years, terminating in 1843, they were $164,000,000. It is, sir, a striking and a fearful lesson. It teaches us that, popular as war is, other institutions have in that respect a natural tendency in the same direction, and that the result in the end may be the same—the oppression of heavy and crushing taxation.

He gives us another fact also worthy of notice, and especially worthy of the notice of the agriculturists of the nation. It is this: that from 1789 to 1843 the expenditures of the government, exclusive of payments on account of the public debt, for merely civil objects were $246,620,000, whilst for the same time they were for military and naval objects $538,964,278. And even of this trifling comparative amount appropriated for peaceful purposes only, the agriculturists of the country enjoyed no exclusive advantage. To encourage their department of human labor, to improve their condition, to increase their power, to elevate them in the scale of social existence, not a dollar of it was applied. And yet, sir, what claims have they not had upon the countenance and protection of the government?

To say nothing of the fact which reason establishes and history confirms, that it is with them that the true strength and virtue of a free people are ever to be found, the immense disproportionate wealth that they bring into the common fund persuasively demands for them the fostering hand of all. It is estimated, sir, and the amount is, I incline to think, below the truth, to be $654,387,597—a sum three times greater than the value of the manufacturing industry of the country, and five times greater than that of all the other sources of human industry combined.

I invoke the serious regard of the agriculturists to these facts. They must see in them how commanding are their claims upon the government, and how shamelessly they have been disregarded. The cause is to be found in their want heretofore of union amongst themselves in some movement upon the subject. There seems to be now approaching a propitious time for some joint and effectual effort. Peace, I trust, will soon be seen to hush the noise of war within our own borders. The mighty popular convulsions now heaving with terrific power in the old world promise to subside in the annihilation of arms as an employment. The long-lost or limited liberty of man appears to be on the eve of complete restoration. Civil employment, nothing but civil employment, should be the result: and happiness, and wealth, and power, and true glory will be promoted in proportion as governments devote their means to the proper encouragement of civil life. This, sir, is not the occasion to meet in advance any constitutional impediment which may be suggested to the particular encouragement solicited by this memorial. I content myself, therefore, with saying that a careful examination of the question, founded upon the letter and spirit of the constitution, and the opinions of its fathers, leave my mind in no doubt, in none whatever.

If commerce can be protected and encouraged, and it has been from the beginning of the government to the present day; if manufactures can be protected and encouraged, and they have also been from first to last; if the profession of arms even can be protected and encouraged, and when has it not been, then why may not agriculture and her followers be protected and encouraged?

Without adding a word more, I submit the memorial, and, as I believe there is no committee to whom its reference would be peculiarly appropriate, I move that it be referred to a special committee, and be printed.

Mr. BERRIEN observed that there was a Committee on Agriculture, to which it appropriately belonged.

Mr. JOHNSON then moved that it be referred to that committee.

The motion was agreed to, and the memorial was ordered to be printed.

Mr. HALE presented a petition of citizens of Meriden, Connecticut, praying that Congress may inquire to what extent, and by what authority, slavery exists in the District of Columbia; the motion to receive which was laid upon the table.

Also, two petitions of citizens of Pennsylvania, praying such amendment to the constitution or laws, as shall appropriate the public lands in the extinction of slavery throughout the Union; the motions to receive which were laid upon the table.

Also, two petitions from citizens of Maine praying that an inquiry may be instituted by Congress whether the slave trade is carried on in the District of Columbia, and under what legal authority; the motions to receive which were laid upon the table.

The said bill was read a third time.

Resolved, That this bill pass.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives accordingly.

BRANCH MINT IN NEW YORK.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to establish a branch of the Mint of the United States in the city of New York; and

On motion by Mr. DICKINSON, it was Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed to, and made the order of the day for, Monday the 8th day of May next.

ACQUISITION OF TERRITORY AND SLAVERY THEREIN.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolutions submitted by Mr. BAGBY, on the 25th and 27th January last, in relation to the acquisition of territory by treaty or conquest, and the question of slavery in any such acquired territory.

Mr. BAGBY.—Mr. President:—These resolutions were introduced on the 25th day of January, at which time, there were before the Senate, questions of pressing practical importance, connected with the vigorous and efficient prosecution of the war with Mexico, and claiming the paramount, if not the exclusive consideration of the Senate. They were called up repeatedly, in the progress of the business of the Senate, and at each time, they were so called, I stated distinctly, what I now repeat, that, satisfied as I was upon the fullest, maturest, and most deliberate consideration of the justice of that war, on our part, I would not, so far as depended on my action, permit any other measure, no matter what considerations it might involve, to interfere with the adoption promptly, and at once of the measures necessary for the efficient and vigorous prosecution of the war. I did not believe then, nor do I believe now, in windy, fustian speeches. Action, and not words and noisy declamation, is the appropriate business of men engaged in matters of great concern, not only to this country, but to other countries; not only the present generation, but to after times.

These resolutions embrace four distinct propositions, upon the correct solution of some, if not all of which, in my judgment, the perpetuity of our institutions depend. The first contains a distinct, substantive, and unqualified limitation upon the constitutional power of Congress, to abolish or to prohibit slavery in any State or Territory of this Union. This position is assumed upon the fullest consideration, and after the most mature reflection as to all the consequences proximate or remote; consequences either present or prospective, so far as the action of Congress is concerned. If the correctness of this position is well sustained and deep laid in the constitution, of which I have not the shadow of a doubt, then, the truth and the correctness of it, ought to be adopted and proclaimed. The people of the country ought to be informed, whether, in the opinion of Congress, their rights depend and stand upon the adamantine principles and guaranties of the constitution, or, whether they float in the visionary imaginations of moon-struck philosophers, or pretended philanthropists. I cannot be led now, I cannot be tempted into discussion upon the abstract question of slavery. Whatever it is, those who hold it under the provisions of the constitution, found it either for good or for evil, either as a blessing or a curse, in the path-way of their destiny, and there it will stand until the constitution is changed, or until it is undermined by that insidious torrent, which is ever and anon lashing against it. I have but little fear of either. The second resolution I should not have introduced, but for the daily insinuations here, that the acquisition of territory in a lawful war, was, in the expressive and refined language of the day, land stealing. Whenever the truth and correctness of the proposition contained in the second resolution is seriously controverted, I stand prepared to sustain it fully, and to the whole extent by law, precedent, practice and principle, as recognized by every civilized nation from the earliest periods of authentic history, down to the present time. I will not anticipate objections which I do not think will be seriously urged, and which I know cannot be sustained, either by reason or authority. The third resolution contains a clear and express limitation upon the powers of two branches of the government of the United States; to wit, the treaty-making power and Congress; and declares that neither of these branches in territory to be acquired by the United States, shall have power to exclude slavery as property, from such territory—but that such territory shall be equally free and open to the citizens of each and all the citizens of the United States, without any limitation, prohibition, or restriction, in regard to slaves or any other description of property whatever. The first branch of this proposition restrains the general government from the exercise of any interference with the rights of property in the possession under the constitution, of any portion of the people of the United States: and the second branch contains but a re-assertion and re-affirmance of that great fundamental principle that lies at the bottom of our institutions, that whatever is acquired by common blood or by common treasure, or by both, shall be the common property of all the people of the United States, and equally free to the use, occupation, and enjoyment of all. This proposition rests upon the constitution; it is sustained by every consideration of equity, truth and justice, and fortified by the eternal principles of reason and of right. And, as I had occasion to say on a former occasion, I do not believe there is a man in America with a mind unswayed by local considerations, or unbiassed and uninfluenced by sectional considerations, who believes that property acquired by common blood and common treasure, should not enure to the equal benefit of all the people of all the States of this great and growing nation. What is the constitution of the United States? There is no difference of opinion upon this point. It is universally admitted, by American statesmen, to be a compact between sovereign States. In political power the parties to it are perfect equals. There is no difference in this respect between Delaware and New York, or Rhode Island and Pennsylvania. If, then, the constitution be a compact between parties, whose rights and powers under it are precisely the same, let us enquire into the causes and considerations that induced the parties to enter into that compact. It was in the language of the preamble to the constitution "to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to themselves and our posterity. These were the objects for which the States voluntarily disrobed themselves of a portion of their sovereignty and offered it up a willing sacrifice upon the altar of a common country. They were objects, the permanent security of which constituted a fair and adequate equivalent for the solemn surrender of a portion of that sovereignty, to obtain and establish which, the aspirations of the purest patriots had been elevated, and the best blood of the revolution was spilt—to obtain which, the eloquence of Henry had thundered, and Warren had died. The great question for the consideration of the Senate is, how these objects can be best promoted, secured, perpetuated? To my mind, this is a question of easy solution. It is by carrying out the provisions of the constitution according to their obvious meaning and import, keeping in view the rule equally applicable in the proper construction of all instruments, the intention of the parties, and the objects they intended to secure and provide for at the time they entered into it; guarding with equal vigilance and caution against implication and unauthorized construction on the one hand, and officious interpolation on the other. In a word, by taking the constitution as it is and as its immortal framers intended it to be. I do not propose, Mr. President, to enquire into the power of the government to acquire territory. I hold that to be a point settled, beyond the power of controversy to disturb it. It is a power necessarily, properly, and inseparably incident to the power to declare and treaty making power. I shall content myself, for the present, with enquiring what are the rights of each and all the citizens of all the States of the Union in regard to the territory acquired, either by by treaty or by conquest. And I assert and maintain, in the language of the third resolution, that such territory when acquired by the United States is, and of right ought to be, equally free and open to all the citizens of all the United States, without any limitation, prohibition or restriction in regard to slaves, or any other description of property whatever; and would it, permit me to ask, tend to establish justice, or, to promote its great ends, to declare that when territory had been acquired by the joint efforts, and joint contributions of the people of the slaveholding and the non-slaving States, that the latter should use, possess, and enjoy it ad libitum, and that the latter should be excluded from it, unless they divested themselves of their property, and the means of subsistence before they set their feet upon it. The proposition is at once absurd and ridiculous, to state, it, is, at once, to answer and refute it. For the sake of illustration, assimilate the compact entered into by the States at the adoption of the constitution to the case of an ordinary copartnership into which two or more persons had entered for the purpose of promoting, by lawful means, their mutual interests. Suppose in the course of their mutual exertions, sacrifices, and labors, they acquire land by purchase, or in payment of a debt due to the copartners, contracted in the course of the partnership transactions. Is there a man so dead to all the feelings and suggestions of reason, and above all, to the eternal principles of justice, equity, and morality, as to contend that, one or more of said partners would be at liberty, and have a right to the full and interrupted enjoyment of the land thus acquired, and that the other partner or partners should be excluded from it, contrary to, the resolution of the original articles of copartnership or compact between them? And yet, this is the precise monstrosity in law, equity, justice, morality, reason, and common sense, into which those have fallen who contend for the power in the general government to exclude slaves as property, from territory acquired by the United States. I know a distinction has been attempted to be drawn, of late, between territory where slavery exists, at the time of acquisition, and that where it does not. But they cannot dispose of any territory or any other property belonging to the United States with a view to promote the interests of any portion of the people of the United States, and thereby to prejudice or exclude the rights of other citizens of the United States. The foundation of our system, and of every system of free government is, equality of rights. This distinction, whether true or false, real or imaginary, has nothing to do with the question. The true question is, not what are the institutions existing in the territory at the time of its acquisition, but what powers the government of the United States can exercise in regard to it after it is acquired. The title to the territory vests in the United States, and they can dispose of it in the same manner, and under the same rules and regulations, that they can dispose of other property belonging to the United States. The only legitimate object for which territory can be acquired is the formation of new States. We cannot, according to the provisions of the constitution, or the nature and genius of our institutions, hold it as provinces. The colonial system was never in the contemplation of the framers of the constitution, and is not only not contained in any of its provisions, but is at war with all its fundamental principles. Such a system would tend, with inevitable certainty, to a vast and dangerous increase of executive power, and might in the end, overshadow the rights and independence of the States, and subvert the government, and establish a despotism in its stead. Colonial organization would live, and move, and have its being in executive power and patronage, and would end in the destruction of liberty. I am not ignorant that a doctrine different from the one for which I am contending has been asserted in an imposing form, and in some sections of the Union to a considerable extent. Great and intelligent communities, speaking, solemnly through their assembled representatives have asserted the power to be in Congress, and called for its exercise, to exclude, by a fundamental law, slaves as property from all territory to be hereafter acquired. I shall not attempt to investigate or to answer the arguments by which they arrive at this conclusion. I have no doubt they are sincere in the entertainment of these views. Somebody has said, that when a man is determined to believe, the very absurdity of the doctrine confirms him in the faith. I leave them to their reflections, and appeal to the law and the testimony. I consult the constitution, and fearlessly assert that such a doctrine has no support, either in the provisions or spirit of that instrument, or in the more enduring and eternal principles of equality and justice. I warn the advocates of this doctrine, in advance, that they are contending for principles destructive of the constitution—destructive of the rights of the southern states—destructive of equality among the citizens of the United States, and that this Union would not survive the establishment of such a doctrine an hour.

I have listened with apprehension not unmixed with indignation, at the coldness and even hostility with which gentlemen from the free States speak of the institution of slavery, as it exists under the guarantees of the constitution, in some of the States of this Union. After felicitating themselves, with more than Pharisaical righteousness, that they "are not as other men," they, in a spirit of amazing condescension and kindness, charitably assure us they will not interfere with slavery, as it now exists. Was there ever more surpassing impudence? I scorn to accept the charitable donation. I reject the proffered boon. Sir, the people of the slave-holding States do not hold their rights by a tenure so frail and uncertain as the will, or the forbearance, or the concessions, or the gratuity of a majority in Congress. They derive them from a higher and purer source. They derive them from the constitution; and highly as they venerate that instrument, when it ceases to ensure to them the free and full enjoyment of these rights, they will no longer consider it worth preserving. These, sir, are some of my views in regard to the principles involved in the three first resolutions. Before I took my seat in the Senate at the present session, the honorable Senator from New York, [Mr. DICKINSON,] had introduced a series of resolutions, embracing to some, perhaps to the whole extent, the principles involved in those which, at a later day, I had the honor of submitting to the Senate. Anxious as far as a sense of propriety and the paramount obligations of duty would enable me to do so, to avoid the introduction of topics which might subject me to the imputation of being influenced by sectional views, and local considerations, I examined the resolutions brought forward by that honorable Senator with great care, and with a sincere desire, if I could, according to the dictates of my best judgment, upon the principles of the constitution and the rights of the people, to agree with him. After the most thorough examination of his resolutions, and with entire respect for him, I have found myself utterly unable to do so. I therefore brought forward the fourth resolution, which is exactly antagonistical to the resolution of the Senator from New York. His resolution is in these words:

Resolved, That in organizing a territorial government for territory belonging to the United States the principles of self-government, upon which our free system rests, while best promoted, the true spirit and meaning of the constitution be observed, and the confederacy strengthened, by leaving the questions concerning the domestic policy therein to legislatures chosen by the people thereof.

Now, although this resolution does not assert the power of the government in positive terms, it is evidently intended to convey the idea that the territorial legislature chosen by the people, are, and of right ought to be, the exclusive judges of all questions of policy arising in the territory. The correctness of this position I deny to the whole extent. The people of a territory belonging to the United States possess no other rights than those which belong to all unorganized communities, or bodies of men, which flow from the laws of nature, except those which they derive from the United States; and unless it can be shown that the constitution authorizes Congress to impose limitations and restrictions upon them in regard to slavery, they cannot derive that power from Congress. But I do not consider it necessary to discuss this question, or, the still graver one, whether Congress has power to establish territorial governments at all. Although I admit if this were a new question, presented for the first time, I should be at a loss from what particular clause, or provision, or principle of the constitution to deduce it. And, in reflecting upon this subject when these resolutions were brought forward, I stated to an honorable friend near me, whose friendly intercourse and confidence it is my good fortune to enjoy, my own doubts or convictions upon this subject, but said I would not disturb that question when there were so many topics of agitation and disagreement among the people of the United States, who ought to be bound together by the indissoluble ties of fraternal feeling and good fellowship; but would leave it to the uniform, unbroken practice of the government for fifty years. There I am willing to leave it. Stare decisis. But to return to the people of the territory. They are of two descriptions. Those who inhabit, or are upon the territory at the time it is acquired, and those who migrate or remove to it afterwards. The rights of the former are defined by treaty stipulation. The latter carry with them rights of citizens of the United States, so far as the possession and enjoyment of property is concerned, and such political privileges and immunities as Congress may confer upon them, by the act authorizing them to form a temporary government, confining that act, of course, within the limits of the constitution. But the idea that the people residing upon territory acquired by the United States, either by treaty or conquest, are to be entitled to the enjoyment of any right, privilege, or immunity to which the citizens of the United States, or any of them, who may remove to such territory after it becomes attached to the United States, are not entitled, is not only repugnant to every principle and feeling of American liberty and equality, but is in the very teeth and jaws of the constitution. I can readily imagine, Mr. President, why this new-born zeal in favor of the rights of the people of a territory to exclude slaves as property, is exhibited with so much fierceness and pertinacity at this particular juncture in our history. Every body knows that territory is about to be acquired from Mexico, where, it is said, slavery does not exist. But is that territory to be governed by Mexican law after it becomes the property of the United States, and passes under the jurisdiction of our laws? No one in his senses can contend for this. When it becomes American territory, it will be governed by American laws, and American citizens must be entitled to the enjoyment of equal rights upon it, else liberty and equality under our system are but phantoms; and the guaranties of the constitution vain, deceptive, illusions. I shall not stop to inquire whether slavery is a blessing or a curse. It is nominated in the bond. The constitution guaranties it to those who think proper to hold it; and while the constitution exists, they cannot be depraved of it, without doing violence to that instrument. If the constitution be defective in this respect, or any other, let it be amended in the manner provided for by its illustrious framers. But to violate is not to amend—to destroy is not to reform.

I will not trespass further upon the indulgence of the Senate at present. I consider these resolutions as involving considerations of vast importance. I have thought it proper to call the attention of the Senate to them, and all I ask is, that they be postponed until Monday week, and made the special order of the day. Then, if no other Senator desires to discuss them, I shall respectfully ask for a deliberate vote of the Senate upon them.

On motion by Mr. BAGBY, it was Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed to, and made the order of the day for, Monday the 24th inst.

THE FRANKING PRIVILEGE.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to declase the true intent and meaning of the act relating to the franking privilege of members of Congress.

Mr. BADGER observed that as the bill was not in possession of the Senate at the moment, he would move that it be passed over informally; which was, by unanimous consent, agreed to.

CALIFORNIA CLAIMS.

The Senate resumed the consideration, as in Committee of the Whole, of the bill for ascertaining and paying the California claims.

Mr. DAYTON.—It is no part of my purpose to discuss the bill that is before the Senate; but, connecting itself as it does, with the general subject of the war, I purpose availing myself of the opportunity which this bill affords of submitting some general observations on other points. I know full well the disadvantages under which the speaker labors in endeavoring to address the Senate upon the general question under existing circumstances. The remarks that may be made must fall cold on the ear of the Senate, but circumstances of a personal nature make it absolutely essential, if I say aught on this question, that I avail myself of the opportunity of saying it now.

Amid the strife and noise of a conflict, it is, at all times, difficult for parties to realize their true position. Fortunately for us the tumult of the contest has, for the present, ceased. The smoke has cleared away; between the armies of Mexico and the United States an armistice exists. For the first time, since the commencement of the war, we have reached a point from which we may calmly survey the past and profitably consider of the future. It is due to us—it is due to the country that we do so. In May, 1846, war was declared to exist by the act of Mexico. I need not say, sir, that that declaration was wrung—literally wrung under pressure, from this side of the chamber. I then thought, and I now think, that the alternative forced upon us of refusing supplies, or admitting, by way of preamble, the truth of a declaration which we believed to be false, was the exertion of at least an extreme right by a party majority. But right or wrong we met the occasion, and supplies in men and money were granted on demand. We protested then, and since we have repeatedly renewed our protest against the origin of the war, while we have furnished means for its prosecution. This has been charged upon us as a species of moral obliquity—a kind of Jesuitical prudence, justified by no sound principle of reason or of morals. I have ever held otherwise; when war becomes the law of the land, and so exists upon your statute book, it is the duty of every good citizen to sustain and uphold it, till the law be repealed, or what is tantamount, peace be declared. Such have been the principles of action in other countries as well as in this. I will not speak of the British supply bill; but I may refer to the action of the great federal party in the war of 1812. Deprecating the commencement of the war as they did, a major part of the measures for its prosecution were passed without division and by the assent of the party. So, too, in the quasi war with France in 1797–'98, brought about against the wishes of the republican party of that day. Mr. Jefferson, as the great exponent of the principles of that party, declared, in a letter written by him, that we must avoid the war if we can, but if it came we must defend ourselves and stand by the country—whether the house be fired from without or from within it was equally our duty to extinguish the flame. This has, indeed, been a principle of action recognized by all parties in this government. It is no new doctrine incorporated into our political creed. It is no Jesuitical pretence, no moral obliquity. It is a principle of patriotic action recognized by all statesmen—all patriots, and in all times.

Well, in these circumstances, the whig party felt it to be its duty to strengthen the arm of the government—to strike, while at the same time it deprecated the consequences of the blow. Now, we have reached a point in the history of this war when the right of private judgment can again vindicate itself. We have before us an enemy, prostrate, wounded, dying; upon his body stands a Colossus, in full armor, unharmed by the contest! I ask, again, have we not now attained a point where we may exercise the right of self-judgment? A point, at which we may say to the strong, cease to war upon the weak? In my opinion we have; and stopping here, what a glorious result is before us? In a military point of view, a foreign war, conducted without a single reverse; in a civil point of view, a peace without a dollar, and without an acre wrested from the enemy without a just equivalent. Well may be it said that a peace made upon the terms offered and accepted, amounts about to this: "indemity for the past," is the hundred millions you have paid; and "security for the future," is the twenty millions you are to pay! The very result which might have been anticipated in the prosecution of such a war. We have now reached a stepping place; some of us have thought it advisable to seize upon the late treaty as the most immediate, most plausible plan of getting rid of the loan; friends have differed among themselves as to our true course of action. I should myself have been willing—I should have preferred that political friends had permitted this matter to rest upon their votes; or, that at all events, that they should have been satisfied to await the removal of the injunction of secrecy, before they published to the world the considerations which had influenced their action in secret session. But the Senator from Massachusetts, not now in his seat, [Mr. WEBSTER,] whose absence I regret, and in the mournful cause of whose absence we all sympathize, has thought it needful to promulgate to his and my constituents the reasons which have influenced him in voting, as he says, against the ratification of the treaty. He "holds," he says, "the conscience of but one man," and he "means to make a clean breast of it." Sir, he is in the exercise of his legal and just rights. But, in "making a clean breast of it," in removing the burden from his own conscience, he has unconsciously and unintentionally, I doubt not, imposed the same burden, with the added weight of his own opinions and arguments, upon the consciences and breasts of other men. It will be for us to say whether we are able to meet the responsibility which is thus invoked before our constituents.

The members of the Senate, at least, however it may be with the public, after what has passed in Executive session, will not feel surprised that I should assume to answer some of the suggestions of that distinguished Senator. His speech was not the beginning, but rather the end of controversy. I would that it had ended where it began. I have no wish to obtain the little ephemeral reputation, which comes from "much talking," or a collision with distinguished antagonists, but whenever an opportunity presents itself, pregnant with great events to the country, I never have, and I never shall shrink from my just responsibilities. I am, for one, prepared to meet the responsibility involved in the ratification of that treaty; and after the speech of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, read as it has been in every town, village, and hamlet of my State, I feel as others similarly circumstanced must feel, the necessity of a reply. I am here to answer; I here now declare to my constituents, as I understand I have a right to declare to my constituents, and to the world, my own action upon that subject. I here declare then, that in this chamber, and out of it, in official debate, and by private appeal, in every mode, and by every legitimate measure that I could bring to bear, I endeavored to sustain and enforce the ratification of the treaty. And I say furthermore, if it be of the slightest interest to my constituents to know it, that while its fate was yet in doubt, I first broke ground in its favor on this side of the chamber. For all which I am ready to meet the responsibility which that position demands.

Now, sir, what are the objections which have been urged against the ratification of this treaty? We are first told—and it is the first general objection—that "we have snatched up a paper, called or miscalled, a treaty—negotiated without authority, and then have ratified it"—that reversing the natural order of things, after ratifying the treaty, we have then appointed ministers plenipotentiary to negotiate upon the subject. Now, pray, what is this "bit of paper," which we have "snatched up" in the lineal sense of the Senator from Massachusetts? It is a paper sent to this body by the President of the United States—sent here as a treaty for ratification—sent here legitimately by him as he might send it here. No man can controvert the right of the President to do that; and no man pretends to deny that he may accredit his diplomatic agent in advance to do a particular thing; or he may await the action of that agent, and ratify that act after it has been done. The common principles applicable to the case of an agency constituted in advance, or by assumption of the acts of the agent afterwards apply here. No man pretends to doubt, then, that the President of the United States had the legal, the constitutional, the rightful power to take this paper, whether negotiated without or with authority, and send it to us for ratification. If that be so, the objection then comes down simply to this, in the language of the Senator, "it is unusual—it is strange." That amounts to but little, and that little when examined grows still less. I admit frankly, that the diplomatic history of this country, and perhaps that of no other can furnish a parallel to this negotiation! I admit that no former administration ever thought of sending such a man on such an errand! But with great respect, I deny that it is an unusual thing for a negotiator to negotiate without authority, or, perhaps, even against authority. Your diplomatic history, and that of every other nation in the world, is full of instances in which the negotiator, from the necessity of the case, assumed for the time being an authority not delegated, and trusted to the recognition of the government afterwards.

But the Senator says that this proceeding is "strange"—that it is "unusual"—that it is "without parallel." In answer, I beg to call upon him or upon any other to show the parallel to such an objection. When have we ever before heard of an objection of this character? The Executive department in the interim between two Congresses constitutes a diplomatic agent as he lawfully may, and sends in as the result of the negotiation of that agent, a treaty for our ratification. Can we go behind the record, and instead of looking at the treaty, make a point as to the authority of the negotiator? I say that the history of this government or that of any other does not furnish an objection of such a character. The constitution prescribes when and how you are at liberty in connection with the Executive to look into the character and appoint your negotiator. But after the President exercises his lawful right in the interim of Congress, you cannot examine the character of the negotiator. You have no right to raise the objection that the negotiation was without authority if it has been sanctioned by the Executive. If you had such a right, you might over-ride the constitutional authority of the President which allows him to appoint a negotiator without your authority in the interim of Congress. When gentlemen then call on us for a parallel of this procedure, we retort and call upon them for a parallel to this objection.

But, again, it is said, that "we have reversed the general order of things"—that our proceeding is "grotesque"—we have in the first place ratified a treaty and then appointed a minister plenipotentiary to negotiate it. I think that is not the true state of the facts. This treaty was negotiated by Mr. Trist. It was sent here for ratification. It was amended. In the meantime the powers of Mr. Trist are gone. We have no accredited agents in Mexico, and after the treaty was ratified by us and about to be returned to that country for the action of its government, we send with it, as we must do, an accredited agent. Is there anything in this at all "grotesque" or "unusual?"

Now, these were the preliminary objections; they affect only the form of our procedure. They touch not the substance—the reason of the thing. The question is in regard to the treaty itself and not in regard to the character of those who negotiated it, or the form in which, under that negotiation, it was presented to us. I now propose to consider the treaty itself. I frankly admit that it is bad enough. I admit that it was no choice of mine. I admit that it was the selection of an alternative—one evil in preference only to a greater evil. We have been told here, that if we did not distrust ourselves and our power, we might meet the difficulty—that one third of the Senate can defeat the treaty now and through all time. I grant it. But, I say, that if that third consists of those gentlemen who have denounced the war from the beginning as unjust and iniquitous—and if they, under those circumstances, were to defeat such a treaty and continue such a war, they ought to feel a sense of their course as though it were written down for them by the light of a sunbeam. We have been forced from the beginning to deal with alternatives. In the beginning of the war we granted supplies, although driven to the alternative of admitting under protest, that that war commenced by the act of Mexico. In the prosecution of the war we have continued those supplies rather than see our armies defeated; and now, at the end of the war, we are willing to vote for a peace with some territory, rather than to take the chance of a continuance of the war and more territory at its close. It has been with us a choice of alternatives from first to last. I will not defend this treaty as a mere matter of bargain. I care not whether the Senator from Massachusetts be right or wrong in the view which he has taken of this as a matter of bargain. I care not whether New Mexico be near to us or far from us; I care not how isolated may be its position; I care not, though her plains be barren, though her hills be desolate. I care not whether "grass grows or water runs"—whether there be "beasts of the field, or fowls of the air, or any creeping thing"—not any or all of these considerations have controlled my action on this subject. In some respects, indeed, I do not know but fewer evils will grow out of this accession of territory if it be the miserable and worthless thing, which the Senator has represented it, than if it were a good fertile country, inviting speedy settlement. But we do at least get something by the treaty. The administration gets San Francisco and San Diego. They are at least of some value. The administration surely has "the fifteen pence in pocket," and for taking this little value they are entitled to the benefit of Falstaff's apology—"Reason, you rogue, reason! Think'st thou, I'd endanger my soul gratis!" But as a mere matter of bargain—something had for something paid—I care not, though the thing be as miserable and contemptible as the Senator describes it. The value of the country never seriously entered into my consideration, as an element in the decision of this question.

But, then, the Senator asks—why not strike out this territory, and take peace without it?" "The things," says the Senator, "are separable." He avers that we can have a peace, just as promptly, just as easily, just as honorably, without territory as with it; and here, sir, is the basis, the groundwork of his whole argument. It is begging the entire question. His whole argument is thus based upon premises erroneous in part. His position is that peace can be obtained as speedily and as honorably without territory as with it. Let us examine it.

With this administration we can have no peace without territory. Again and again, for two years, the administration have declared their determination that territory must be acquired. Gentlemen who have opposed the war, have been calling for peace—peace—peace,—but there was no peace to be had without territory. In the official declarations of the President—in the declarations of heads of departments—in the declarations of the friends of the administration in both branches of Congress, it has been announced to us, to Mexico, and to the world, that they would not even forego to us territory than is acquired by the treaty; and yet I repeat, that the whole of the Senator's argument is based upon the assumption that peace could be had as easily, as speedily, and as honorably without territory as with it! Indeed the President of the United States has gone so far as to recommend that a territorial government be established in the country, long since in our possession, and now ceded to us by that treaty. We have had, too, the official assurance, that if this treaty were rejected, no negotiation would be allowed, or even be attempted for less territory than we now obtain! And I may go farther while on this subject, and add, if there be aught in rumor, the leading members of this administration, and of the cabinet—presidential aspirants too, actually oppose the ratification of this treaty upon the ground that it gives too little territory. Now what becomes of the position that we can have peace as promptly without territory as with it? But, says the Senator from Massachusetts, "feel the enemy," and he may retire before you—"Mr. Polk put his foot down on 54° 40' and it didn't stay down." Sir, the cases differ—differ just as widely as the power of Mexico differs from that of Great Britain! Besides it is but just to the administration, to say that they never pledged themselves to hold on to 54° 40' with the tenacity with which they stand committed to hold on to New Mexico and California; although they did declare very vehemently the right to do so.

I repeat, then, that so far as we can judge from the facts before us, we can have no peace during this administration without territory. If we could, the past history of the administration would be a fable, and the event would give every official assurance the lie. For myself, I do not, I cannot believe it. I am thus compelled to act from the light before me.

"But," says the distinguished Senator, "if the administration do not choose to make peace without territory, I am willing to go before the country on that question; I am willing to put it to the people—' will you bring four States into this Union?'" Ask, sir, when will the Senator present the issue to the people? In a popular election next fall? Well, even if he should succeed upon that issue—which is more than doubtful—he must defer the accomplishment of his object till the following spring; in other words, for the purpose of testing his experiment before the people, this war must continue for another year, at the sacrifice of thousands of lives and a vast expenditure of treasure! But suppose, unfortunately, that the Senator should be mistaken, and that he and I should be disappointed on this issue, what then? The party coming into power, committed as they are on this subject, committed as they doubtless will be still further by resolutions at a certain convention to be held in May next; inflamed by success on this issue, what will be the result? Sir, it will be one of two things: Mexico to the Sierra Madre, or Mexico entire! The Senator says "we tremble before Executive influence—we fear lest the King's anger may kindle;" and "who," he asks, "is Mr. Polk?" Ah! we asked that very question a little more than three years ago—we asked it in verse I believe, and we got an answer in prose! We obtained an answer that satisfied me, at all events, that let Mr. Polk be who he might, or any other candidate be who he may, provided he be a "respectable" man, he was certain of the support and votes of his party. It matters not what star may set or rise, whether it be one of a magnitude that shall fill the naked eye, or some obscure twinkler seen only by the aid of a telescope, as soon as he is selected he will become a fixed star, the sun of a system, and around him will revolve every satellite of power and of party. It is idle to address to me any such question as this—"who is Mr. Polk?" He is, as his successor will be, the mere impersonation of a set of principles—the official head of a great party. This is a subject in which that great party, and every leading man of that party, is committed; they have plighted hand and heart to the cause; they will sustain it, or fall by it.

Now, what are those prospects of success, by which the Senator is emboldened to present this issue to the people? And, addressing myself again, not only to whig friends here, but throughout the country, if I utter unpleasant truths it is not because I do not feel them to be unpleasant. It is needless to look at things as we would like them to be. In questions of this nature we must look at things as they are. The issue which we would thus present for the determination of the people is this: will you, at the end of the year, at once withdraw your troops without territory? Will you back right out of Mexico? That is the point. There are a great many good and wise men who would at once beg pardon of Mexico, asking forgiveness of God, and bring the army home. But how small their number, compared with the great aggregate of the people! They will scarcely be heard of at the ballot boxes. The Senator from Massachusetts tells us that the vote of the House declaring that this war was "unconstitutionally and unnecessarily commenced" by the administration, is the last public annunciation of popular sentiment upon this subject. Grant it. That declaration passed by a vote of eighty-two to eighty-one. Now, let me try the position of the Senator by the same standard. On the same day on which that vote was given, a resolution was introduced in the House instructing the Military Committee to inquire—mark, a mere resolution of inquiry, which ordinarily passes as a matter of course—to inquire as to the expediency of advising the President to withdraw our forces to the eastern side of the Rio Grande, and negotiate for peace. The question was put to the same House to whose action the Senator triumphantly alludes, and the resolution was voted down by one hundred and thirty-five to forty-one! Now, if the action of that body be taken as affording a significant expression of public sentiment in regard to the commencement of the war, its action must also be taken as affording a legitimate exposition of popular sentiment in regard to the mode in which we are to end this war.

But passing from that House to this chamber, let me inquire what extent of opposition there would have been to the ratification of this treaty if it had been confined to those who made "no territory," absolutely a sine qua non to a treaty of peace! It was a case when extremes met—in which the men of "no territory," and the men of "all territory" stood for the time being together. They were held together by external pressure only, and that pressure removed, they were wide as the poles asunder. I might refer to the feeling of the country. It is not an unusual thing, either in public or private life, for a man who has distrusted the justice of his quarrel in the beginning to be unwilling to yield till his foe be completely prostrated. Besides, it is to be recollected that it does not require a very heavy force to determine the vote of many of the States of this Union. There have voters enough now returned from Mexico to determine this question against us on such an issue. The whole aggregate majority of Mr. Polk in 1844 was only 38,801; and in 1836 the majority for Mr Van Buren was only 25,413. There are what voters enough returned from Mexico, or there will be next fall (to say nothing of their kinsmen, friends, and employees,) with every feeling enlisted in behalf of the war to sweep away these majorities twice told, and yet it is supposed we may go with safety into this campaign upon this issue! Sir, is it possible that any one can have forgotten the democratic slogan of 1844? "Oregon and Texas" was then the rallying cry, and it still rings in our ears. Is the scathing taunt of Napoleon to be applied to us? Are we Bourbon-like, "to forget nothing—to learn nothing?" Can we resist the conviction that what "Oregon and Texas" was in 1844, "California and New Mexico" will become in 1848? The hound has not just now opened on the scent; you do not just now hear his deep bay from afar. It is the short, quick, panting yell, ere he leaps upon his prey! And yet it is upon an issue like this, and in the face of a feeling like this that the Senator from Massachusetts advises the whig party to enter the campaign! No, sir; no, sir—It must not be! With every respect for that Senator I more than distrust the wisdom of such counsel. I appeal to the whigs—to political friends the whole country over, if it be wise, if it be statesmenlike to present that issue? The Senator from Massachusetts saw and he felt this thing. He says with truth that "the portents are discouraging." He admits that "the indications are all sinister," but he adds, that "whoever falters or whoever flies, he resists to-day, he resists always." Be it so. The Senator could not do otherwise than resist. He had in times past committed himself so far upon this question against territory that he was hardly at liberty to weigh alternatives. But is it so with us? Is the great whig party so fully, so fatally committed upon this question? Are we bound to stand fast upon

> —"This narrow ledge; a yawning
> Gulf below, a tumbling torrent from above;
> Can we not move?"

Are we spell bound? Forbid it God! Could I believe that the power to acquire territory was yet an open question, or that the constitution clearly forbade it, though the heavens darkened over my head, and the earth trembled beneath my feet, there should I stand!—stand with the Senator—stand with the constitution,

> "Shield it—save it, or perish there too"

But I deny that it is so. I feel that this is a question to be tried according to its effects and consequences, and by my best judgment, aided by the best light that I can obtain, I am persuaded that the alternative of the line offered with present peace is better than war for a year with the chance of peace at its close and no territory. This conviction I declare with the utmost respect for the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts and all others who may differ from me. I hold that upon the issue which they would make up—no peace unless without territory—the whig party cannot survive the year. It will go down to the grave, and all its conservative glorious principles will go down to the grave along with it! With some "wise saw" upon its lips, it will die, doubtless, "the death of the righteous," "rejoicing in the hope of a glorious resurrection!" Its enemies yonder will give it a kingly epitaph: Hic jacet!

> "It never said a foolish thing,
> And never did a wise one!"

I take no such issue! I seize upon the first and legitimate means to make peace. If I fail, let the misfortune rest where it may, it will not be here; and I then at least have the privilege of calling upon you, our political adversaries, for all the treasure that is wasted—for those twenty thousand of our young men whose bones are now bleaching in the mountain passes and on the arid plains of Mexico!

But my purpose, sir, was not to arraign others. My purpose is simply to justify ourselves. The Senator from Massachusetts in the further prosecution of his argument tells us, that this treaty gives us the line of the Rio Grande, New Mexico and California; and in view of this acquisition of territory the Senator goes into a statement showing the necessarily sparse character of the population, now and for a long time to come; and he then goes on to speak of the number of States that will be formed out of the territory and the Senators who will then take their places here. In other words, he tells us that fourteen new Senators will take their places here, and in the contemplation of that result, he becomes absolutely struck with horror. He denounces the whole thing as a "monstrosity"—a "disfiguration"—an "enormity" upon the fair framework of our government. He doubts if that, of which he speaks, be real—hesitates whether it be not some phantasm; some horrid delusion! Let us look at this thing calmly. In the first place, permit me to remind the country that the question now before us is not whether Texas should be admitted into the Union. Regard the event as you may, Texas is now here. The admission of Texas is now a foregone conclusion. The number of States that may be carved out of Texas, was settled in the annexation of that country. Arrange the boundaries of Texas as you may, it adds not to, or diminishes the number of Senators which she may at a future day place upon this floor. Let me remark, however, that the ten Senators from Texas, of which the Senator speaks, will not come here in your day, nor in your children's, nor your children's children's day. Be that as it may, the Senator relies upon these ten Senators from Texas in order to make out his position. Sir, he might, with the same propriety, have argued from the admission of Louisiana and Florida or any other territory acquired since the organization of our government. With Texas, then, we have nothing to do. You thus get rid at once of ten out of the fourteen Senators that have alarmed the judgment of the distinguished Senator. These "men in buckram" thus pass away. From fourteen they dwindle at one step down to four! Let us prosecute this matter a little farther. We will find that in reference even to the remaining four, they become "small by degrees and beautifully less." I do not mean to deny that there is a possibility, nay, probability, that at some future day New Mexico may be represented on this floor, and that at some distant day California may be also represented here; nor do I mean to say, that that would not be an evil. But the Senator regards these as pressing, immediate evils; and it is in that aspect that I resist his argument. According to his own description of New Mexico, it is a country perfectly barren and desolate—a miserable selvage of earth, pent up between two mountains—five hundred miles from any where, and twice as far from the next place! Then as to the population, it is a mongrel, pie-bald race, of every shade and hue from the white man down to the negro—very few of the former—a degraded race, and must continue to be degraded. The population cannot increase, because there are as many there now as the country can sustain. If that be so—and unless the Senator has colored or discolored the picture by his fancy—there will not be two Senators from that country in a hurry. Our southern friends are not likely to admit representatives of this pie-baid race with great haste at least on this floor. Besides, there is another difficulty in the way. The Rio Grande runs in the centre of the territory of New Mexico with its population of sixty or seventy thousand, and if Texas adhere to her claim after the treaty as it stood before the treaty, or if you admit the validity of her claims, at least one-half of the territory belongs to Texas, and you can have no new State created there without her assent. I repeat, sir, I am not disturbed by those fears which seem to agitate the Senator from Massachusetts, although I do not mean to deny all force to this objection.

But, then, he speaks of California, and states that there will be at least two new Senators from that quarter. Pray, when are those two Senators to come from California? He speaks of California as a state, and of New Mexico as a state. But they do not come here as states at all. They come here as territories—loose, unorganized territories. And when do you expect that California will be represented on this floor? The Senator speaks of California as a state! What! A state to be admitted into this Union, embracing ten degrees of latitude on the Pacific ocean, and extending from five hundred to one thousand miles into the interior! We can never have such a state admitted into this Union. Before that country can be represented here there must be a population of sufficient extent to authorize the creation of a state, and that, too, within territorial limits bearing some proportion to the extent of the largest states of this confederacy. We must recollect that California is not an agricultural country. It is a grazing country, where the wealth of the inhabitants consists in horses and cattle, and which must of necessity always be sparsely peopled. How long, then, will it be before there will be a population concentrated in a sufficiently small space in California to justify the admission of a state out of that territory? Neither 1850 nor 1860 will witness such a result. But, says the Senator, "these states will come in at a suitable time;" and that is the only limitation which he imposes. These terms, I grant, mean pretty much what the party in power pleases to say what they do mean.—But in the case of Louisiana, which under treaty stipulations was to be admitted as a State as soon as possible, according to the principles of the federal constitution; and the inhabitants—certainly of a much better class than can be supposed to exist in New Mexico and California, and of greater numbers—demanded admittance at once. They claimed the right to admission as a treaty right; these words, a "suitable time" were intended to invest in Congress a clear discretion over the subject.—But looking at the possible changes which may occur in this body between this period and 1850, it is scarcely within the range of probability that our friends over the way will, at that early day, need two additional Senators from New Mexico and California. I know that these remarks do not sound agreeably in the ear of political friends; but they are, nevertheless, true; and it is folly to shut eyes or ears to the truth.

I pass to another aspect of this question. There was one consideration which very much commended the line of this treaty to my favorable regard. It avoids practically all that wretched question of the "Wilmot Proviso;" and I think that the sober, thoughtful men of the North will, on reflection, view the question in that light. This line of thirty-two degrees, gives us a country, which, I apprehend, can never become permanently a slave country. It grows no cotton, sugar, rice, or tobacco. It is not at all adapted to slave labor. On the contrary, some of our southern friends actually object to the line on the ground that at some future day, it may be the means of surrounding the South with a tier of free States. In connection, then, with this exciting and unhappy question, this view of the treaty is vastly important.—Slavery—speaking with the utmost respect for the feelings and judgment of others—I now hold, as I have ever held, to be a positive institution. It can exist nowhere except by force of positive law. There is no slavery now in this territory which is acquired by the treaty. If a citizen of the South go there with his slave, and that slave escapes and one of his neighbors employ him, the master cannot recover, in a court of justice, either the slave or the value of his labor. If he avers that the slave is his property, he must show that he is so. That can be shown only by municipal law; and I need not say that when called on to show that, the master cannot produce the statute-book of South Carolina. No man carries with him the law of the State from which he emigrates. In all such States there is no code penal and criminal applicable to the slave. If a slave strike his master—if another harbor a slave—there is a penalty imposed. The slave is debarred from the witness stand. Well, when the master carries his slave to California, none of these municipal regulations accompany him. A man stands there as a man, whether he be black or white. The argument then comes simply to this: the country acquired by the treaty is now free; and notwithstanding the argument of my friend from Alabama, [Mr. BAGBY,] I hold that there is no principle better settled than that the laws of the country which we acquire, remain as they were until they are changed by some positive enactment. Now the only remaining question is, can that country ever become permanently a slave country? I hold that it cannot. Thus, then, the adoption of this line practically avoids this great evil. I am opposed to all extension of slavery. I am opposed to the extension of this principle of representation. But while entertaining these sentiments, I am not such a fanatic, and set the world on fire on account of an abstraction—a mere theory, unattended by practical results. Representing a constituency with nothing at all akin to political abolition about them, I rejoice in the termination of this war in a manner which avoids altogether this distracting and dangerous question.

I have expressed my views at some length on a former occasion, upon the constitutional question as to the right of Congress to limit slavery in the territories. While disclaiming all identification with northern abolitionists of any kind or creed, I will sustain the right—the law. Liberal men of the North suffer constantly from being placed in a false position, and ranked side by side with those with whom they have not a single feeling in common. If the South would but understand the feeling of right minded men at the North, it would be seen that there is no substantial difference of opinion between them. Right-minded men on this, as on all other subjects, generally stand together. But in reference to the power to impose this limitation, there is a difference of opinion. I find that in the last October number of the "Southern Review,"—a review which I take this occasion to say, is alike distinguished by its literary excellence, and general ability—my views on this subject are characterized as "ultra latitudinarian." In that article, I find the first labored attempt to sustain this position, that Congress has not power to legislate upon this subject. The reviewer collects all the facts and all the arguments bearing on this subject; and I assure gentlemen that the article furnishes the staple for many a speech, both in Congress and out of it. But it wholly fails to shake my confidence in the soundness of my own views. If Congress has not the power to legislate upon this subject, then the power to do so exists nowhere; and we have then the spectacle presented of a political community, large in number, vast in territorial extent, incapable of legislating upon a subject, which is not only so essential, or will be so essential to their prosperity, but it may be to their absolute safety! Before we arrive at such a conclusion, the argument to sustain it, ought certainly to be unanswerable. Either the power to legislate on this subject exists in Congress, or the whole history of the legislation of the country from the very beginning, has been an assumption. From the beginning, Congress has acted on the principle of possessing this power. After a certain number of inhabitants have been collected in a territory—3,000—then there has been vested in a governor, legislative council, and house of representatives, the authority to make "all laws for the good of the district." This power is thus strictly delegated by Congress, to the territorial legislature, acting with the assent of the governor, the federal appointee, without whose signature no law can be valid. It has indeed been suggested, and I think that the honorable Senator from Michigan squints that way——

Mr. CASS.—(in his seat.) Not squints at it.

Mr. DAYTON.—The honorable Senator hints at it, that this power exists in the people of the territory in their primitive unorganized condition. Now, there is no organization of the people of the territory, except through their legislature, acting under the authority of Congress, and this power the appointee of the Executive. They can have no other mode of exercising any power vested in them. Are they, for the purpose of carrying into execution their own power, to get up some new mode of legislation—to create a kind of imperium in imperio? It strikes me that the position is eminently absurd.

But, says the gentleman, Congress takes these lands merely to dispose of them as a trustee; and whenever you construe constitutional law, you must construe it in reference to the object for which the trust was created. How are these territories to be governed in the meantime? How are they to pass through the period of their territorial condition? It is seriously contended that the constitution which gives power to dispose of the territories, and in the language of the constitution, "to make all needful rules and regulations" respecting the territory, is to be confined simply to the enactment of such laws as regulate the disposition of the territories; and yet, under that clause of the constitution, the whole civil and the whole criminal jurisdiction of Congress, by right of dominion, and of the territorial legislatures from the year 1787, down to the present day, has been inactive! I have always contended, as I now contend, that this power vests in the federal government—first, by reason of its general legislative supremacy; and secondly, by express grant; the grant being in the provision of the constitution, which authorizes Congress to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territories. Sixty years practice under that provision of the constitution has settled, or ought to have settled, its true construction.

If there be any doubt raised in regard to the lands ceded by slave States, we may answer that many of these cessions have been made by free States. New York made the very first cession in 1781. At the time she made that cession, that State could legislate upon the subject of slavery; she conceded all her powers to Congress—no residuum remained; and yet it happens in the act of transfer from one receiver to another, one of those powers has departed—has been lost by some unknown process in political alchymy—it has vanished like a volatile essence, not even emitting an odor to tell of its whereabouts! The federal legislature took just what New York granted; and yet we hear it asserted that Congress has no power to legislate on this subject—that its power is limited to the disposition of these territories! Why, sir, when propositions of this kind are gravely presented for the purpose of sustaining such a position, no mortal man can tell what next may be assumed.

In 1787, I need not remind the Senate, the ordinance relating to the north-west territory was passed, excluding slavery from the territory north of the Ohio. Each and every of the States which have come into the Union, formed out of that territory, come in subject to this restriction. In 1798, the territory of Mississippi was organized, and Congress prohibited the introduction of slaves there from any port out of the United States. In 1804, two territories were formed out of Louisiana, and there again Congress restricted slavery in advance, and in diverse ways; among others, prohibiting slaves from being carried into the territory, unless by their owners, who shall be citizens of the United States; and unless taken there with a view to actual settlement. All the vast territory of Louisiana was settled under these restrictions.—In 1820, it was again declared by Congress, on the settlement of the Missouri question, that slavery should not exist in that State north of thirty-six degrees, thirty minutes north latitude. Congress has again and recently exercised the same power as to the settlement of slaves in Oregon. Are these repeated precedents, coeval almost with the commencement of our government, and coming down to the present, to go for nothing? It does seem to me—I say it with great respect—that if there ever were any doubts on this question, as to the power of Congress to legislate with respect to slavery in the territories, those doubts must be held settled by the past conduct of the government. Thus much in vindication of past votes on this subject. But I will now say again that I trust and hope that as regards the territory north of thirty-two degrees, which we may acquire from Mexico by virtue of this treaty, this question may be at rest. I hold it to be an act of wisdom, as well as of patriotism, to agitate it only when its agitation becomes matter of necessity, and with a view to practical results. But let the north bear it in mind—let it never be forgotten, that if the question be not settled now, the line will probably be pushed, in future, further south; it will go so far south as to incorporate territory which will clearly be slave territory—territory where slaves may be employed, not in agricultural pursuits, only, but in the productions of the precious metals—the worst, the most fatal of all species of production that can curse the industry, or blight the prosperity of nations.

I have said here, as I said in this chamber in secret session, that the true question—the practical question before us, and the country, was, not whether we would take this territory or no territory, but whether we would take this territory or more territory. This, it seems to me, is the real practical question which presents itself to our consideration. In taking this position I was actuated by no fear of Executive power; no fear of Mr. Polk, as the honorable Senator would seem to intimate; the position was taken upon a calm and careful examination of the state of things by which we were surrounded, and reflection upon what would be the state of things at the end of another campaign; after more treasure had been wasted, more lives expended; after Mexico should have been more effectually and fully broken to pieces on our hands, in a state of utter disorganization. The honorable Senator from Massachusetts even seemed to admit, by inference at least, that it would be well for us to stop here if we could, but, says he, "is there any one weak enough to suppose that possible?" Do they not even now speak of taking possession of Senhora and of Tamaulipas, and of other of the States of Northern Mexico? Sir, I am not to be deterred by the form of this question of the distinguished Senator from giving it an answer. As to this lust of dominion of which he speaks, whether it may stop where it is, or whether "manifest destiny," or something else shall give it a fresh start, neither the Senator nor I can tell. God only knows, and to us at least the future alone will determine; but one thing is certain, that there is less hazard from such a contingency than there is if we permit this lust of dominion to continue its course, unchecked and uncontrolled, now. But, says the Senator, the country obtained is not worth a dollar. Be it so, for the sake of the argument. He knows and I know, that its possession will involve the country in vast expenditures for its territorial government, for its protection from the incursions of Indians, for the establishment of distant military posts. Is not this likely at least to sate the appetite for dominion? But, no, says the Senator; as well might you suppose that "a rapacious animal that had made one unsuccessful foray will not strive for a better." Sir, I always mistrust an argument that comes simply in the form of a metaphor, and I am struck with the fact, that whenever and wherever I have made this suggestion, the Senator, contrary to his wont, has always answered in metaphor. If I have said, take the line that is offered lest worse come hereafter, the answer has been, no, it is of no use, "the appetite grows by what it feeds on;"—it is of no use, "the force of a projectile is but increased by every new application of power;"—it is of no use, 'an animal which has made one unsuccessful foray will strive for a better;"—all metaphor, metaphor! and the Senator's argument carried out in metaphor, amouts to this—a rapacious animal roused to madness, thirsting for blood, is not to be quieted for a time, lest it may gather its strength for another bound. Sir, I hold to nothing of the kind; this lust of dominion may return again—of that the future only can tell—but is it not something—is it not much that for the present we stop it here and now?

But it is said that this treaty may not be ratified. But I believe it will be, but grant that it is not. Are we worse off? Do we not stand rather better in the eyes of humanity, in the eyes of the world? We manifest some readiness for peace; we leave Mexico her nationality; we pay her the full value of at least every thing we take from her? But what to me is more than this, if we succeed in the hoped for result, we end the war—we fix a line which will subject us to fewer evils than any which is likely to be forced upon us by political adversaries hereafter.

These are the views, in brief, which have controlled my conduct upon this question. I have some confidence—an abiding hope, at least, that we have seen the end of this wretched war. I trust that the flag of my country will never again be red with Mexican blood. The gallantry of our troops has carried it through smoke and fire from the coast to the capital—from the waters of the gulf to the very Halls of the Aztec. There, there let it rest; may its every fold fall peacefully around the flag-staff—may not a breath of human passion ever again open one on a Mexican battle field.—I know not how recent events in the European world may have affected the minds of other men, but for myself, I feel that in this strange juncture in the world's progress, America, the great moving cause and example, should be at rest. In peace, there is at this moment to us a peculiar, a moral fitness. If one half that we bear be true, an intense interest must soon attach itself to us, and to our institutions. We are soon to become the cynosure of all eyes—the "observed of all observers," among nations. Consider well, I pray you, the spectacle that we now present, as the great model republic, preying upon, grinding to powder, our weak, helpless, and only almost sister republic. But, sir, it is not only fit in a moral point of view, that we should be at peace, but providential considerations counsel us to the same course. The atmosphere of the old world is portentous of change; her air is thick and murky; the clouds are lurid; nations, like men, are literally holding their breath in momentary expectancy of the burst which may follow, and I tell you, sir, that you have not yet seen even the beginning of the end! I tell you that nations and kingdoms, which are the growth of ages, do not go out without a struggle, nor in a day; I tell you that large classes of men concentrating vast wealth, born to power and dominion, do not abandon their supposed destiny as a thing of yesterday. What, though, a king may be stricken down! What, though, the sons of a king may fall away, like leaves from the oak that is blasted; the great problem yet remains, can 30,000,000 of mercurial Frenchmen, of whom about six or seven millions only can read and write, with no knowledge of free institutions, no experience in the elective franchise, can they be made in a day, an hour, the safe depository of sovereign power? Sir, I distrust the future; it rises before my mind's eye black with anarchy, red with blood. Even although the nations of Europe stand aloof, yet the excited materiel of France herself may burst into flame, though chafed by nothing, save the friction of its own parts. Should this be so, the old world will spring to its arms in a day! In the dreadful struggle which must follow, it becomes this republic to stand "at guard." Let her gather in her resources; let her husband her strength; let her stand calm, fixed, unmoved, as the main land, when the distant swell rolls in upon it!

Mr. MASON took the floor, with a view of addressing the Senate, but the usual hour of adjournment having arrived,

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 12, 1848.

PETITIONS.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, presented the memorial of Sampson and Tappan, and others, merchants and importers of the city of Boston, praying the reimbursement of certain duties paid by them, and that hereafter duties shall be assessed on merchandize according to the actual quantity received, without regard to the quantity stated in the invoice.

Mr. DAVIS remarked that these memorialists represent that the tariff of 1846 contains provisions which compel them to have the duty assessed on the invoice value; that on many articles, such as liquors, sugars, oils, &c., there is great wastage, either from leakage or evaporation, and the articles, on being landed, fall short in gauge, weight, or measure from the quantity represented by the invoice to have been shipped at the place of exportation, and thus the importers have been obliged to pay duty on the full quantity. They ask that the clause may be so amended that some allowance shall be made, in estimating duties, for any deficiency from the invoice. Although he did not regard it as a very grave or great matter, still he might be pardoned for calling the attention of the Committee on Finance to the subject, and asking that committee to take it into consideration and make an early report.

The memorial was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CAMERON submitted documents relating to the claim of William Parkeson, a soldier in the last war with Great Britain, to a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WESTCOTT, by unanimous consent, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill respecting certain surveys in the State of Florida; which was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

THE PUBLIC PRINTING.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution submitted by Mr. BADGER, on the 10th inst., and it was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing the joint resolution approved third day of August, 1846, entitled a "Joint Resolution directing the manner of procuring the printing for the two Houses of Congress."

THE SUPREME COURT.

Mr. MANGUM moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the motion made by Mr. FOOTE, on the 10th inst., to reconsider the vote, on passing to a third reading the bill supplemental to the act entitled "an act concerning the Supreme Court of the United States, approved June 17, 1844."

Mr. ASHLEY called for the yeas and nays on the motion, which were ordered; and, the question having been taken, it resulted as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atchison, Bell, Berrien, Breese, Butler, Clarke, Crittenden, Davis, of Massachusetts, Downs, Greene, Hannegan, Mangum, Mason, Miller, Niles, Pearce, Phelps, Rusk, Upham—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Ashley, Badger, Bagby, Benton, Bright, Calhoun, Cameron, Davis, of Mississippi, Dickinson, Dix, Felch, Hale, Johnson, of Georgia, Lewis, Sprunce, Turney, Westcott.—17.

The question recurring on the motion to reconsider—

Mr. ASHLEY observed that the vote which had just been given was the same as that on refusing to engross the bill; in the former case the vote stood yeas 17, nays 19. It was evident, therefore, that the Senate was not more full than when that vote was taken.

Mr. MANGUM thought the Senate was now as full as it was likely to be, and he therefore moved to proceed to vote on the question of reconsideration.

Mr. TURNEY demanded the yeas and nays on the question, which were ordered; and, being taken, resulted as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atchison, Bell, Berrien, Breese, Butler, Cameron, Clarke, Corwin, Crittenden, Davis, of Massachusetts, Downs, Greene, Hannegan, Hunter, Mangum, Mason, Miller, Niles, Pearce, Phelps, Rusk, Upham.—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Ashley, Badger, Bagby, Benton, Bright, Calhoun, Davis, of Mississippi, Dickinson, Dix, Felch, Hale, Johnson, of Georgia, Lewis, Sprunce, Turney, Westcott.—16.

The question then recurring—"Shall this bill pass to a third reading?"—

Mr. MANGUM observed that he did not care to press the vote at this time, and if the Senator from Arkansas would intimate any early day for its consideration he would be satisfied.

Mr. ASHLEY named Monday next.

The further consideration of the question was then postponed to, and made the order of the day for, Monday the 17th inst.

THE FRANKING PRIVILEGE.

On motion by Mr. BADGER, the prior orders were suspended and the Senate resumed the consideration, as in Committee of the Whole, of the bill to declare the true intent and meaning, so far as respects the franking privilege of members of Congress, of the act approved the 1st of March 1840, and entitled "An act to amend the act entitled 'an act to reduce the rates of postage, to limit the use and correct the abuse of the franking privilege, and for the prevention of frauds on the Post-office Department,' passed 3d March 1845, 'and for other purposes.'"

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives therein.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to repeal the act of 20th March, 1837, entitled "An act concerning Pilots;" and

On motion by Mr. DIX, the further consideration thereof was postponed until to-morrow.

CALIFORNIA CLAIMS.

The Senate resumed the consideration, as in Committee of the Whole, of the bill for ascertaining and paying the California Claims.

Mr. MASON.—The bill which is under consideration, although it has the very unassuming title of "a bill for ascertaining and paying the California claims," will, I think, be found, on examination, to present matter of very deep interest to the character of our republic, to the history which is to be written hereafter of the existing war with Mexico. It is my purpose, Mr. President, to confine the remarks which I offer to the Senate strictly to this bill, and to the matters necessarily connected with it, as they have been developed in the report of the Committee on Military Affairs which accompanies the bill.

Sir, we have been told by the public press, and somewhat taunted by the press on the other side of the Atlantic, with the charge that the United States of America exhibited to the world the spectacle of a republic waging a war against a sister republic, a war waged on her part as a war of aggression, waged in the lust of dominion for the purpose of conquest, and for the increase of her territory. The same language, I am sorry to say, has been held on the floors of legislation; and if it were true it would form a dark page, and I humbly hope the only dark page so far in the unwritten history of our country. Sir, in relation to this war with Mexico, when the passions of the day have subsided, when reason and intellect shall take a fair and unbiassed survey of it, of the causes that brought it on, and of its conduct on our part, I am satisfied that the character of the country will stand redeemed in the eyes of posterity.

Mr. President, an honorable Senator who sits on the opposite side of the chamber has declared that the war, so much condemned by his political associates as a war of aggression, was, in fact and in truth, a just, a necessary, and an honorable war. I mean the honorable Senator from Maryland—a tribute which the Senator has beautifully paid to the position of an independent statesman, illustrating, as he has done, how difficult a task it is, on some occasions, to bring the broad duty of the patriot within the narrow limits of party obligations. Sir, Mexico began the war. This stands recorded as a fact on your statute book. And although gentlemen may say that the vote they gave, was given under protest, the fact is nevertheless recorded as that which will present the material for history. If I am capable of arriving at truth in a matter passing before my own eyes and under my own observation, I, for one, could not hesitate to declare to the American people and to the world, not only that the war was a just and necessary war, but that it could not have been avoided without dishonor. It was commenced by Mexico in the invasion of one of the States of this confederacy, an invasion by the hostile forces of that country, made under the authorized declaration of the commander of its army, and of the chief executive officer of the government, that they had sufficient cause of war; that cause being the fact, that by an act of the American Congress we had entered into a compact with a sovereign and independent republic, which resulted in a change of the government of that republic—I mean the republic of Texas. I do not desire to go at all into the details connected with the general history of the Mexican war, but I will say this, and might appeal to the world for its proof, that just and unavoidable in its inception the whole conduct and management of the war has spread around our country and its institutions honor in everything; not only in the unparalleled victories obtained by our arms, but in the dignity and the forbearance uniformly shown by this republic to deluded, infatuated Mexico. Every occasion was embraced to hold out to Mexico the right hand of fellowship. Concessions were made which, if to a country really formidable for her military power, might well have subjected our government to the charge of pusillanimity—concessions which she could afford to make, because conscious of her honor, strength, and of the justice of the war, and conscious that Mexico was too weak to admit of such concession being misconstrued.

These California claims, Mr. President, become interesting, in my apprehension, not only because of the circumstances out of which they arose, which were strikingly exhibited on Monday last before the Senate by an honorable Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON,] but because of the fact appearing from the report of the Committee on Military Affairs, that they involve expenditures unauthorized by law, expenditures for military operations, which were conducted without the authority of this government. It becomes important then to the character of our country that these claims which we propose by this bill to recognize and pay, should be properly and distinctly understood, and their proper place assigned them in the legislative history of this country. If this be not done, future history may refer to them also in evidence of the general charge, that the war originating in a spirit of rapine and conquest, an insurrection was covertly fomented in the remote province of California, as part of the general scheme of extended dominion. The report from the Committee on Military Affairs has made a very full exposition of this matter. The payment of these claims has been recommended to Congress by the Secretary of War in his annual report communicated to us at this session, to which I shall have occasion to advert. But they are brought immediately under the consideration of the Senate in the very unassuming form of a private memorial asking for their payment. It is the memorial of Lt. Colonel Fremont, who, at the time these liabilities and obligations were contracted, was an officer in the military service of the United States. The character of these claims, or rather the character of the military operations out of which they have arisen, is very clearly and succinctly stated in that memorial. It is asserted by Col. Fremont,

"That, in June of the year 1846, being then a brevet captain of topographical engineers in the service of the United States, and employed as such in California, he engaged in military operations with the people of the country for the establishment of the independence of California, before the existence of war between the United States and Mexico was known, and with success—all in said undertaking, the independence of California being proclaimed at Sonoma on the 5th day of July, and the Mexican forces routed and dispersed. That, immediately on hearing of the war between the United States and Mexico, the flag of independence was pulled down, and that of the United States run up in its place, and under the flag military service was rendered to the United States until the conquest was complete, and supplies obtained from the people mostly on credit of certificates given for them. That after the conquest, a temporary government was formed; the expenses of which, like those incurred for military operations, are mostly yet unpaid, and should be paid by the United States, to whom all the benefits of the conquest of California has accrued."

Here, sir, we find the fact distinctly avowed, that a part of these claims which we are called on to pay—and which I am free to admit, from the consideration which I have given to the subject, I feel the necessity and propriety of paying—were incurred in military operations accidentally commencing after war had broken out between the two countries, but before that fact was in any manner known at the scene of operations.

The circumstances attending this war in California I must be permitted briefly to allude to, as they are contained in the report of the committee. In my humble judgment the officer from whose memorial I have read, was fully justified in what he did. But it becomes us the more to ascertain its character, to give to the country the reasons for the judgment which we are about passing on the subject. An officer of the topographical corps of the United States who had been justly distinguished for his scientific explorations in California, and in the adjoining territory of Oregon for some two or three years preceding, found himself in California in the spring of 1846, with an armed party but still a civic one, there by permission of the authorities of California in a pursuit purely pacific for the advancement of general science. He was informed, or rather he saw from the extraordinary jealousy of character which seems to appertain to the whole Mexican people, that sort of suspicion which is incapable of comprehending any broad or elevated principle or object in life—that his only hope to escape from actual military collision with the authorities of California was to abandon the country and to get beyond its jurisdiction, and this, although he had asked their hospitality, and that hospitality had been promised. And thus we are told, that in the spring of 1846, finding that such was the state of feeling around him with the authorities of California he deemed it wise, in order to avoid collision, to abandon the country and to pass into the adjoining territory of Oregon. He did so, and with him his whole party.

Although hostilities had not broken out between this government and Mexico, yet the aspect of affairs was so threatening as to render it expedient in the eyes of the President and of the public functionaries here, to determine that no foreign power, especially that of Great Britain, should avail themselves of, or should seize the opportunity afforded by the weakness and imbecility of Mexico, to possess herself of territory on this continent. Accordingly, an officer was despatched to California for the purpose of conferring with our consul, who was the only public agent of this country then in California, and with Lt. Colonel Fremont, if he should be found there, to concert with them such plans as in their judgment, would be best calculated to frustrate any attempt on the part of any foreign government, should such attempt be meditated, to acquire dominion by colonization or otherwise, within the limits of Mexico or California. We are told, and I am satisfied of its truth, that it was for the purpose of carrying out this view of the government at Washington, that Lt. Col. Fremont was induced to return to California after he had abandoned it. Sir, it is important, in my estimation, that the reason for his return should be distinctly known, in vindication of the conduct of the American government in the management of this affair. We have this in the report of the committee, distinctly stated by Col. Fremont himself, who has assumed the whole responsibility, and properly assumed it. He says that a gentleman, [who was an officer, as I understand, of the marine corps,] brought him a letter of introduction from the Secretary of State, and also one from Col. Benton.

I quote the language of Col. Fremont, from his deposition before the Military Committee:

"He brought me a letter of introduction from the Secretary of State, Mr. Buchanan, and letters and papers from Senator Benton and his family. The letter from the Secretary was directed to me in my private or citizen capacity, and although importing nothing beyond the introduction, accredited the bearer to me as coming from the Secretary of State, and, in connexion with the circumstances and place of its delivery, indicated a purpose in sending it which was intelligibly explained to me by the accompanying letter from Senator Benton, and by communications from Lieutenant Gillespie. This officer informed me that he had been directed by the Secretary of State to find me, and to acquaint me with his instructions, which had for their principal objects to ascertain the disposition of the California people, to conciliate their feelings in favor of the United States, and to find out, with a design of counteracting the designs of the British government upon that country."

That such were the instructions, is confirmed by the officer himself, [Mr. Gillespie.] I quote from his deposition before the committee:

"In answer to the first inquiry of the honorable committee, "Were you charged with any verbal instructions or communications to Colonel Fremont from the government at Washington, or any officer thereof? and if so, please state those instructions or communications, and from whom received?" I have to state, that I was directed by Mr. Buchanan to confer with Colonel Fremont, and to make known to him my own instructions, which, as I have previously stated, were, to watch over the interest of the United States, and counteract the influence of any foreign agents who might be in the country with objects prejudicial to the United States. I was also directed to show to Colonel Fremont the duplicate of the despatch to Mr. Larkin, consul at Monterey.

In answer to the second inquiry "You have said that you communicated the wishes of the government to Colonel Fremont; state particularly what you did communicate to him as the wishes of the government?" I beg leave to state, that the answer above contains, as near as I can recollect, what I communicated to Colonel Fremont, telling him, at the same time, that it was the wish of the government that we should conciliate the feelings of the people of California and encourage a friendship towards the United States."

Now, sir, it appears manifestly from the testimony of both of these officers that they carried with them into California no authority either from the Department of State, or from the Military department of the government, to wage any war for any purpose against the people of California, or against their government, but on the contrary, their mission was purely a peaceful one. They were instructed to conciliate and gain the good will, and attract the friendship of the people of California, in order so far as they might be able to do so, to frustrate the designs of the British emissaries, and to prevent them from getting possession of the country. That this was a wise policy on the part of the government, I apprehend there can be no doubt. How was it then when that mission was in reality a peaceful one, that these gentlemen found themselves embarked in military operations soon after their arrival. The report of the Committee on Military Affairs sheds abundant light upon this inquiry. The government of California stimulated doubtless, by foreign emissaries, whose presence was notorious, determined that no American should remain upon its soil. I am not familiar with the Spanish language, but I should apprehend as the Mexicans use it, the idea of "stranger" and "enemy" is expressed by the same word, as in ancient Rome. It is manifest from the whole history of the transactions attending our intercourse with Mexico, that to be a stranger there, was to be an enemy. When these officers returned to California it will be seen, as is fully proved by the documents, that our countrymen who had gone into California and established themselves there, whether with the express permission of the authorities or not, I do not know, but certainly with their acquiescence—were about to suffer from a conspiracy which had been got up against them, measures had been taken to bring down upon them the Indian populations, and a war was about to commence which would involve not only the massacre of the Americans who were spread through the peaceful valleys of California, but would probably involve also the party which accompanied Lieut. Col. Fremont. In such an emergency these officers assumed a very high responsibility. I confess, sir, that I feel instinctively sensitive to the establishment of a precedent, which would sanction, in any degree, acts of war or acts leading to war, on the part of officers of this government within the limits of a foreign power, and I have looked therefore at this matter closely, and I hope, considered it deliberately, and fully concur in the opinion that Col. Fremont and his party, whilst themselves blameless, were thus surrounded by circumstances which left them no alternative between a disgraceful and probably a most unsafe retreat, or uniting with his countrymen who were settled in California, and taking up arms in their own defence. He assumed the responsibility of the latter course, and he carried it out, as he says, successfully, and thus it was that California was subdued, and the settlers saved from destruction, about the very time, that war broke out with Mexico, although the fact that it existed was then unknown in California.

Sir, my object in the remarks with which I am wearying the Senate, is to disconnect the authorities at home from this outbreak in California, and to prove by testimony which cannot be controverted, that the government at home had no part in the insurrection, that the probability of such an occurrence was unknown to the government, and in truth, that it was no party to it either directly or indirectly. This fact is most distinctly stated, also, in this memorial from Lieut. Colonel Freemont, an extract from which I shall presently refer to.

So much for the commencement of the operations in California on land, now for those which commenced at sea. It appears from the documents which are to be found in the report, that Commodore Sloat who commanded in the Pacific, at that time arrived at Monterey. It is stated by Lieut. Colonel Fremont, (after having given an account of his military operations thus far) as follows:

While proceeding against Gen. Castro, authentic information was received that, on the 7th of July, Commodore Sloat had taken possession of Monterey, and hoisted the American flag, upon which the flag of independence was immediately hauled down, and that of the United States run up, and under the flag of the United States all subsequent operations were carried on.

"I came down to Monterey with my command, upon the request of Commodore Sloat, to co operate with him; and immediately on my arrival waited upon him, in company with Lieutegant Gillespie, on board the frigate Savannah. Commodore Sloat appeared uneasy at the great responsibility he had assumed. He informed me that he had applied to Lieutenant Gillespie, whom he knew to be an agent of the government, for his authority, but that he had declined to give it. He then inquired to know under what instructions I had acted in taking up arms against the Mexican authorities. I informed him that I had acted solely on my own responsibility, and without any authority from the government to justify hostilities. Commodore Sloat appeared greatly disturbed with this information, and gave me distinctly to understand that in raising the flag at Monterey, he had acted upon the faith of our operations in the north. Commodore Sloat soon relinquished the command to Commodore Stockton, who determined to prosecute hostilities to the complete conquest of California. He proposed that Lieutenant Gillespie and myself should serve under him, with all the force we could get; which we agreed to, our man doing the same, as Commodore Stockton so fully testified before the court martial; and from that time forward, all my operations were carried on under the orders of Commodore Stockton, or by virtue of commissions bestowed by him. I was appointed by him, major of the California battalion, afterwards military commandant of California, and afterwards governor and commander-in-chief in California; and under all these appointments expenses were incurred, which remain to be paid."

On the 7th of July, then, it appears that Commodore Sloat, commanding the marine, hoisted the flag of his country at Monterey, and took possession of that capital. It is manifest from this evidence that Lieut. Colonel Fremont was accidentally thrown under the necessity of commencing these hostilities, and that neither he or Commodore Sloat, who came shortly after upon the coast, had any authority whatever from their government to wage war against California. Indeed, it appears that Commodore Sloat, in raising the flag the United States at Monterey, did so under the impression that hostilities would not have been commenced on land unless under the authority of the government, or with a knowledge that war had commenced between the United States and Mexico. Now, sir, the Senate and the country may pass its separate judgment upon the acts of Lieut. Colonel Fremont in commencing these hostilities. What I desire is to rescue the government of my country from the possible imputation, that it sought by indirectly stirring up insurrection in a remote province of a sister republic to provoke a war for the purpose of seizing and appropriating her territory. I am free to admit, so far as I can form an opinion from the facts, that this young officer was placed under circumstances in which he could not have acted otherwise than he did. He could not see his countrymen exposed to the merciless attack of the savages, their homes and their fields desolated, and their women and children fleeing before the tomahawk and scalping-knife; he could not have subjected his own men to the dangers which awaited them, without incurring a censure greater than any he could have incurred in taking up arms for their protection. No, sir, I have no censure for this officer for the part he bore in these military operations in California.

The question, then, arises, does it devolve upon this government to pay these claims? Sir, I believe if not debito justitiæ, still in justice and equity we ought to pay them. Because these military operations, however unauthorized, were undertaken from necessity and for the protection of our own countrymen thus treacherously assailed, and because the fruits of the victories achieved enure to the United States when its army was sent there in prosecution of the war against Mexico. We must recognize them under this fact and none can complain. Claims that originate against the government under the sanction of law, always find laws providing for their liquidation. Claims that come before us without the sanction of law require special legislation to enable them to be paid. The Secretary of War has recommended the payment of these claims. In his annual report to Congress he says:

"The despatch of Col. Mason, to which I have before alluded, refers to the unsettled claims in that country against the United States, and recommends that immediate measures should be taken to ascertain the amount of such as are well founded, and that provision be made for immediate payment. These claims are principally for property of various descriptions furnished to, or taken by, our forces in the course of the military operations in that country. The delay to pay them has already produced much dissatisfaction, and is prejudicial to the interests of the United States. Some of the officers engaged in this distant service have become personally responsible for debts contracted for the use and in the service of the United States; it is also due to them that provision should be made for paying these debts."

How are they to be paid? The bill appropriates seven hundred thousand dollars, and, in my judgment, so large a sum to be expended in payment of claims which in their character are necessarily, to a great extent, indeterminate and loose, requires that every precaution should be taken to insure justice as well to the government as to the claimants. It is proposed in the bill reported from the Military Committee, that they shall be ascertained and paid under the authority of a commission, to be created for that purpose. I agree entirely with the committee in their recommendations on this point. They are claims of peculiar character; many of them doubtless of small amount would be dependent on evidence that it will be difficult to collect—evidence which must be closely scanned and sifted, to separate such as are fair and just from the unfair and unjust. Such scrutiny cannot well be made, by any other than a tribunal of judical character. Claims which have arisen without the sanction of law should have the closer scrutiny of law, and I know of no better mode for their adjustment than to have a board that shall sit and adjudicate them. It is proposed, however, in the bill which has been reported to create this board, and to appoint by law the officers who are to constitute it, one by name and the others by description.

Mr. President, I apprehend, and I say it with great deference to the committee who have reported this bill, that to create the board in such a manner would be a violation of the constitution of the United States. The bill provides that "The President be, and he is authorized, to appoint a board consisting of John Charles Fremont, and two officers of said battalion while in service, &c."

The President shall be authorized to appoint Lt. Col. Fremont and two other officers who were in the service. Now, sir, we ought to look carefully into this matter. It is unbecoming, [I say it with all respect,] it is unbecoming I think in the Senate of the United States, or in either branch of the Legislature of this government to trench, in the slightest degree, on the powers which are assigned by the constitution to the Executive. It would be a dangerous precedent. The constitution, for wise purposes, has lodged the power of appointment with the President, giving to the Senate only a negative on that power. Although the terms of the constitution are familiar to every Senator, I will ask leave to refer to them. It provides that the President

"Shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other ministers and consuls, Judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law. But the Congress may, by law, vest the appointment of such inferior officers, as they think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of departments."

Thus, sir, by the express terms of the constitution the power of selection is assigned to the President. He shall have power to nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint first—certain classes of officers, and then "all other officers whose appointments are not therein otherwise provided for, and which may be established by law." This commission then, and the appointment under it if established by law, ought to be filled according to the terms of the constitution, and within the meaning of the provisions to which I have referred. I understand an officer of the government to be one who has any public charge or employment whatsoever. I do not mean this as a strict definition of the term officer, but it is that form of expression which imparts to my mind the clearest conception of what is meant by public officer.

What duty is to be devolved on this board? It is to be a public duty, involving the expenditure of large sums of money. They are to sanction or reject the claims that may be presented; to do justice to the claimants and justice to the government; and these duties are to be discharged by persons who derive their authority exclusively from the government. Can it be said then, that they are not officers within the meaning of the provision of the constitution which I have read. They are officers not only in the general and popular sense, but in the strictest sense, for the discharge of an important trust, the adjudication of claims to a large amount, binding the government by their decisions—which claims are to be paid upon their certificate out of the public treasury—all which powers are derived under authority exclusively imparted to them by the government. Sir, I can entertain no doubt that this board or the officers who are to constitute it, are strictly officers within the meaning of the constitution. If such be the fact, it must necessarily follow that they are to be appointed by the appointing power known to the constitution, viz: by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

I have, sir, with the deference which becomes me, made these objections on the bill as it is reported from the committee, and I have made them with reluctance, for it is always with reluctance that I can express opinions different from those of a committee of this body, but it struck me at once, and the more I examined it the more I was confirmed in the opinion that the appointing power does not reside here, that it would be trenching on the rights of the Executive and violating the constitution, though not so intended, if we were to make these appointments by law. It becomes us therefore if we agree to the creation of any board, to do it in the usual form, and leave the power of appointment to the functionary in whom it has been reposed by the constitution. I know of no other mode of attaining this object than by a proposition to send the bill back to the Committee on Military Affairs, with instructions to reform it in this respect. I have drawn the instructions, which I will read to the Senate.

The bill proposes that there shall be three commissioners, I have no particular opinion on this subject. I had thought that one commissioner would be enough, provided he would be associated in some manner with the military commander for the time being in California, but on further consideration it strikes me that it would be as well that there should be two—though the additional expense would be comparatively small—I think it unnecessary. I throw out this proposition for the consideration of the Senate, not being wedded to it in any form as to details which the committee is more competent than I to determine; but I see no mode by which this object can be accomplished without a recommitment.

In what I have said, I have confined myself as I proposed to do, entirely to this bill. I am friendly to the purposes of the bill. I am in favor of paying these claims. But it is important that their character should be understood, so that at a future day, this government may not be implicated for having covertly, or for improper purposes incited the insurrection in California. I move the recommitment of the bill.

THE PILOT LAWS.

The Senate resumed the consideration, as in Committee of the Whole, of the bill to repeal the act of 2d March, 1837, entitled "An act concerning pilots."

Mr. DIX.—Mr. President: A bill in all respects similar to this, was before the Senate at the last session of Congress, but not finally acted upon for want of time. When it was taken up for consideration, I explained the object in view; but as there are many gentlemen on this floor, who were not then members of the Senate, I will recapitulate, as briefly as possible, the arguments urged in favor of the passage of the bill.

The bill proposes to repeal the act of 2d March, 1837, concerning pilots. The act proposed to be repealed, made it "lawful for the master or commander of any vessel coming into or going out of any port situate upon waters, which are the boundary between two States, to employ any pilot duly licensed or authorized by the laws of either of the States bounded on the said waters, to or from said port; any law, usage, or custom to the contrary notwithstanding."

This provision, though equal and fair on its face, is partial and unfair in its operation, as I will endeavor to show.

Before the American colonies confederated together for mutual defence and protection, each regulated its own pilotage. When they became independent States, and agreed to articles of confederation and perpetual union for their common government, they retained respectively the forms they had previously possessed on the subject. When the constitution of the United States was adopted, and a more perfect union formed between the States, it conferred on Congress the power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes." Under this authority, as is supposed, the Congress of the United States passed an act at its first session, providing "that all pilots in the bays, inlets, rivers, harbors, and ports of the United States shall continue to be regulated in conformity with the existing laws of the States, respectively, wherein such pilots may be, or with such laws as the States may respectively hereafter enact for the purpose, until further legislative provision shall be made by Congress."

Three considerations suggest themselves in view of this provision:

1. Congress assumed to possess the authority of legislating on the subject of pilotage, either, as is most probable, under the clause of the constitution I have cited conferring the power of regulating commerce, or, possibly, under the general power to make all laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution the powers expressly given to Congress. I do not intend to deny the authority, rightfully exercised; and I suppose it will be generally conceded that the regulation of pilots is a regulation of commerce.

2. Congress adopted the laws of the States then in force, regulating pilots in those States respectively. By virtue of this adoption these laws acquired all the force of acts of Congress, and all the regulations contained in them thenceforth possessed the same efficacy as they would have had if they had been recited in full in the act adopting them. They became a part of the law of the land.

3. Congress, by referring to and sanctioning the future legislation of the States, in respect to pilotage, virtually clothed them with its own power over the whole subject. It virtually pronounced the regulation of pilots in the several States a fit subject for local or municipal legislation. It was, in effect, a delegation of the power of Congress, whatever that power may be, over the subject of pilotage to the States, to be exercised in futuro, until resumed by the delegating authority, or, to use the words of the act, "until further legislative provision shall be made by Congress." This act was passed on the 7th of August, 1789. I believe it was the ninth act passed under the constitution of the United States, and it was for nearly half a century the only act passed by Congress in relation to the subject of pilotage, with the exception of the act of 1792, by which pilots were exempted from the performance of militia duty.

The State of New York commenced the regulation of pilotage for her principal port at an early period of her colonial existence. The first law I find was passed in 1694, more than one hundred and fifty years ago, and about seventy after the first settlement of New Amsterdam. It provided for the appointment of pilots by the Governor and Council, and prohibited all other persons from piloting any vessel into the port of New York under a pecuniary penalty. From that time to the year 1837, the pilotage of vessels to and from the port, was subject to State regulation. In this respect New York stood on the same footing, nominally and practically, with the other States in the Union.

In December, 1836, two shipwrecks of a very distressing character from the extensive loss of life with which they were attended, occurred on Long island—I allude to the Bristol and the Mexico. Neither of these vessels had a pilot; and this fact, combined with a previous course of conduct on the part of the New York pilots, calculated to create prejudice against them in the public mind, led to a strong feeling of excitement. There is no doubt that there was, to a certain extent, just ground for this prejudice. The business of pilotage in the city of New York had grown into a monopoly, and like all other monopolies had run into abuse. No man at this day desires to revive it. The number of pilots was too limited: and they had, by combining and agreeing to share equally the receipts accruing from their joint services, rendered all competition useless, and produced a relaxation of their accustomed vigilance in looking out for vessels and bringing them into port. On the fullest investigation, however, I believe they were exonerated from all direct censure on account of the loss of the two vessels referred to. But the system was not equally faultless; and, on the occurrence of these two disasters, the public attention having been strongly attracted to the subject, the Legislature of New York entered into a full investigation of it. For nearly three months the whole subject was under consideration before committees, or under discussion on the floor of the two Houses. Few subjects of legislation have received a more earnest or critical examination in any deliberative body; and it results in the passage of a law formed with a reference to all the known and alleged evils of the system. A board of commissioners, consisting of five persons, was authorized to be appointed by the governor and Senate of the State. It was made the duty of the board to examine the pilots then licensed, and if found qualified, to license them anew, and also to examine and license every other person of full age and good moral character, making application for the purpose, giving a preference to those, who had served three years as apprentices to licensed pilots. The duties of the commissioners in other respects were carefully defined by this act: the pilots were subjected to rigid regulations; their numbers were increased to meet the extending commerce of the city; all combinations were guarded against, so as to produce a free competition; and the defects in the old system, which time had disclosed, were provided for by appropriate remedies. I have no hesitation in saying, if this act had been permitted to go into operation, fully and fairly, without any interfering or counteracting legislation on the part of Congress, all the evils of the pre-existing system would have been remedied, and all the advantages of a proper competition would have been fully secured without any of the inconveniences, inequality, and injustice, which have resulted from the system now in force. Or, certainly, if its provisions had proved insufficient, the defect would have been cured by further legislation.

But before this act was matured and passed, the act of Congress of March 2 1837, of which we now ask for the repeal, had been hurried through the two Houses of Congress, and the power of regulating pilotage for the City of New York was virtually taken out of the hands of the Legislature of the State. The object of this act of Congress was to open the business of pilotage for the City of New York to the State of New Jersey, with a view to greater competion among the pilots in looking out for vessels destined for that port. I believe there was no other object in view at that time; and it is said to have been on the suggestion of persons in New York that the State of New Jersey was induced to pass a pilot law, as she did a few weeks before the act of Congress passed. I believe the competition in view of the latter act would have been fully secured by the law passed by the State of New York, and passed after the careful investigation to which I have already referred. It broke up the old monopoly: it rendered combinations impossible; and, in a word, it provided a complete remedy for pre-existing evils and defects. Under these circumstances, the interposition of Congress was unnecessary: it came in, not for good, but for ill. It frustrated the proper execution of the objects contemplated by the law of New York: it introduced other interests antagonistic to and in some degree subversive of them: it prevented a proper regulation of the system under the authority of the state. While the New York pilots, under the new system, were subjected to rigid regulations and to an active competition among themselves, they found other competitors in the field under the law of New Jersey, persons exempt from all control by the laws of New York and acting independently of her authority. After submitting to this state of things eight years, the Legislature of New York believing it unequal and unjust to her own pilots, repealed all her laws regulating pilotage, by way of Sandy Hook. The whole subject of pilotage for the principal channel of commerce with the great commercial emporium of the Union is unregulated by law, excepting so far as the laws of New Jersey have been made to operate within the territorial limits of New York. Any person may pilot a vessel into the port of New York, no matter how incompetent he is. The pilots licensed under the New York law of 1837, still retain their licenses, but without legal regulation; a number of individuals have received certificates from a voluntary association—certificates given without a shadow of authority; and the New Jersey pilots are extensively engaged in the business of piloting; but there is no common system of rules established under the authority of the State of New York, to which either of these classes of persons is amenable; and she has by the act of Congress been deprived of the power of establishing a system, to which all shall be required to conform, and the act of Congress prescribes none.

In order that there may be an end to this state of things, we ask for a repeal of the act of Congress, by which it has been produced. The grounds on which the repeal is sought may be briefly stated thus:

1. It is in the highest degree unjust to the State of New York, to take from her the right of providing, by such regulations as she seems proper, for piloting vessels into her principal seaport—the only one, indeed, in respect to which regulations for pilots are required. By authorizing the pilots of another State, licensed and governed by laws, over which she has no control, to take vessels in and out of the city of New York, the State is virtually stripped of a portion of her sovereignty, and the legislature of another State is enforced, without her consent and against her wishes, within her own territorial limits.

2. To allow pilots licensed under the laws of another State to bring in and carry out vessels to and from the port of New York, is authorizing officers of one State to execute public functions within the territorial limits of another. We insist that if Congress, under the constitution, undertakes to exercise the power of regulating pilotage in any other mode than by the adoption of the laws of the States within their own respective limits, it should do so directly, by providing for the appointment and government of pilots, under rules instituted by itself, and not by the offensive, and, as is contended, the unauthorized measure of allowing officers or agents of one State to perform public acts within the territorial limits and jurisdiction of another.

3. The act of Congress is in its operation unequal as a regulation of commerce; and, therefore, in volation of that provision of the constitution which declares that "no preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce, or revenue, to the ports of one State over those of another." Massachusetts has the exclusive regulation of pilotage for the port of Boston, Salem, New Bedford, &c. South Carolina for Charleston, Alabama for Mobile, &c., while New York is not permitted to provide for the regulation of pilots for her principal sea port. While the jurisdiction of the States referred to, is exclusive in respect to pilots for the ports I have named, hers is concurrent with the State of New Jersey. Besides, there is no equality in the existing system, as between the States of New York and New Jersey, considered by themselves. While the New Jersey pilots receive from $25,000 to $30,000 per annum for piloting vessels to and from the city of New York, no New York pilot that I can learn receives a dollar for piloting a vessel into a port in New Jersey. The advantage is all on one side. The act of Congress, though expressed in general terms, and apparently equal in its effects, is, from local circumstances, partial, unequal, and unjust.

4. The act of Congress was procured through misapprehension, by attributing to the New York pilots disasters for which they were not fairly responsible.

5. If the New York pilots had been responsible for the disasters attributed to their negligence, the defects of the system under which they were appointed, were revised by the legislation of the State of New York, framed with the greatest deliberation, which ought to have been permitted to go into operation without interference by Congress.

6. That the act of Congress has led to dissensions and litigation, not only between citizens of different States, but between different classes in the same State. The pilots of Louisiana have been involved in litigation with the pilots of Mississippi: the pilots of Maryland with those of Virginia. One of the Maryland pilots was thrown into prison for piloting a vessel to Norfolk, and kept there until released under the insolvent laws of Virginia. And it is a striking illustration of the impolicy and the injurious operation of the act of Congress, that where the parties concerned stand on an equal footing, they are unanimous in urging its repeal. It is only when it is unequal in its operation that the repeal is opposed. Thus, the pilots of Maryland, though authorized under the act, to pilot vessels into the ports of Virginia, on the Potomac and Chesapeake bay, and the pilots of Virginia, though authorized to pilot vessels into the ports of Maryland on the same waters, have united in petitioning for its repeal. The State of Maryland also, in view of the operation of the act in that State, remonstrates against it, on the ground that it "permits the conflicting jurisdiction of adjacent States to disturb and derange the best systems of pilotage, which either may adopt." Sir, the only remedy for the evils it has caused is its unconditional repeal, in order that each may be left to regulate its own pilotage for itself, according to the system, which existed for nearly half a century after the organization of the federal government. And I will only add that, in this event, I am sure the subject will be disposed of by New York with a just and liberal regard to her mercantile interest, and in such a manner as to remove all ground of complaint from any quarter.

Mr. MILLER.—This is a subject of deep interest to the commercial and navigating interests of the country, and is of too much importance to be disposed of in the morning hour. I suggested to the honorable Senator from New York to appoint a day for the consideration of this bill, when those interested in the matter might be present, and the Senate be full. I do not propose this morning to enter into the discussion of the subject, or to answer the remarks of the Senator from New York. My object simply is to have an understanding with the Senator, that this bill shall either be set down for a particular day, or if passed by informally now, that an understanding may be had that it will not be called up without previous notice. To one remark of the honorable Senator which he made in the commencement of his speech, I may be permitted to allude, as without reply it might prejudice the interests of some of those who are interested in the bill. It has been stated by the Senator from New York, that this bill was originally passed in a great hurry by Congress, thus insinuating that it was passed without due reflection and deliberation. Now, it is true, that the bill passed without much debate, but I think it can be made perfectly manifest to the Senate when they come to look into the facts of the case, that if there were any hurry, it was owing to the circumstance of the case, and that the bill was promptly passed, in order to afford protection to the lives and property of our citizens. But, however, that may be with regard to the passage of the bill, certain it is, that there has been since abundance of time for reflection. Every year since the passage of this law, down to the present day, these pilots of New York have presented themselves here for the purpose of obtaining its repeal. At one time it received the consideration of a committee of this body, and a report was made, which is now upon the files of the Senate, and ever since the subject has been repeatedly presented, not only here, but throughout the country. It has thus undergone a very attentive examination. After a most mature consideration of the whole subject, the Legislature of New York finally came to the conclusion, that the law as it now stands was a just one, and should be maintained; I speak of the resolution which passed the Legislature relative to this very subject. However, I do not intend to go into the subject now, but merely remark, that if these pilots showed half as much attention to the ships coming into the port of New York as they have to this bill, there would be no ground of complaint. I move that the bill be postponed to a future day.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts.—If I had supposed that this bill was coming up this morning, I would have brought with me certain documents and papers, which bear upon the subject.—Without going into the matter as fully as I would have done had I been aware that the consideration of it was to be taken up in the morning hour to-day, I may throw out one or two ideas in reference to it. I generally agree with the honorable gentleman from New York, on most of those commercial subjects; but I cannot, in the present case at all concur with his views. In my judgment it is not expedient to repeal this law, and I agree with my friend from New Jersey that this is a measure of very great importance, affecting interests of considerable magnitude, and is not to be passed upon hastily or inconsiderately. The first inquiry that naturally presents itself is, who desires the repeal of this law? So far as I am able to ascertain, the repeal of the law is not sought or desired by any parties except the pilots belonging to the city of New York. I believe that the papers relating to the subject in my possession do not show that any other class of individuals connected with the shipping interest of the country, desire the repeal of the law, except those pilots. And why do they desire a repeal of the law? A brief reference to the history of the circumstances in which the law originated may assist us in answering this question.

It seems that a combination existed among the New York pilots, antecedent to the passage of this law, by which they entered into an arrangement to distribute amongst themselves the fees received from pilotage in that harbor; and that in accordance with this arrangement they divided themselves into parties, going down alternatively to Sandy Hook, and anchoring there, bringing vessels into port with as little inconvenience to themselves as possible. The result was those frightful calamities by shipwreck, to which the gentleman from New Jersey alluded, and which were ascribed to the want of proper vigilance on the part of the pilots. The wreck of the "Mexico," and several other vessels, near the harbor of New York, involving great loss of life and property, attracted much attention to the subject, and the representations made in consequence excited investigation here, and this law was the result. It was said, here is a common port, partly founded by the State of New York and partly by the State of New Jersey. The pilots of New Jersey are not permitted to bring vessels into the harbor which are bound for the State of New York; but they are authorized to bring them into the same harbor, provided they are bound to the State of New Jersey. Now, on this common water, it was said, we will make the right of pilotage a common right, and create a competition, in order to see whether the recurrence of those evils may be prevented. That was the argument which was presented, and under it the law was passed, authorizing the pilots of New Jersey as well as those of New York, to bring vessels into the harbor. What was the result?—The whole evil vanished immediately. Instead of anchoring quietly at Sandy Hook, leaving vessels to grope their way into the harbor as they might, incurring all the dangers of shipwreck, the pilot boats are now often found one hundred miles out at sea in search of vessels. Free competition has been created, shipwrecks in the neighborhood of that harbor are almost unknown, and the pilotage of that important harbor has been placed on a footing highly satisfactory to the merchants, ship-owners, ship-masters, insurance offices, and all intrusted in the navigating and commercial interests of the port. I do not know whether I am authorized to say that there is not a merchant in the city of New York who would desire the repeal of this law; but I think I am authorized to say that every insurance office in that city, the Chamber of Commerce, and the merchants generally are all desirous that the law should remain as it is; and why? Because these interests are safe in the present condition of things, whereas they were unsafe under the former arrangement.

This is a brief, general view of the case; in which the facts will I believe fully sustain me. My friend says that the present system works a little practical injustice towards the State of New York. Why, I have understood the honorable Senator from New Jersey has intimated that the New York pilots have been diligent in season and out of season, since the passage of the law, endeavoring to obtain a repeal of that law; not because they are impelled or justified by any of the great interests involved, but because they desire a monopoly, under the presumption that they will make a proper use of their power if you repeal this law. Well, I am convinced that none of those interested in insurance business or in property afloat upon the ocean, will desire that experiment to be tried. But the gentleman from New York contends that it works some practical inequality—that a certain degree of power is taken from New York, heretofore conceded to her, and which ought to remain there. Now what is the theory of this pilot law? I apprehend that my friend from New York has fallen into a little error, in reference to the exercise of this power by the States. He says, very truly, that in 1789 Congress passed a law recognizing, and perhaps, adopting—I am quite willing it should be so regarded—the then existing laws of the United States upon the subject of pilotage, making the laws of the States their own laws; but they go a step farther than that, and intimate that the laws hereafter passed by the several States shall be the laws to regulate pilotage, and that that is a grant of power to the States under the constitution of the United States. Well now, I apprehend that if the gentleman will reflect for one moment on this view of the subject he will be inclinedto doubt whether that was the intent of that law. I do not think it is legitimately subject to such a construction. Such a view of it is not reconcilable with the constitution. It is quite impossible that Congress should, by its legislative power, change the terms and conditions of the constitution. If this power to regulate pilotage be vested in Congress alone, why, then, Congress can control, by legislation, no power in the States. It is a solecism to assume that Congress can amend or change the constitution by an act of legislation. I think it is necessary only to state that view of the case, in order to have the result to which the mind is led, made perfectly palpable.

Mr. DIX.—I stated that Congress recognized the future legislation of the States, and by so doing virtually clothed the States with power over this subject, to be exercised by them until resumed by the legislative power of the general government. I had no idea that the form of the constitutional power was changed.

Mr. DAVIS.—This is precisely the thing against which I contend. Congress can confer no power by legislative acts, unless conferred by the constitution itself. How then are the State laws to be sustained? It is evident that the States were regarded by Congress as having a concurrent power on this subject. They have exercised it all times, and they by no means derive that power from the legislative action of Congress. The harbor laws, health—regulations, and all that power exercised by the States, the whole system of sanitary laws is based upon the ground, that the States hold concurrent power with the United States. The United States may, when they choose to exercise the power exclude the States, but so long as they are not excluded, the States have a right to exercise the power. However, this is not a very material question. I believe no one doubts the authority of the States to legislate on the subject. The question now before us is simply, whether the law of the United States shall be repealed, and we shall return to the system which existed at the time when this law was made. And what are the reasons urged for the repeal? New York in common with New Jersey exercises jurisdiction with regard to the pilotage over that water by which both States are in part bounded. And it is said that the State of New York cannot regulate her pilotage to her satisfaction. Why not? The State of New Jersey regulates it by law. She finds no difficulty in subjecting the whole system to the control of her law, nor in carrying the law into execution. The State of New York might adopt the same system, and carry it out as successfully as the State of New Jersey. Why then should the law be repealed? It is alleged that the Jersey pilots are incompetent. Well, who is the best judge of that—those who own vessels —those who insure them—those who have property on board—or the pilots themselves? Is it at all likely that the system can be an unsafe one, when for eight or ten years—for eleven years, as I am just now informed by my friend from New Jersey, the system has gone on successfully to the perfect satisfaction of the shipping interest, the insuring interest, the merchants, and all others whose interests are concerned. It is obvious that the sole motive and object of those who seek the repeal of the law, is to regain possession of that monopoly which they formerly enjoyed. I might by adverting to authorities make good the position which I have assumed, that the interests of the country imperatively demand of Congress, that this law should be suffered to remain as it is. Certainly the law should be allowed to stand until the State of New York call upon us by its action to interfere with the present system.

Mr. CASS.—As the morning hour has expired I trust that this subject will be passed over informally, so that the special order may be taken up.

Mr. DIX.—I merely wish to say that I do not intend to continue the debate, but to remark that I do not believe one word has been urged against the bill by the gentlemen who have spoken in opposition to it, which is not susceptible of satisfactory explanation. The gentleman from New Jersey thinks that I am in error in saying that the law was hurried through both branches of Congress. In reply I would simply state, that the bill was introduced into this body on the 28th of February—it not being even leap year—and received three readings the same day. It then went to the other house where it passed in the same manner on the 2d of March, without any debate and very little consideration, as I believe, and after a committee in the other house had reported against any action on the subject. I wish to make this statement in order to correct the Senator in imputing to me any error. I will now move that this subject be passed by informally and the order of the day be taken up. I have no desire to press the matter now; nor shall I call the bill up in the absence of those Senators who may be particularly interested in it.

The bill was then passed over informally.

THE CALIFORNIA CLAIMS.

The Senate resumed the consideration, as in Committee of the Whole, of the bill for ascertaining and paying the California claims.

The question pending was upon agreeing to the motion made by Mr. MASON, to recommit the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs, with instructions to amend it.

Mr. BADGER requested the Senator from Virginia to withdraw his motion for the moment, to afford him an opportunity of offering an amendment.

Mr. MASON assented and withdrew his motion.

Mr. BADGER then moved to amend the bill by striking out the words "the President be, and he hereby is, authorized to appoint a board consisting of" in the 9th and 10th lines of the 2d section, and by striking out the word "which" in the 12th line, and inserting in lieu thereof the words "to be selected by the President of the United States shall constitute a," and by inserting in said line the word "which" after the word "board."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BADGER—I wish to submit a very few remarks without going at all into the history of these claims. The question has been already discussed in a full and satisfactory manner by gentlemen who are perfectly familiar with all the facts. I desire only to submit a few observations to the Senate in reference to the supposed constitutional difficulty relative to the manner in which this board is to be constituted. If I understand the honorable Senator from Virginia correctly, he supposes that this is a bill undertaking to accomplish by direct legislation, what in consistency with the constitution can be done only through the intervention of the action of the Executive—and upon the ground that we propose here by a statute to appoint certain officers of the United States—whereas the constitution declares that officers of the United States shall be nominated by the President, and be by him appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. If this were so, it would follow as a clear and undeniable consequence that the Senate is bound either to reject the bill, or so to alter this provision as to make it conformable to the constitution. But in my apprehension that objection is founded on a mistake. That section of the bill contemplates the doing of nothing that is in violation of the constitution of the United States. It does not propose to appoint officers of the United States in the sense in which the constitution uses those terms in reference to the power of appointment by the President. The constitution necessarily deals in general terms, and it follows as the framers of that instrument, to avoid needless and embarrassing specification use general terms; an interpretation is to be given to the constitution with reference to the existing wants and necessities of the people, and continual reference is to be had to the great purposes which we should suppose were intended to be accomplished by the particular provision under consideration.

Now, in the first place, I do not look upon the persons proposed to be designated by this bill as officers of the United States in the sense of the constitution. It is manifest that there are many agencies, trusts, charges, which the necessities of the government may require, in reference to which the persons who are called upon to discharge and perform those duties cannot be called officers of the United States in the sense in which the constitution uses the term. In one sense they are officers. The duties which they discharge may be said to constitute an office, for there is perhaps no word in the English language of more extensive signification than the word office. It embraces every duty which we are called upon to discharge in our relations to others, whether judicial, executive, administrative, or otherwise; and all the functions which we are called upon to perform—so far as they respect the benefit and happiness of those persons, and which, therefore, places us in the confidential relation of trust towards them—are emphatically offices. The State itself is an office, the duties to be discharged are offices, but the word is used also in a restricted and defined sense. When the government finds it necessary to call upon somebody to examine into an individual claim and to determine whether that claim against the government is just or not, is the person thus chosen an officer of the United States within the meaning of the constitution? If the government of the United States or if Congress think proper to call artists to adorn these halls with pictures and statuary, is the person who is called upon to execute this work an officer of the United States within the meaning of the constitution, and to be appointed with the advice and consent of the Senate? If Congress find it necessary to make a collection of state papers and to have them condensed and arranged, and a general review of the historical and diplomatic transactions of the country executed, is the person who is called upon to discharge that duty an officer of the United States within the meaning of the term as used in the provision of the constitution to which I have referred? I apprehend these questions must all be answered in the negative. And these and other temporary and occasional employments cannot be confounded with those continuing public trusts which, in the constitution, are called offices. I admit that in this as any other moral subject, the boundary which subdivides its different parts, is not, and cannot be defined with exactness, and hence as you advance towards it, you find yourself in some degree of obscurity, and at length find yourself unable to ascertain with precise accuracy to which side of the line a particular class of subjects belongs. But still we have to deal with these as with every other moral subject, by taking the guidance of common sense and reason. And inasmuch as the establishment of a contrary doctrine would involve great practical difficulties in carrying on the government, I should feel content—even if the past history and practice of the government did not furnish any precedents—to give to this term the signification which I have now stated in its connection with the bill before us. But this point has been already decided, and sensible for my own part of the great importance of regarding the constitution as the same at all times and places, I believe that in all cases in which questions have been fully considered and solemnly decided, they should be regarded as settled at once and forever. Gentlemen may differ however in this view of the subject, though it seems to me that in a question of this kind it is absolutely indispensable unless we would fetter ourselves at every step of our progress—that we should yield to what has been the clear undoubted authority of all the departments of this government, legislative, executive and judicial. Let me now refer to a few of the cases of legislation in which the same general principle may be considered as being involved.

6th February, 1817. By the act of this date John Trumbull, of Connecticut, was employed to compose and execute four paintings commemorative of the most important events of the revolution, to be placed when finished in the Capitol of the United States.

2d March, 1831. By the act of this date Gales & Seaton were designated by name to furnish a publication of State papers under certain prescribed terms and conditions.

2d March, 1833. By the act of this date Matthew St. Clair Clark, and Peter Force, were designated by name to furnish a Documentary History of the Revolution, under certain prescribed terms and conditions.

2d March, 1829. By the act of this date L. Persico was employed to execute two statutes in front of the Capitol, &c.

2d March, 1831. By the act of this date, the employed of James Parker was sanctioned, and he was compensated for investigating the account of Robert Arnold, late collector of Amboy.

7th July, 1838. By the act of this date a mission among the wild tribes of Indians of the southwest, by S. P. Chouteau, authorized, and an appropriation of $20,000 made for his outfit, and the expenditures growing out of, and connected with bringing on deputations of said tribes, which he has been authorized to do.

7th July, 1838. By an act of this date Dr. Henry Perrine was authorized to form a settlement and admit settlers upon certain conditions with a view to promote and encourage the introduction and cultivation of tropical plants in the United States.

29th September, 1789. Act to recognize and adopt to the constitution of the United States the establishment of the troops raised under the resolves of the United States in Congress assembled, and for other purposes therein mentioned, by which all the officers belonging to the military force under the confederation were at once made officers of the United States by force of the act itself.

14th July, 1832. By act for the relief of the legal representatives of Nimrod Farrow, and Richard Harris. Third Auditor of the Treasury, 2d Comptroller, and Charles Gratiot were authorized to examine the claims of the said representatives to take testimony and report the same, &c.

This last case is precisely like that now under consideration of the Senate. This bill provides that the board shall be constituted of three individuals, of whom one is expressly designated by name; the other two, to be selected by the President from the officers of the late California battalion. What are they to do? To discharge precisely the same functions as those which devolved upon the commissioners under the provision of the act just cited. We thus find that immediately after the adoption of the constitution there was not thought to be any difficulty in Congress by an act of legislation bringing into the service of the United States a whole class of officers without any nomination by the President, or confirmation by the Senate, or appointment by any person acting in behalf of the United States. These are all legislative precedents; but inasmuch as they were acts of Congress, and all received the approval and sanction of the President of the United States, they involve the undoubted approbation of the legislative and executive departments of this country in regard to the proposition for which I contend—that whatever may be the meaning of the term officer of the United States as used in the constitution, it does not include those commissioners who are employed in the legislative auditing and settlement of accounts, and examination of claims against the government, nor require that the persons who are to discharge these duties should be appointed by the President of the United States. Doubtless, Congress can if it please constitute an office for this purpose if it deem that the best mode of accomplishing the object. But, if in their wisdom they choose, as in the present case, that the duty shall be performed by commissioners, they may constitute that commission in any way which seems best, subject to the usual provision that it meet the approbation of the President of the United States.

But I said that this view of the question has received judicial sanction. Early in the first term of General Washington's administration, an act was passed by Congress to provide for the settlement of claims of the widows and orphans of those who fell in the war. By that law the claimants were directed to apply to the circuit courts of the United States, which were to receive the evidence—examine the merits of the claims, and pass their judgment upon them. What was the view taken of the law by the judges? I read from "American State Papers;" Miscellaneous Volume—p. 49:

"At a stated circuit court of the United States held for the district of New York, at the City of New York, on Thursday, the 17th day of April, one thousand seven hundred and ninety two, at ten of the clock, ante meridian.

"Present: The Honorable JOHN JAY, Esq., Chief Justice of the United States; the Honorable William Cushing, Esq., one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, the Honorable James Duane, Esq., judge of the district of New York.

"The court proceeded to take into consideration the following act of Congress of the United States, viz:

"AN ACT to provide for the settlement of the claims of widows and orphans barred by the limitations heretofore established, and to regulate the claims to invalid pensions.

"As, therefore, the business assigned to this court by the act is not judicial, nor directed to be performed judicially, the act can only be considered as appointing commissioners for the purposes mentioned in it by official instead of personal description.

"That the judges of this court regard themselves as being the commissioners designated by this act, and therefore as being at liberty to accept or to decline that office.

"That as the objects of this act are exceedingly benevolent, and do real honor to the humanity and justice of Congress, and as the judges desire to manifest, on all proper occasions, and in every proper manner, their high respect for the National Legislature, they will execute this act in the capacity of commissioners.

"That as the Legislature have a right to extend the session of this court for any term which they may think proper by law to assign, the term of five days, as directed by this act, ought to be journally observed.

"That the judges of this court will, as usual, during the session thereof, adjourn the court from day to day, or other short periods, as circumstances may render proper; and that they will regularly between the adjournments proceed as commissioners to execute the business of this act, in the same court room or chamber."

It is thus clearly seen that the court recognizes the authority of Congress to constitute the commissioners by name, for they say they will interpret the act as one appointing them commissioners by official instead of personal description. Here, then, we have cases continually occurring from 1789 down to the present day in which the principle for which I contend has been fully recognized and sanctioned. One of these cases is of recent occurrence. I allude to the appointment of an arbitrator in the Pea Patch Island case. I will not trouble the Senate, however, by a reference to those cases. Enough has, I think, been submitted to satisfy the Senate that there is no constitutional impediment to the passage of the bill before it.

Mr. RUSK.—Mr. President: It is my desire to trouble the Senate for only a very few moments in regard to these claims, to the payment of which I have heard no opposition. All seem to admit their justice, and appear to have no objection to the passage of such a law as may be necessary to ensure their speedy settlement. The only difficulty which has been started in opposition to the bill before us, is, that Congress has not the power to name commissioners or appoint an individual—call him what you will, officer, arbitrator, or what you please—to determine the amount of the claims.

This, Mr. President, appears to me to be a strange doctrine, more particularly at a time when so many complaints are heard about Executive patronage and the difficulties into which the extension of it is leading us. It seems very strange that, just at this moment, we should claim for the Executive, without any direct and positive statement to that effect, it is true, but by inference, powers which, as the courts have decided, do not properly belong to him. What is the case before us? Certain individuals have claims against the government of the United States, and, whether they be few or many, one or a thousand, the principle is precisely the same—this Congress has the power, the right, it is their duty, and they are in the daily performance of that duty, to investigate, to look into, and determine upon such claims and provide by law for their payment. They refer similar claims to them for decision, and are in the daily habit of assigning them for examination to the Solicitor of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, the Auditors of the Treasury, and other officers. And for what purpose? Why, sir, to ascertain whether the claims be just. It is not a public or official duty which the individual to whom a claim is thus referred is called upon to perform; it is a private duty, separate and distinct from any official relation. The reference is for the purpose of determining whether the claim be just or not, and if the referee, as arbitrator, determine that it is just, we pass the laws for paying it. Now, sir, this is a reference, not to the officer selected as such, for the purpose, but to the individual, the name of the office being merely used by way of designation or description. It may be contended that this is nothing more than imposing an additional duty upon an officer, whose duties are already prescribed and defined; but this is, in my opinion, a mistake. The duty thus proposed is of a specific and not a public character. We refer, for instance, the claim of A B to the Auditor of the Post Office Department. I would ask, does it therefore follow that we invest that officer with the right, also, to decide upon the claim of C D? Clearly not. Hence it is not an additional official duty imposed, but merely a simple reference of a private matter.

The constitution declares that all officers whose appointment is not otherwise provided for, shall be appointed by the President.—The clause to which I have reference is in these words. Enumerating the powers of the President, it declares:

"He shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law; but the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper, in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of departments."

This is the clause under which it is assumed the proposed appointment is unconstitutional. The question then arises, what is the meaning of the term "officer?" What is the precise interpretation intended to be attached to the word "officer" by the framers of the constitution? Did they use it in its most broad and unrestricted sense? According to its most comprehensive meaning of the term, the performance of any duty may be called an office, and of necessary consequence he who discharges it becomes an officer. Is it not preposterous to suppose that the framers of the constitution intended to use the word in this unconfined sense, and thus indicate that the President should appoint every person to whom any duty may be assigned? It seems to me that the only construction which can be fairly and legitimately put upon this article of the constitution is, that it confines to the appointment of public functionaries or those officers who are attached generally to the service of the government of the United States, and indispensable in carrying out the ordinary administration of its affairs. The word "officer," in this connection, carries with it the idea of permanence and of vacation and succession. According to the common law, officers are said to be of two kinds, public and private. It is laid down, and no one will dispute the assertion, that an attorney at law is an officer of the courts; and yet, no person will venture to contend that, under the provision of the constitution to which I refer, no lawyer can practise in the Supreme Court of the United States, unless he be appointed by the President. Attorneys are admitted to the bar by the permission of the court itself; the authority for the power thus exercised by it is nowhere to be found in the statute book, but is one of the incidents necessarily connected with the due administration of justice. They are, however, officers, nevertheless.

There is a case, Mr. President, in point, which was decided in Virginia, and which goes far to illustrate the difference between a public and a private office. The case referred to is that of B. W. Leigh, who applied for admission to the bar as an attorney.—They had in Virginia a statute requiring all officers to take an oath against duelling. Mr. Leigh refused to take this oath, and after argument and deliberate consultation, the court decided that the office of attorney was not a public office belonging to the commonwealth, and that, therefore, the applicant was not bound to take the oath.

Now, Mr. President, I will ask whether, if we pass this bill, and appoint Colonel Fremont to adjust these claims, he will thereby become an officer of the government of the United States? So, soon as he shall have performed the duty assigned him, his office, if you please to call it so, will cease to exist. It has reference to private claims, and is precisely of the nature of an arbitration. And, sir, if Congress has not the power to refer a private claim to an arbitrator, who shall determine upon its fairness—unless the President shall nominate and appoint such arbitrator? Then, sir, none of your federal courts have a right to refer a case to arbitration, unless the arbitrators be appointed by the executive. Now, sir, it is under the provision of the constitution, would a court of the United States, having equity jurisdiction, have a right to appoint even an auditor, unless under the sanction of the President's nomination? Establish this doctrine, sir, and you will confer on the President an extent of patronage far greater than that which he at present possesses, and infinitely beyond what, as it appears to me, the framers of the constitution ever intended him to exercise.

But, Mr. President, there are authorities on this subject in addition to the decision of the Supreme Court, already cited by the honorable Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. BADGER.] which is of itself conclusive on this point. I refer to the case of Kendall vs. United States, in 12th Peter's Reports. On the 2d of July, 1836, Congress passed a law requiring the Solicitor of the Treasury to determine upon the amount of a claim held by Stockton & Stokes against the Post Office Department, and the law also required that after the Solicitor should have made his award the Postmaster General should pass the amount to the credit of those individuals. The Solicitor of the Treasury did make his award, not as solicitor, but as arbitrator, and it is in this character alone, the court consider him. They, sir, are not found straining phrases, and wresting and distorting the meaning of the constitution, for the purpose of conferring upon him any other or greater power than that intended by the reference, but he is regarded and treated merely as an arbitrator. The Attorney General contended strongly against this award, but he never dreamed of urging that the law of Congress, which made the Solicitor of the Treasury the arbitrator, was unconstitutional. He is regarded in that point of view, throughout the whole proceeding, by the Supreme Court. That distinguished tribunal thought it was competent for Congress to vest the authority in an officer of the government, or in any one else, and under its decision, it seems to me, with all due deference to the opinions of gentlemen more learned than myself, as well as, according to the plain language of the constitution, Congress possesses the perfect right to submit claims against the government to the examination and arbitrament of an officer of the government, a private citizen, or even of an alien; without, in the slightest degree, interfering with, or encroaching upon, the prerogative of the President of the United States.

I read, Mr. President, from 12th Peter's reports, page 611:

"Under the law the Postmaster General is vested with no discretion or control over the decisions of the Solicitor, nor is any appeal or review of them in any manner provided for by the act. The terms of the submission was a matter resting entirely in the discretion of Congress, and if they thought proper to submit such a question to any one, and especially an arbitrator, as an officer of the government, it did not belong to the Postmaster General to control Congress, or the solicitor, in that affair. It is unnecessary to say how far Congress might have interfered, by legislation, after the report of the solicitor. But if there was no fraud or misconduct in the arbitrator, of which none is pretended or suggested, it may well be questioned whether the claimants had not acquired such a vested right, as to be beyond the power of Congress to deprive them of it."

Now, sir, unless I am most grossly in error, this decision of the Supreme Court puts the question at rest, beyond the reach of all cavil or controversy; and I deem it entirely useless to say any thing further upon this point.

The question which next presents itself, Mr. President, is—are these claims to be paid? It is not my intention to enter into a detailed history of the transactions which gave rise to the responsibilities, for which the government is held, as I think most justly, liable; but I will go sufficiently far into the subject to satisfy every unprejudiced mind that the claims are not only just and equiable, but farther, that they are of the most binding and sacred character—that they should be immediately paid, and that the interests of the government will be best promoted by the prompt liquidation and payment of them. What, sir, I would ask, are the nature and character of these claims? What are they? In the early part of the year 1846, we find Col. Fremont, in California, engaged on business totally unconnected with the army, and pursuing his topographical researches. After having obtained authority from the Governor of the province, to make his surveys and examinations, for the purpose of increasing the stores of human knowledge, and having entered upon his scientific labors, we behold him notified, that he must quit the country. This notice was peremptory, and given in a manner highly offensive and insulting. Having delayed a few days after the notice, he was threatened with being driven out of the country. It is probable that, if the order had come without the threat, Col. Fremont would have left, rather than have had any misunderstanding with the local authorities; but, being threatened, sir, he very properly, as I think, took his position with his command of sixty men, and hoisted the flag of the United States, determined to remain until he was prepared to leave; and when he was ready, sir, he quitted the country and when to Oregon. We next find him in Oregon, where he is overtaken by a messenger, an officer of the government, who bore to him a letter, and—there is no use in concealing it, sir—although it purported to be a mere letter of introduction, it was, in reality, an official document, accrediting the bearer of it to Col. Fremont, with a view to the union of the two, in devising some means to counteract the designs of the British emissaries. Captain Gillespie, the officer to whom I allude, in his evidence before the Committee on Military Affairs, states that he was directed to convey the order of the government to Col. Fremont, to watch the interests of the United States in California. This, sir, was the purport of Captain Gillespie's mission, and, so soon as the communication was made to him. Col. Fremont returned to California, under the order of his government, and by its express authority. Immediately after his arrival, the American settlers, who knew him and placed entire confidence in him, called upon him for aid and protection; and under what circumstances was this call made, sir? The families of those settlers, who had been previously invited to take up their abode there, had been ordered, through the influence of British agents, operating upon the local authorities, to leave the country forthwith. A large force of troops was raised to drive out these unhappy people to where they must either perish from starvation, or be exposed to the tomahawk and scalping knife of the blood-thirsty and merciless savages.

Nor is this all, Mr. President. The evidence before the Committee on Military Affairs shows clearly, that the Indians had been incited to commence the work of destruction, by burning up the crops; and the indiscriminate slaughter of women and children. In all this, sir, as I conceive, may be seen the agency of the emissaries of the British government. In what war have we ever been engaged with Great Britain that she did not incite the Indians against us? Yes, sir! And are not the Indians urged on by British agents; overrunning nearly the whole of Yucatan?

It was under such circumstances as these, sir, that Col. Fremont was called upon to prevent the slaughter of the families of the American settlers, and shield them from the horrors of Indian butchery and outrage. What did he then do, sir? Col. Fremont stands in need of no commendation from me; he has established a reputation for himself, by braving dangers and fatigues—a well earned reputation, which had extended itself far beyond the limits of the United States. Had he faltered on this occasion, even for an instant, and refused to listen to the appeal which was then made to him, his lofty fame and wide spread renown would have been blasted in a moment. It would have been lost beyond the possibility of redemption.

From the limited acquaintance which I have with Col. Fremont, I am induced to believe he would have risked, not only his life, but what is infinitely more valuable, his reputation, to gratify his deep feelings of generous sympathy with his distressed countrymen. He obeyed their call, sir, and, so far from meriting any blame for so doing, he deserves for this act alone, the very highest commendation that can be bestowed upon him. His influence operated upon the Indians. They knew him to be an officer of this government, who had incurred the displeasure of the authorities of California. Under these circumstances, he acted promptly, Mr. President, in defence of the American settlers who turned out with all of their disposable means, and made common cause with him, not only against the authorities by whom they were persecuted, but against the British agents by whose influence that persecution had been brought about

The country was declared independent, I believe on the 5th of July. It will be recollected that previous to this time, I think in the month of May or June, Commodore Sloat who had been sent out to the Pacific, wrote to the government here, that he was about to take possession of California, as he found there were British vessels on the coast, having, as he believed, some designs against the country. Shortly afterwards the same officer wrote, that he would not assume the responsibility; and he did not take possession of California, until the operations of Col. Fremont in that quarter had determined him to do it. In a few days I believe, after the declaration of independence was made, he took possession of Monterey, and shortly afterwards, the gallant Commodore Stockton arrived there with orders from his government to take possession.

It will thus be seen, sir, that all of the expenses which were incurred in the operations in that country, with the exception of those which took place during the very brief time preceding the arrival of Commodore Stockton, were incurred with the express sanction of the government, and under the immediate direction of its commanding officer. Shall we then, sir, repudiate these claims? Shall we say to these people "we will not pay you?" Would it be just to do so? Will any Senator within these walls say, that for obeying the best and most humane dictates of his heart—for risking his life and reputation—to preserve women and children from savage butchery, Col. Fremont shall pay, himself, the expenses attending the gallant act—the more especially, when the consequence of that act has been to prevent California from falling into the hands of the British government? Is there any one here who wishes to throw the responsibility on him? I think not.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that our right to appoint an arbitrator, is beyond all doubt, in which opinion, I am sustained by the decision of the Supreme Court. As to the justice of the claims—I have not heard a single whisper to the contrary, and such being the case, I hope the bill will pass, and pass promptly.

There is yet an additional and very powerful reason for its passage. The citizens who gave up every thing for the defence of the country, and who were the means of saving it to the United States, are now in a state of destitution. They are your fellow citizens—it is all important that you convince them by your first act, that your are disposed to be just, and will not postpone the payment of their equitable claims. This is the way to attach citizens to the government.

It may be well to add that Col. Fremont is the person, who may, with peculiar propriety be charged with the settlement of these claims. He knows the nature and extent of them—it was under his eye that they had their origin—the people concerned have confidence in him. He can do more in my opinion, towards a satisfactory adjustment of them than any other man. I will only say in conclusion, Mr. President, that the way in which the government will best consult its own interest, as well as its honor, is by the settlement of the claims before us, with no grudging and miserly hand, but with a well ordered and discreet liberality, and above all, with the promptness which the peculiar circumstances attending them imperatively demand.

Mr. BUTLER.—This is not a matter which admits of a compromise with inclination. Until I heard this discussion, I had no definite opinion on some of the provisions of this bill. My inclination had been to provide for the payment of the claims, because we had adopted the acts out of which they had grown, and have had the benefit of them. But under the constitution, we have no authority for making this appointment of an officer to settle the claims. The question is asked, is this an office? I will tell you what it is. It is authority to an individual to disburse $700,000; for the payment of what? For the payment of troops. What is he then? In any point of view, he is a paymaster. A paymaster of what? A paymaster of the troops of the United States? I do not mean troops originally employed by the United States, but of whose services the United States have availed themselves, the California battalion. He is neither more nor less than paymaster of the troops who have rendered services to the United States. But he is more than that. His office differs from that of paymaster of regular troops, by giving him greater power; for he is both auditor and a paymaster with discretionary power to decide the claims—his certificate signed by two others, is to be conclusive authority to pay—it must come to that, disguise it as you please. The honorable Senator from North Carolina has undertaken to quote several precedents; but, in my estimation, there is not one of them in point. It seems to me they do not support the case at all. I know there are cases that may be quoted, where Congress, as a legislative body, has assigned to the incumbent of an office already created, new duties. A pre-existing officer may have new duties assigned to him, and he is at liberty to take upon himself those new duties, or not as he pleases. In other instances, functions may be devolved on a recognized public officer, acting under the guaranties of a previous appointment, which he may discharge gratuitously, for the benefit of persons claiming the benefit of the benevolent act of the government—not as obligatory duties, but as gratuities. Where duties are assigned to judges that did not pertain to their office, they might decline to perform them as official duties, whilst they could well discharge such acts without official obligation, as acts of benevolence, for the benefit of individuals as well as for the convenience of the government. There is no one of the precedents that have been quoted, that does not come to this: that an officer may have new duties assigned him, or may perform gratuitous services of his own accord. Another class of cases has been quoted, involving the distinction between an officer and an employment; that distinction is sometimes very nice, and not easily recognized, whilst again it becomes palpable, and may be obviously observed. Take one of the instances referred to by the gentleman from North Carolina. Mr. Trumbull was employed to paint certain pictures for the rotundo of the Capitol. This was an employment referable to contract. It did not devolve upon him any such duties as constitute an office having the complexion of a public trust. It was a specific employment, and not an office like this, requiring discretion and judgment in the disbursement of public monies, under a salary. I could go on and demonstrate the distinction by numerous cases, if I were disposed to enter at large into the subject; but I deem it wholly unnecessary to detain the Senate. The case of the Pea Patch Island has been referred to; I believe the appointment of arbitrator in that case was made by the President.

Mr. MASON.—I believe that the act of Congress in relation to that case, merely requested and authorized the President to have the matter adjusted without indicating how it should be done. He proceeded to carry out the intention of Congress by employing Mr. Sargeant as arbitrator.

Mr. BUTLER.—I do not propose to enter into the argument. I simply stated my reasons generally for regarding this individual, Colonel Fremont, as an officer. He is certainly an officer for disbursing $700,000. If this be not so, I certainly do not know what he is.

Mr. RUSK.—The bill does not authorize him to make payments at all. After he shall have adjudicated the claims, they shall be paid, according to the terms of the act, by some officer of the government.

Mr. BUTLER.—The bill appropriates the money for payment of the claims; and they may be paid by the very officer who adjudicates them, and, in effect, they are paid on his certificate. He is a judicial paymaster, with judicial powers. I will not say that the Legislature might appoint as competent an officer as the President may, nor that Lieutenant Colonel Fremont would not be my choice. He is a gentleman of rare endowments, of rare abilities, and if the selection rested with me, he would be the very individual whom I would select. Let it not be supposed that my objection to the bill arises from any objection to the individual indicated. That is not the ground of my opposition at all; but it rests upon the isolated ground that I have intimated. I trust that the bill will be recommitted, and so amended that the President shall have the nomination of the commissioner.

Mr. RUSK.—I desire to ask the honorable Senator from South Carolina, before he concludes his remarks, to put his construction upon the decision of the Supreme Court, to which I referred.

Mr. BUTLER.—I understand that to be entirely different from the present case. The Solicitor of the Treasury was an officer already in office. You have superadded to his duties, it is true; and to this I do not object. I do not say that after you have appointed a judge you shall not superadd to his original duties the duties belonging to an appellate jurisdiction. I am satisfied of one thing, that this is an officer to disburse or adjudicate $700,000; and that the individual appointed will, to all intents and purposes, be the paymaster of officers and troops in California, instead of troops within the United States.

Mr. BENTON.—The reading of the bill, as to the duties of this officer, will show that there is a mistake on the part of the honorable Senator—that his whole argument has turned upon an entire misapprehension.

This bill has a discrimination between the officers who have the duties to perform of paying money, and the commissioners who have to adjudicate the claims. The one is a board, the other is an officer. The bill provides that the payment of these claims after they are ascertained by a board of commissioners shall be made by an officer, either duly appointed for the purpose or designated by the President. If there be an officer who can be spared from his ordinary duties, the President may direct him to make the payments; but if no one can be spared then one shall be appointed for the purpose. The bill is entirely different from what seems to be supposed by the honorable Senator from South Carolina. It contains an actual provision for the appointment of an officer by the President and Senate for the purpose of making these payments, if they do not find an officer who can be spared:

"Which certificates shall be forthwith paid in California by some officer duly appointed or designated for the purpose."

Thus you see the bill provides for the due appointment of an officer, if no one can be spared, but it leaves it entirely with the Executive government to say whether one can be spared. This shows that the objections of the honorable Senator from South Carolina have turned on a total misapprehension of the provisions of the bill. And when to this misapprehension is added what has been read and re-read by the Senator from Texas in the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, that are merely an officer existing have additional duties put upon him, but that any one may be named by Congress to perform a specific duty. Sir, there is a decision of the highest tribunal which is known to this country, which has been referred to by the Senator from North Carolina, in which the judges did not accept cumulatively the duties of arbitrators in their character of judges, but they took upon themselves the duties separately and distinctly, adjourning the court from day to day and taking care to lay aside their judicial character. The case of the Pea Patch Island has been referred to. It was a bill twice passed by the Senate to arbitrate the Pea Patch Island, and in one R. B. Taney and in the other H. Binney named as the commissioner.

This bill came from the Judiciary Committee; a committee presumed to know what the law is. Another bill in 1844 was introduced by a Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] and sent to the Judiciary Committee and reported without amendment. This shows the sense of that committee. The submission is, in one to Mr. Binny, in the other to Roger B. Taney, of Baltimore, in his private character, and not in his character as chief justice! So that these two cases, in addition to those already presented, are to my mind as conclusive as any thing can be that there is full power in Congress to make the appointment. I apprehend, sir, that either the judicial decisions which have been read by the Senator from North Carolina and by the Senator from Texas, and these two cases from our own bills that have been shown here there is nothing further to be said on the point of power.

Now, the question is upon a proposition to recommit this bill, with instructions, and the instructions go to leave out the mass of the claims to be provided for, to leave out all that have been ascertained and adjusted—to leave out all those which are now in this city for payment, and to carry all back to California for settlement there. The bill as drawn, discriminates between those claims, the amount of which has been fixed and allowed and these which are uncertain; and it provides for the immediate payment of the ascertained claims, and for paying the unsettled ones at the proper place, to wit, in California, so as to prevent them from coming into the hands of speculators and agents. The board is only to act on the unascertained claims. The bill provides for paying the expenses of the civil government established by Commodore Stockton, and to pay all just claims arising out of the military operations in California, but the recommitment cuts of all the expenses of the civil government. We know perfectly well that a portion of the navy was directed to proceed to the coast of California to take possession of the country and establish a temporary civil government. The instructions, as drawn up by the Senator from Virginia, cut off the whole of this class of claims. The expenses of the civil government are cut off, although that government was established under the precise instructions of the President of the United States. The instructions also cut off, as I said before, all the claims which have been liquidated, the amount of which is evidenced by a proper instrument from Commodore Stockton or Lt. Col. Fremont. They cut off also the claims that are payable upon evidence of muster rolls, and also upon authenticated discharges of soldiers. The bill is for the payment of classes of claims, some ascertained; some not; many of those ascertained are now waiting in this city for payment. According to these instructions drawn up by the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. MASON,] they must all go back to California and have their claims examined over again. The instructions go to cut off four classes of ascertained claims, and to send the claimants back three thousand miles to the other side of the continent to have their claims again examined. Lt. Col. Fremont, as Governor of California, drew bills for the payment of the expenses of the civil government. These bills came here, were protested for non-payment, and are now standing against him.

In speaking of that part of the claims which have accrued without the positive authority of the government of the United States, the Senator from Texas has very properly told you that they are only a fraction of the whole amount. They are the claims which accrued in about thirty days, in the beginning of the military operations, during the time when the independent or grisly bear flag was raised—when there were perhaps not three hundred men engaged. It was in the beginning of June that this flag was hoisted. In the beginning of July, Fremont and those with him joined Commodore Sloat, and took the flag of the United States, and soon after went under Commodore Stockton as commander-in-chief. From that time they were acting under the authority of the United States, and it was after that period that the great mass of the claims originated. Only a fraction of them accrued before. I think that by the time we meet again, I shall be able to submit a proviso limiting the unauthorized part of the expenditures and bringing them down to perhaps one-twentieth part of what the bill contains.

Now after having shown that the instructions which have been submitted, go to change the whole character of the bill, and cut off four different classes of the claims and send them back to California—cutting off too the whole expenses of the civil government, cutting off the bills now in this town drawn by Fremont and protested, cutting off payments as discharges muster rolls—after all this, I have to say is, that if the instructions prevail I shall vote against the bill. It was in the month of October last, that Fremont brought this subject before the Secretary of War, and brought to his attention the different classes of claims. One was for the payment of volunteers. His answer was that the case required special legislation. But, sir, it is difficult for me to conceive why it should require special legislation when the naval officers were specifically commanded to establish a temporary government there—when they were peremptorily told that they were expected not only to conquer the country, but to hold it, and to establish a temporary civil government. Was this government to live upon air? Was it to have no support? Does not the order to establish the government carry along with it the right to support it. Sir, I admit no want of authority in the drawing of these bills. We admit that Col. Fremont acted without authority in taking up arms to defend the men, women, and children, whose lives were menaced, not only with the destruction of their fields by fire, but with the horrors of an Indian war. We admit that for about thirty days, he acted without authority from the government, and we own and declare that he made it apparent to the world that he did so by putting up, not the flag of the United States, but an independent flag. He declared that it was not the power of the United States, but a new power, and that very act absolved the United States from it. As soon as it was found that the United States and Mexico were at war, that flag was pulled down, and Fremont and his men passed under the command of Commodore Stockton; not in co-operation with Commodore Stockton, but in subordination to him, upon a written agreement to serve under his brders. That engagement was religiously kept. From that time forth, we admit no want of power, no want of authority. From that time forth we declare there was full authority to do everything that was done, yet the whole mass almost of the claims that are here, arose after that time, and in the pursuance of that for which they had full authority, to carry on hostilities, and to establish, and maintain a temporary civil government. When gentlemen again speak on the subject, and suppose that Fremont incurred several hundred thousand dollars expense without authority, I must beg then to go back to the point to which the Senator from Texas conducted them to day. For a period of thirty days we admit there was no authority. Fremont did an act for which he had no authority; but I will undertake to say, that if General Jackson were alive, he would not be ashamed of such an incident in his life. He would say—"Write it down. I take the responsibility. I saved my countrymen, men, women, and children from the tomahawk of the savage. Write it all down." When Fremont wrote me an account of it from California, he sent me at the same time a blank to send in his resignation if there was any disapprobation of what he had done. To a man of honor and patriotism there are obligations infinitely higher than any that a commission imposes, and in discharge of which commissions will be despised. This was, then, Fremont's case. He saw that his fellow-countrymen were in danger; he acted under a sense of great responsibility, of agonizing responsibility, but in obedience to the dictates of his conscience, and ready and willing to risk a responsibility above that of a military commission—the moral sense of his countrymen! And it has justified what was done. Far from wishing to throw upon the administration, either as individuals or as a government, the responsibility of the act from which the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. MASON,] took so much pains to free them, Mr. Fremont requested, in his late trial, that he might be put upon trial before the court martial for taking up arms without authority of the government. He asked, and in writing, to have that act included in the charges made against him—that there might appear on the record judicially, and forever, an exemption of the government from any responsibility of that act.

Now, what is the motion? To recommit the bill! For what purpose? That the committee may exercise some discretion when they come together; that they may assemble for the purpose of considering the matter, and devising an appropriate remedy? No, sir! the instruction is peremptory. It is an order to the committee to assemble in their committee room, and transcribe the words given to them. It is to make the committee the amanuensis of the gentleman! The committee is to be assembled, not for the purpose of thinking and determining, but for the purpose of transcribing the words that are given to them. Why, the motion is properly the subject of an amendment to be made at your table. It is a proper one for the vote of the Senate, without putting the committee to the trouble of assembling and transcribing it. The whole object may be accomplished if the Senate favors his motion, by leaving out the words in lines 10 and 11 of section 2 from the words "consisting of," to the word "officers." The recommitment would be useless, for the Senate can, if it please, make the amendment itself, and without trouble to the committee, and the delay it would occasion. It would be pernicious, for it would cut off the ascertained claims from payment at once, and send them three thousand miles, to be ascertained over again before paid. It proceeds upon a mistake—that the whole $700,000 was incurred by Mr. Fremont without authority, when only a fraction of that amount, say the one-twentieth part, was so incurred, all the rest being incurred under the command of Commodore Stockton, acting with the authority and approbation of the government. And for this small amount done without authority the government has received and retained all the fruits. It received all the benefit of the whole movement for independence, and it is right, and high time, after almost two years, that it should pay the expenses of it.

Mr. PHELPS.—It appears to me that in any view that can be taken of the subject, the bill requires amendments. The Senator will pardon me for saying that it is neither "fish, flesh nor fowl." It has no precedent anywhere. It appears to me, that this office which is to be created, is an office within the provisions of the constitution. It is a judicial office; for by the terms of the bill, the decision of this board of commissioners is to be final. It is impossible for me to distinguish between the duty conferred by this bill, and the duty conferred upon a vast variety of officers discharging similar duty, whose appointments are required to be made by the President with the concurrence of the Senate. The case of the Pea Patch Island was a mere matter of arbitration. It was a selection of an arbitrator by the parties; because the appointment by the President could have had no validity at all, except by the concurrence of the parties. The act giving the President power to appoint, was nothing more nor less than declaring the assent of Congress. Such cases have no sort of analogy with the present, nor does the authority cited by the Senator, seem to have any direct bearing upon this case. A claim against the Post Office Department, or rather against the government, was directed to be examined by the Solicitor of the Treasury, and officers known to the treasury. He made his award. The Postmaster General attempted to overrule his decision, and the question was raised whether it was consistent for the Postmaster General to reverse the decision of the Solicitor of the Treasury. The decision was, and very properly I think, that inasmuch as Congress had submitted the question to the Solicitor of the Treasury, whose determination should be final, the Postmaster General had no control over it. But it is perfectly obvious, that this is not a question respecting the legality of appointment. The only question was whether by any law, the decision of the Solicitor could be re-examined. I have no hesitation in saying, that Congress when they passed the act in 1792, intended to confer the power upon the board as such, but when the court came to consider it, they came to the decision that it was not intended to confer the power as a legal power. What then? Why if they give effect to the power at all, they must treat it as a power conferred upon them individually, and take the expression to be a mere designation of parties. Was there any question there like the present? Did the court undertake to discuss the question, whether Congress had the power to appoint an officer without consulting the President? Sir, the difficulty in all these precedents is, that the question was not before the court.

The bill was then passed over informally.

On motion

The Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY, APRIL 14, 1848.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The following message was received from the President of the United States by Mr. WALKER, his Secretary:

To the Senate of the United States:

In answer to the resolution of the Senate of the 28th of March, 1848, I communicate herewith a report of the Secretary of War, transmitting a report of the Head of the Ordnance Bureau, with the accompanying papers, relative to "the repeating fire arms invented by Samuel Colt."

Such is the favorable opinion entertained of the value of these arms, particularly for mounted corps, that the Secretary of War, as will be seen by the report transmitted with Mr. Colt for two thousand of his pistols. He has offered to contract for an additional number at liberal prices, but the inventor is unwilling to furnish them at the prices offered.

The invention for the construction of these arms being patented, the United States cannot manufacture them at the government armories, without a previous purchase of the right to do so. The right to use his patent, by the United States, the inventor is unwilling to dispose of at a price deemed reasonable.

JAMES K. POLK.

RESCINDING OF A RESOLUTION.

Mr. BAGBY moved to rescind the resolution submitted by him some time since, and agreed to, directing the Secretary of War to communicate the proceedings of Messrs. Eaton and Hubley, commissioners under the Cherokee treaty, stating that he had ascertained in a private conversation with the Secretary of War, that the information he desired could be better obtained in a different way, and that he wished to relieve the Secretary from the appearance of disregarding an order of the Senate.

The motion to rescind the resolution was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

On motion, it was

Ordered, That when the Senate adjourn, it be to Monday next.

THE DAM AT CUMBERLAND ISLAND.

On motion by Mr. BELL, the prior orders were postponed, and the bill to provide for the repair and improvement of the dam at the head of Cumberland island, in the Ohio river, was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

No amendment being made the bill was reported to the Senate.

The question being on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. BAGBY.—I have but a word to say on the subject of this bill, and would not have said that word, but for the determination I had formed in my own mind to resist the system of internal improvement by the general government, whenever and wherever it is intended to be applied. With entire respect to the feelings of those who advocate this bill, I must be permitted to say that no case can be presented showing more clearly, not only the impolicy, but the enormity of the system. The bill now under consideration is simply this, that inasmuch as one hundred and fifty-five thousand dollars have heretofore been appropriated and expended for the improvement of the Cumberland river, and inasmuch as such appropriation has been ineffectual, or has been rendered so by the natural decay produced by time, therefore, the goverment must appropriate fifty thousand dollars more.

Mr. BELL.—I presume the gentleman was not present when I made some observations on this subject, a few days ago. It is not to benefit the Cumberland river alone, except as one of the tributaries of the Ohio. It is more important to the navigation of the Ohio above that point, as well as to the communication between the Ohio and all its tributaries and the Mississippi. The interest of the Cumberland river is not a tithe of the interests included.

Mr. BAGBY.—Well, sir, when I get down the Cumberland river, I will get into the Ohio. I start where the appropriation commences, and I find that a hundred and fifty-five thousand dollars have been appropriated and expended in the States of Kentucky and Tennessee, in the improvement of the Cumberland river. That river, as the honorable Senator very correctly says, is but a tributary of the Ohio. But the principle is precisely the same, and involves the question by what authority, by what grant of power does this government derive its rights to improve any river. Indeed, if commentary were necessary on the impolicy of measures of this kind, it never could be more clearly illustrated than by the bill now under consideration. The interests involved according to the honorable Senator, are but a tithe of the whole navigating interests of the Ohio, and yet a hundred and fifty-five thousand dollars have been already appropriated, and the safe navigation of that river has not been completed. It amounts to this, as fast as you ascertain that your appropriations have been improvidently made, or as fast as your improvements yield to the touch of time, you are called on to renew them. This is entirely adverse not only to the principles of the constitution, but to the law of nature itself. There are wide and narrow, deep and shallow places, and according to natural laws, if you remove a shoal at one place to-day, you create a shoal at another place to-morrow; and with the same propriety that you ask an appropriation to remove the first, you may ask one to remove the second. I have been struck with another view which some of my respected friends take upon questions of this kind, and it is this, that it is not the policy or the duty of those who contest these measures on principle to contest minor appropriations, but that they should wait for the greater and more important measure. Do not gentlemen see if we permit ourselves to be defeated day after day detachments, when the great battle comes to be fought, we shall be entirely destitute of power? The question must be met at the threshold. No great and important revolution was ever the result of open and glaring encroachments on the rights of the people. The glorious revolution which resulted in the establishment of the independence of the United States, was not brought about by an open, glaring, and direct assault upon the rights and liberties of the people. It exhibited itself in the insidious form of a three penny tax upon tea. But the patriots of the revolution detected in it, the serpent sting of injustice and oppression, and nobly resolved to resist it. So of the revolution of 1668, the next in importance upon the liberties and the political destinies of mankind to our own. That crafty and unprincipled monarch of the House of Stewart did not dare to make a direct and open assault upon the fragment of liberty enjoyed by the people of England. But the immortal Hampden and his illustrious compatriots saw in the levy of one shilling upon ship money, the chains that were preparing for them and their posterity, and nobly resolved to resist. They looked to the principle involved, and so must we.

This view of the case was forcibly presented by a Senator from Louisiana on a former day. He thought it did not accord with the dignity of the Senate to contest the principle upon the proposition for granting a small slip of land; but gentlemen must see that the principle is the same, whether you apply it to a small stream or the father of rivers itself—to a small strip of land or to the whole valley of the Mississippi. I do not hope to make converts to the doctrine which I hold in regard to this system of internal improvement, and I greatly fear that gentlemen will give way so often to those interests that are pressed upon us from different quarters that when the great day of battle comes, there will but few be found occupying the ground on which Mr. Jefferson placed himself in 1825. That remarkable man said in relation to this very subject, that once let in this doctrine of implied constitutional powers upon the subject of internal improvement, and "you enter a boundless field no longer susceptible of limit or definition."

Believing, as I conscieniously do, that the principle upon which this bill rests has no foundation in the constitution, I shall give my vote against it, and shall continue to oppose every measure of a similar character, while I have a vote to give, or a voice to raise in this chamber.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—I am satisfied that there is no hope of shaking the opinions of my honorable friend, the Senator from Alabama upon this subject. His mind is distinctly made up. I could be perfectly satisfied not to say a word if I could hope that the attention of the Senate would be drawn to the subject. If there can be any exception from the strict principles advocated by the Senator from Alabama, it seemed to me that this case will constitute that exception. The obstruction to be removed here, is one that has been created by the act of the general government itself. One of its improvements imperfectly made, has given away in such a manner, as to form an almost impassable obstacle in some stages of the water, to the navigation of the Ohio. You have passed an appropriation at this very session to remove an obstruction from the Savannah river, and it has seemed to me, and I did hope, on a former day, when this was the subject of some conversation, that Congress would not consider this case as coming within the general ground of objection to measures for internal improvement by the general government. The object is to remove a particular obstruction, which the government itself has created within the river. If an individual had created such an obstruction the law of the land would compel him as a civil duty to remove it. Should not the general government be permitted to do that which on a general construction of the law an individual would be constrained to do? If the attention of the Senate only, can be drawn to this question, we are content to abide by its judgment without any debate or argument. We do not wish to occupy unnecessarily the time of the Senate. We do not wish to draw into argument or controversy at all, the constitutional principles upon which the Senator rests his objection to measures of internal improvement by the general government; but to submit this case to the Senate as a peculiar case, governed by peculiar circumstances. For myself, I have none of those scruples or doubts on the subject of constitutional power, which the Senator from Alabama seems to entertain; but setting that aside, it seems to me that they do not necessarily enter into our consideration in this particular instance. Who should remove this obstruction? Whose duty is it? Is it the duty of the State of Kentucky? Or of the State of Indiana? Is it the business of the counties on the one side of the river or the other? Who should remove it? If it is not our duty, I should like to know whose duty it is. Is it the duty of the navigator to do it—to stop his boat, rest on his oars, and wait there until he can remove it? How is it to be got rid of? It is a very great river in point of commerce—a very great river. From fifty to a hundred millions of dollars perhaps, is not more than the value of the commerce that passes up and down at this very place, in the course of a year. Sir, I do not intend to occupy the time of the Senate; my object is to end debate; rather to state than argue the question, and invite the attention of the Senate to it; and we shall be content when the case is understood, to abide by whatever judgment the Senate may pronounce.

The question on the engrossment of the bill was then put, and it was Ordered, That the bill be engrossed and read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time, by unanimous consent.

On the question "shall this bill pass?

Mr. BAGBY demanded the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. CALHOUN.—As the yeas and nays have been ordered, I desire, before the question is put, to say a few words. If I understand this case aright, there is an island in the Ohio, a little above the mouth of the Cumberland, dividing the river into two parts, and rendering the navigation difficult; and in order to improve it, a dam was thrown across from the Kentucky side to the island, and by the recent freshets this dam has been destroyed.—Now, although I hold to the doctrine of strict construction, I have not the slightest doubt of the right and the duty of the government to repair this dam, or to remove the obstruction. It is the channel of one of the great navigable rivers which belong to no particular State, but which serves as a highway in which many States are interested; and if it be not done by the general government, it can be done by no power whatever. The States are positively prohibited from entering into a work like this. If the general government cannot do it, it is clear that neither Kentucky nor Indiana will make this improvement; for there is a positive provision in the constitution which prevents them from doing it. Under these circumstances, I hold it to be as clearly the right of the general government, under the provision in the constitution which gives the power to regulate commerce among the States, as it is to repair light-houses or to replace buoys that have been destroyed; and that the objection of the Senator from Alabama is as applicable to the one as the other. I shall give my vote most cheerfully for this bill.

Mr. BAGBY.—I do not understand that Congress is authorized to do everything that the States are not authorized to do, or that the States cannot do.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I did not say that. I say that the right exists under the provision of the constitution which gives to this government the power to regulate commerce among the States.

Mr. BAGBY.—I understood the Senator to say that; I understood him also to inquire if this thing could not be done by the States, how was it to be done. Well, I reply, that supposing it cannot be done at all, still that is no answer to the objection. This government is not authorized to do all that cannot be done by the States, but only that which it is authorized by the constitution to do. This is the great line of difference between the honorable Senator from South Carolina and myself on this subject. With respect to the power to regulate commerce which seems to be connected with the consideration of this bill, it has ever appeared to me, that that was the most untenable ground upon which this system of internal improvement could be rested. The power to regulate commerce is only a power to interfere with something already going on, but in this matter of rendering a river navigable which was not so before, you are not regulating a pre-existing thing. The distinction is as clear as daylight between creating originally, and regulating a thing after it exists. One is a substantive power, the other a mere regulation. I shall not go into this question now, however, but shall avail myself of the occasion when some of those important measures, which gentlemen seem to have in view, come before us to give my views, and to place some limitation if possible on this most alarming power, the power to regulate commerce.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I by no means rest this case on the fact that, because the States have not the power, therefore, the general government has it. I place it on the fact, that the general government has the power to regulate commerce among the States; and that this is a case, which comes within that power. In confirmation of this conclusion, I stated, that the constitution prohibited the States from entering into any treaty or agreement, by which those in the great valley of the Mississippi, could unite and enter into an arrangement, by which the obstructions in that great river and its navigable branches could be removed. I also stated, that they were common high ways for all those States, and not within the exclusive control of any one, as far as their navigation was concerned, and that it would be monstrous to conclude, that a stream, on which we had as much, or nearly as much commerce, as on the ocean itself, was intended to be left by the constitution, without any power to supervise and improve its navigation. In reply the Senator says, that this government has the right to regulate the commerce already in existence and to create new channels for commerce. That may be admitted, without weakening my argument. The river itself forms the channels, and the commerce existed before the government undertook to improve its navigation, just as in the case of the commerce on the ocean. Now I put it to the Senator, has not this government the right to establish light-houses, buoys, and beacons, under the power of regulating commerce? If so, I ask him to point out the distinction, and show on what principle it can exercise the power in the one case, and not the other. The river, as well as the ocean, is the common high way of the commerce among the States, and its navigation is no more under the control of the States, separately, than that on the ocean. No just distinction can be made between the two cases, and the argument, which can establish the rights of the government to improve the navigation of the one, is equally strong to establish the right to improve the other. Both will have to be abandoned, or both admitted. To make the case, if possible, more parallel and close, I ask the Senator, if the government has not the right to establish light-houses, buoys and beacons, over the lakes?

Mr. BAGBY.—Certainly—wherever your navy floats.

Mr. CALHOUN.—Then suppose a light-house is necessary to the navigation of the Mississippi, can you not erect one? Now, suppose instead of erecting a light-house you guard against the obstruction in some other way, would you not have an equal right to do it in such a way as would be attended with the least expense?

Mr. BAGBY.—I had not the least expectation or desire to enter into a contest with the distinguished Senator from South Carolina. I am happy to agree with him in many things, but this is one of the cases where a point of disagreement necessarily arises. The question has been put, whether I admit the power of the government to erect buoys and light-houses? I do, undoubtedly, to the fullest extent. But instead of deriving it from the power to regulate commerce, I derive it from the express power conferred upon this government by the constitution, to provide and maintain a navy. Light-houses and buoys are as necessary for the preservation of the navy as mechanics are for its construction. I do not understand the erection of light-houses and buoys to be a commercial regulation at all; but for the preservation of the navy, wherever erected, whether upon an inland-sea, or the Mississippi; wherever your navy floats, the erection of a light-house is not a matter for the regulation of commerce, but is a matter indispensably necessary for maintaining the navy.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—If the existence of government vessels, and the right to preserve them will justify the removal of this obstruction, I can inform the gentleman of a fact, which no doubt he has heard of, that several government vessels have been taken up the river, and are now employed in the service of the government.

Mr. CALHOUN.—One word if the Senator will allow me. There is a naval station in the Mississippi at Memphis, which is important to the government; but what is more, this system of erecting light-houses, buoys, &c., was established before there was a single government vessel. It must then have been regarded as coming under the head of the power to regulate commerce.

Mr. BAGBY.—I want to ask one question of the Senator from Kentucky. This work I understand was constructed by the government. Was it done upon its voluntary motion or upon application of those interested in the navigation of the river?

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—I know of no other application to the government than that made in the ordinary way by the representatives of the States in this body.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi.—Entertaining views similar to those which have been expressed by the Senator from Alabama, viewing the whole system of internal improvement by the federal government, as an assumption of power not conferred by the constitution, and believing that if the power were possessed, the experience we have had shows that its exercise would be inexpedient and demoralizing, I think it necessary to explain why I shall vote for this bill, and to show what peculiarity there is in the case which constitutes it an exception to the general rule. The appropriation is not, as the Senator from Alabama seems to think, to remove a bar in the Cumberland river but it is to repair a dam which the federal government constructed in the Ohio river. For the purpose of improving the navigation of the Ohio, and the passage from the Cumberland into the Ohio river, a dam was built from the "Cumberland Island" to the Illinois shore, which forced the water of the Ohio river into the channel on the Kentucky side, which was by nature the inferior channel of the two; but which was no doubt selected because an incidental improvement would thus be made at the mouth of the Cumberland river. This dam has given way, the artificial advantage to the smaller channel is lost, and the larger one is obstructed by the remains of the work which the federal government erected. The natural navigation being thus impaired, those who are interested in it have a right to expect of this government that it will remove the impediment; at least restore them to their natural advantages. The broken dam is a nuisance, an injury to vast interests, private and public, and having been introduced by this government I hold we are bound to abate it. The practical question is, how can it be most efficiently and economically done? According to the best information in my possession, it will cost less of time and of money, to repair the dam than to remove the debris. Large masses of stone which have imbedded themselves in the sand, could only be removed by immense labor, to be performed only at the lowest stage of water. To remove the dam would, therefore, require that we should wait until after the present favorable season for navigation had passed by, and the injury done by the obstacle during this period would greatly exceed the expense of repair. As a measure of justice and of economy, I shall vote for an appropriation to repair the dam; and thus, at as early a day as possible, to restore the navigation to a condition which I hope will equal, if it does not exceed its natural advantages.

In arriving at this conclusion, my reflections have not brought me to the position of the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN.] If I were compelled to rely on the power "to regulate commerce" as a justification for this appropriation, my adherence to the doctrine of literal interpretation of the terms of the constitution would compel me to vote against this bill, intimately connected as it is with the interests of the great valley of which I represent a part. To regulate is to make rules, not to provide means. The power was given by the States to the federal government, as part of the great purpose, the establishment of a more perfect union, and the promotion of domestic tranquility. The common agent was entrusted with this power, because it could only be used by the States as sovereigns making treaties with each other, and because its exercise was probably to be a detriment to the commercial interests of our political family, and a cause of dissension among us. The same clause which conveyed this power in regard to the commerce of the States, gave it also in relation to foreign nations and Indian tribes. If the construction were admitted that the power to regulate commerce, carries with it the right to improve the channels through which it is transmitted, there would be no limit to our appropriations within the most remote port which our merchantmen visit, or the least known Indian tribe with whom our fur traders hold intercourse.

Any rule which could be laid down as a limit to the extent which the federal government may constitutionally go in works of improvement, must be found in practice defective, and liable, in the progress of legislation, to be lost sight of unless that rule has within it its own limitation. It might, with great fairness, be urged that the federal government is bound, as one who uses the public highways, to contribute its proportion of the labor necessary to keep them in repair; and if this were an occasion proper to the discussion of the general subject, it might easily be shown that both historically and practically the Ohio river is emphatically a national highway, and entitled as such to all which the federal government has a right to bestow. If appropriations to rivers and harbors were limited to the amount collected by charges imposed upon their commerce we should have a guide and a check to expenditures on their improvement. On our great western rivers, so often selected as the foundation of an argument, a very light tonnage duty would suffice to make all the improvements which have been, or ever will be, required for their successful navigation. The general application of such a rule would impose the burden upon those who receive the benefit of improvements; our legislation would be freed from alliances which corrupt it at the fountain, and overburden the national treasury by appropriations for local objects.

Whilst I agree with the Senator from Alabama in the general principles which he has stated, I disagree with the view which he has taken of the particular case. To tap a stream, or to remove a natural dam, are among the most difficult problems of civil engineering, and admitted to be attended by all the dangers which the Senator has indicated; but to improve the bed of a stream—to increase without radically changing the natural advantages of a national highway, are cases widely differing from those put by the Senator, whether they be viewed as questions of engineering, or of constitutional construction. The cases put by the Senator endanger the natural navigation by drawing off the original pools; or by leaving the highway common to the States, and entering with a canal the territory of a particular State, invade its sovereignty over the soil. These are objections which do not apply to the question before us, if it were presented for original decision; instead of being as it is, a proposition to remedy an evil which the former action of the general government has inflicted.

The Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) offers the practice of erecting light-houses and buoys in the harbors on our sea coast, as an argument for the existence of the power to improve the channels of interior commerce. With great deference to the acknowledged ability of that Senator, I differ entirely from his conclusion, and deny the analogy upon which he insists. The erection of light-houses upon our maritime coast, and the placing of buoys to mark the entrance into our harbors, are mainly referable to the power to maintain a navy, and provide for the common defence; though I will admit that the construction of light-houses and buoys may also be drawn from the power to regulate commerce, and for like reasons as apply to the construction of docks, ways, and warehouses. For convenience and security in the collection of imposts, we require goods imported into the country to be laid down at particular places; thence arises an obligation to facilitate the entrance of vessels to the places so designated, and facility and security being the common benefit of the parties, tonnage duties and port charges are imposed, and serve to create the means for harbor improvements. Surely this cannot be considered parallel to the improvement of the route over which the commerce is to pass.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts.—How does that agree with the provision of the constitution which gives power to the general government to regulate commerce among the States?

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi.—The power to prescribe the rules for commerce among the States was surrendered to the general government, the States were thenceforward deprived of the power to impose restrictions or levy duties upon the commerce of each other, and the federal government received that power under limitations which mark the purpose of those who gave it. Our constitution was to bring the States nearer to each other, and this power, transferred to the general government, it was foreseen would be the fruitful cause of jealousy and strife; the barriers then opposed by some States to the commerce of others were swept away by the compact of union, and no foundation was left upon which they could be rebuilt. All had been done which constitutions can achieve, to give to the people of the United States one commerce and interest. The constitution of these United States is a monument to free trade, and the various clauses in it bearing upon this power to "regulate commerce among the States," show that it was not to give activity to the exercise of it, but to restrain the States, that it was conferred upon the federal government. It was not my purpose to enter into the discussion of the great principles which have been alluded to, but only to point out some of the peculiarities of the case under consideration, which, in my opinion, make it an exception to the general rule, and, therefore, free it from objections which might generally obtain.

Mr. CALHOUN.—As the Senator from Mississippi thought proper to attack the ground on which I rest my support of this bill, while he concurs with me in supporting it, I feel called on briefly to reply to his argument. He says the power to regulate commerce is restricted to the power to prescribe rules, and does not include the power to provide means for its safety and facility. And yet, while he takes this position, he admits the power of Congress to establish light-houses, buoys, and beacons, to point the way into harbors where duties are collected; and thus admits, to that extent, that the power of prescribing rules, includes the power of providing for the safety and facility of commerce. And he thereby admits it to rest on the power to establish ports of entries, and collection of duties. This admission concedes the whole right for which I contend, but places it on grounds far less safe and well-defined. The establishment of ports of entry, and collection of duties, are not confined to the seaboard. They extend on the Mississippi far up the stream, as high as St. Louis and Cincinnati; and on his own showing, Congress has the power, under the regulation of commerce to provide for its safety and facility up to these points, by removing the obstructions in the channel of the river, which might endanger or impede its navigation. He will not, I feel confident, make a distinction between pointing out the danger, and removing the cause of it—between the power of establishing a light house to point out snags and sawyers at night, and removing them. Nor can it be objected that the Mississippi is not navigable for sea-going vessels. Under the power of steam, it is navigated with almost the same facility that it would be, if, instead of a river, it was an arm of the ocean; while its great depth and volume of water admit vessels of as great a tonnage as most of the ports on the coast. Nor is it a sufficient objection to say that its navigation subjects it to great delay, in consequence of low water, or ice. Vessels are often delayed in consequence of adverse winds, or calms, off the ports on the coast; but that is not a good reason why they should not be made ports of entry, and have the entrance into them pointed out by light houses, buoys, and beacons. If it were, the harbor at the mouth of Columbia river would forever remain without these facilities; for vessels have been known to lie before it for months, before they could enter; and when they did, they entered with great hazard.

I do wish to be understood in my remarks to give my countenance to the ground on which the Senator places the power. I regard it as utterly untenable and dangerous, as it would enable Congress to give any extension it pleased to the power. I pass without notice the other grounds on which he places the power "to provide and maintain a navy," as I have already replied to it in answer to the Senator from Alabama.

As to internal improvement—that is improvement within a State, I am as much opposed to the exercise of the power by this government, as either the Senator from Mississippi or Alabama can be. I limit the power for which I contend, to the great highways —common to all the States, and, of course, under the control and supervision of no one—to their exterior intercourse with each other, and not to the internal intercourse, within their separate supervision and control. I feel assured that the ground on which I rest the power, is the only one on which effectual resistance can be made to internal improvements, properly understood. To undertake to give a construction to the power which would include the sea-coast, and exclude its affiux to the Mississippi and the Lakes, must end either in the entire abandonment of the power to establish light houses, buoys, and beacons, or to give unlimited extension to the power of Congress, to regulate commerce both within and without the States.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi.—The Senator from South Carolina has misconstrued the admission made by me as to the right to erect light-houses and buoys. In addition to that which was referable to the navy power, I said there also existed a power incident to the regulation of commerce, to construct light-houses and buoys where necessary to the safety of those on whom our regulations were imposed By making it a consequence of the laws which require imported goods to be landed at particular places, it was sufficiently indicated that the works should be connected with the places thus prescribed. The reference to the tonnage duties and port charges, as laid in consideration of the harbor facilities furnished, certainly exhibited with sufficient clearness the extent of my admission. I believe it was originally the practice to limit appropriations for a harbor, to the amount of port and tonnage duties collected at it. I wish the rule were now in force. No admission has been made by me which can be fairly construed as recognizing the right to expend means drawn from the national treasury upon harbors which have no navigable commerce, and which therefore supply no funds to the government. Least of all can any thing advanced by me be tortured into an admission of the right to go abroad, from the place for which the regulation is made, to create a commerce upon which the regulation shall operate.

The Senator selects landings on the upper Mississippi and Ohio and asks if these are not ports of entry, and if vessels cannot go up to them from the sea. For the latter question I will refer him to his recollections of the trip he made from Memphis, after the celebrated convention held at that place, and then inform him that he was in a very deep river when compared to those he would have passed over, if he had ascended to the ports of entry he has named.

The Senator is certainly aware, that the places named by him as ports of entry, have no foreign commerce brought to them in sea vessels; and if they had he could only apply my admission to the landing place, which would not in the least aid his purpose, or their commerce. It will be long before I admit as an incident to laws prescribing the rules for commerce, that the federal government can create channels through which commerce may flow; or that an act of Congress can make the entrance to a harbor, equal the distance from the sea to the landing for river boats on the head branches of our longest rivers.

If to declare by law a landing on some interior river to be a port of entry, can confer the power to remove all obstructions between that landing and the sea, what limit have we to the burdens which may be imposed upon the industry of the country, to support the visionary or corrupt schemes which theory or selfishness may devise? If under the power to make rules, to enact laws, for the government of commerce, we have the right to appropriate money to provide for it, channels of transportation, who shall discriminate between rivers, and creeks, and canals, and railroads; or who can say that from channels it may not be extended to vehicles for conveyance? So far as we may constitutionally improve our national high-ways, it must be for other purpose than the promotion of commerce; and the power must be drawn elsewhere than from the right to regulate it. The transportation of troops, of supplies, and munitions of war, the transfer of public monies, the proper discharge of the civil functions, and military duties of the federal government, may require the improvement of public high-ways; and under the war power, and the duty to provide for the common defence, it may as far as is necessary be done. This is a necessity which the settlement of our territory removes, it has limitations, both of time and of purpose; not so with improvements for commerce, which will increase with increasing population, and has its application to every town, and village of the Union. The interest of those whom I represent, my own conviction, and feelings unite in resistance to a construction than which none was ever adopted more latitudinous in its nature, or tending to move flagrant abuse. I have admitted that at a place where imposts are collected, where tonnage duties are paid, where imports are required to be landed, that an obligation is imposed to point out the safe approach to the place so designated; the mere declaration that a certain place shall be a port of entry does not fulfil any of the conditions, and if they were all fulfilled, no application could be made of my admission to the route over which the vessel had passed in its voyage.

Mr. CALHOUN.—When the wind is adverse the vessel may lay off for weeks without being able to enter a harbor Buoys and beacons are necessary to point the way into harbors, and therefore they come under the regulation of commerce; and if we can provide these facilities on the sea coast, on what principle is it that we are prohibited from providing facilities on our great navigable rivers? Sir, I hold it to be as clear a power as any in the constitution, demonstrably so, from the meaning which the phrase to regulate commerce had before the adoption of the constitution. I have examined this subject with great care, and I have never examined any question upon which I have come to so decided a conclusion. Sir, it is monstrous to say that where the interests of so many States are concerned, we shall not exercise a power which is so clearly defined. How far it will extend to the smaller rivers I will not undertake to say, but as far as regards the Mississippi and the Ohio, the only result of setting up a narrow construction will be to make the power universal. You must give it the exercise it was intended to have originally or there will be no limitation upon it whatever.

The yeas and nays were then taken on the passage of the bill, and it was determined in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Ashley, Atchison, Badger, Bell, Benton, Berrien, Boorse, Bright, Calhoun, Cameron, Clarke, Corwin, Crittenden, Dana, of Massachusetts, Davis, of Mississippi, Dickinson, Dix, Downs, Felch, Foote, Greene, Hannegan, Mangum, Miller, Niles, Pearce, Phelps, Sevier, Underwood, Upham—31.

So it was,

A bill supplementary to an act to authorize the Secretary of State to liquidate certain claims therein mentioned, passed April 18, 1814.

Ordered, That they be engrossed and read a third time.

Said bills and joint resolution were read a third time, by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That they pass; and that the respective titles be as aforesaid.

Ordered. That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives in said bills and joint resolution.

The bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Captain Jesse D. Elliott was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and no amendment being made it was reported to the Senate.

The question being on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time—

Mr. HALE.—I am utterly opposed to the passage of this bill or of any thing like it. You are paying the officers of your navy higher salaries than officers of the same grade receive in any country on the face of the earth; and it is for the very purpose of enabling them to defray such extraordinary expenses as they may be subjected to by giving entertainments, and exchanging civilities with persons connected with governments abroad, that you give them those high salaries.

Mr. CAMERON.—The sum proposed by this bill to be granted to the heirs of Commodore Elliot, is but a small part of what was expended by him. It is well known that the purpose for which he was sent to the Mediterranean, was not an ordinary one. He was sent there for the purpose of exhibiting the power and strength of this government. The money which he was obliged to spend, was disbursed out of his own resources, and the sum was so considerable as seriously to injure his private fortune. All has been stricken out of the bill however, except the items which relate to the entertainment of the Sovereigns.

Mr. HALE.—I do not want to say a word about the course of Commodore Elliot, I believe the country remembers, that when he came home he was court martialed.

Mr. CAMERON.—Unjustly.

Mr. HALE.—Well, it may be so; but I believe the King of Greece, and the Queen of Saxe Cobourg were not the only animals he entertained, for I remember one of the charges against him was, that he had so encumbered his vessel with animals, Elephants, Jackass's, &c., that she was disqualified for any service. He had Jackasses heads stuck through all the port holes, and in fact, his ship was familiarly known in the Mediterranean as the Jackass frigate. I believe the first example of voting money for such a purpose as this, was the grant made to Commodore Morgan, and I trust it will be the last. Why are such high salaries granted to our naval officers, unless it is to cover extraordinary expenditures? I believe the estimates for the naval service this year amount to fifteen millions of dollars.

SEVERAL SENATORS.—Between ten and eleven millions.

Mr. HALE.—I think they will be found to be not less than fifteen millions in the aggregate, but eleven is enough for my argument. During the last war with Great Britain, I believe our navy did not cost us more than four or five millions at the utmost, and it has now got up to eleven millions, and is increasing year by year, and in addition to this enormous expense, every time there is an entertainment given by a naval officer, there must be an appropriation made to meet the expense. Sir, I hope the bill will be indefinitely postponed, and upon that I ask the yeas and nays.

Mr. BADGER.—I am sorry that the Senator from New Hampshire has thought it necessary to oppose this bill, and I regret still more that he has felt it to be his duty to indulge in the style of remark which he has addressed to the Senate on this occasion. Commodore Elliot is now no more; while in the service of the country he advanced her interests, and merited her approbation. His memory should at least be entitled to respect. If in his conduct towards those under his command, he did any thing that was calculated to bring reproach upon his name, his conduct was subjected to investigation by the proper tribunal, and he submitted himself to the punishment awarded by that tribunal, whether justly or unjustly, I do not propose now to enquire. But it does seem to me that the remarks of the Senator from New Hampshire, though probably not so designed, for I am sure he would be the last man in the world who would voluntarily inflict injury—are calculated to bring into the consideration of this question, prejudices which ought never to sway an American Senate. According to my judgment there cannot be a plainer case, or one which appeals more directly to our sense of justice.

It is said that the expenses of the American navy are large. Sir, that furnishes no reason why a sum of money which in justice and right ought to be refunded to Commodore Elliot, or to those who represent him, should be withheld. If the expenses of the navy are large he had nothing to do with making them so; he neither created the navy nor fixed its expenses. The expenses of the navy is a matter which has nothing to do with the consideration of this question. This gentleman was sent out in a first class ship not only for the purpose of adding to the stores of American science, but for the purpose of exhibiting American strength. He visits a certain port, and it is announced to him that a sovereign intends to do him the honor to visit his ship. What is he, under such circumstances, to do? He is to say, I belong to a republic; we know nothing about kings and queens; we do not desire the honor of a visit from you; we want none of your company? I am sure that the Senator from New Hampshire would not desire him to act in such a manner as this. Well, the royal cortege comes on board, what is he then to do? Is he to announce to them that he is a member of the Washingtonian cold-water total-abstinence society, and refuse to order refreshments? Why it is preposterous to suppose that either of these courses can be adopted. What is he to do? He is the representative of his country, and he should represent it in a manner that is suitable to its dignity; and he does so at an expense to himself of fifteen hundred dollars. The Senator says that he receives a large salary and that is sufficient for purposes of hospitality. So it is for ordinary hospitality, but not for occasions like these. I think we should be wanting in the duty that we owe ourselves, if we should refuse to reimburse him for this outlay. I hope the bill will not be postponed.

Mr. PEARCE.—The honorable Senator from New Hampshire is mistaken in supposing that the case of Commodore Morgan is the only one in which an appropriation of this kind has been made.

Mr. HALE.—I did not refer to the case of Commodore Morgan as a precedent myself; it was referred to by the committee. In regard to the remarks of the Senator from North Carolina, I should have been exceedingly glad if that gentleman, who generally delivers what he has to say, with so much grace and propriety—had abstained on this occasion from what appeared to me to be an unkind slur on temperance societies. I should be very glad to entertain that honorable Senator in my humble home, but the beverage I should offer him, though he might consider it an insult, would be the best water the country affords. I think the influence of such unkind suggestions, as those made by the Senator are calculated to do vast injury to a cause, which I know is dear to his heart. Now in regard to this claim, I look upon it as establishing a dangerous practice. We shall now have to commence paying for the entertainments given by our ministers abroad. It is by them that the true dignity of the nation is represented, and if there is any propriety in the thing at all, they are the persons who should give entertainments. You will find applications of this kind multiply upon your hands. There will be no end or limitation to it.

Mr. BADGER.—A single remark, sir, and first in regard to enlarging the salaries of our foreign ministers. If the honorable Senator entertains the opinion that they should be increased, I hope he will follow it with a bill, and I give him my word, that he shall have my support. But the honorable Senator is mistaken if he supposes that ambassadors or ministers are subject to any such expenses. Kings and Queens are not in the habit of visiting ministers, but they are in the habit of going on board national ships, from which visits, they expect to derive both pleasure and instruction. All the expenses to which a minister would be exposed of a similar character, are precisely such as have been stricken out of this bill—the expenses of ordinary hospitality. One word with regard to temperance societies, and I have done. I was not aware that there was anything unkind in what I said. I merely intended to express as well as I could, what might have been the excuses offered by the Commodore. The honorable Senator from New Hampshire has been pleased to say, that he hoped I would visit his part of the country. I have looked forward with the confident expectation, that if business or pleasure called me there, I would even with personal inconvenience to myself, go out of my way to do myself the pleasure of visiting him at his hospitable abode. But I must say this to him, after the announcement he has made, I shall take care when I do make that visit, that it shall be after dinner!

Mr. BERRIEN.—For my own guidance in this matter, I desire to ask a question of the Chairman of the Committee—granting the propriety of this reimbursement by the government to a commander of a vessel, I desire to enquire in what way the actual amount of the expenditure is ascertained. Is it based upon any evidence, or upon the mere statement contained in the memorial?

Mr. CAMERON.—The amount asked for originally was five thousand dollars, which sum was reduced by the committee to fifteen hundred dollars. I do not remember the precise nature of the evidence of the expenditures, but I know that the committee were entirely satisfied of the propriety of granting the latter sum. While up I will say to the honorable Senator from New Hampshire that he has done great injustice to the memory of Commodore Elliott. He was a brave and good man, and his conduct was irreproachable in every respect, except perhaps in this matter, in which he was charged with loading his vessel with animals; and even then he acted under the orders of the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. BERRIEN.—I made the inquiry because I looked over the papers upon your table, and I found no evidence whatever upon which this claim rests, except the mere statement in the memorial. The committee, I presume, must have access to some sources of information by which they have fixed upon an amount which they will allow. They have an account presented by the memorial, and I perceive they have divided the items of that account into two classes, rejecting certain items as expenditures resulting from the individual hospitality of the officer; others they have allowed as resulting from what they supposed to be the necessity of his situation as a commanding officer of a national vessel. But I do not find that there is any evidence other than the statement of the memorial to authorize a conjecture as to the amount.

The question being taken on the motion for the indefinite postponement, it was decided in the affirmative, by yeas and nays, as follows:

30TH CONG.—1ST SESSION—No. 63.

THE CALIFORNIA CLAIMS.

The Senate resumed the consideration, as in Committee of the Whole, of the bill for ascertaining and paying the California Claims.

The question pending was upon agreeing to the motion made by Mr. Mason, to recommit the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs, with instructions.

Mr. BADGER suggested to the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. MASON,] to modify his motion to recommit, so as to leave out the instructions; as the committee might, perhaps, be able to frame a section of the bill so as to obviate the objections entertained to it in its present shape.

Mr. MASON requiesced in the suggestion, and modified his motion so as simply to recommit the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs; which was agreed to.

THE SUPREME COURT.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration, on its third reading, of the bill from the House of Representatives, supplemental to the act entitled "an act concerning the Supreme Court of the United States," approved June 17, 1844.

Mr. ASHLEY addressed the Senate at length in opposition to the bill, in a speech which is given in the Appendix.

Mr. ALLEN.—I desire to make an inquiry of my honorable friend, whether I understood him correctly to say that subsequently to the passage of the act of 1844, there had been but one or two instances in which the judges of the Supreme Court have not held two terms in their respective circuits within the year.

Mr. ASHLEY.—That is what I stated.

Mr. ALLEN.—A friend of mine in the other end of the capitol called my attention, when this bill was up before, to the existence of the act of 1844, which had escaped my attention, not being particularly connected with judicial matters, and I inquired of him why it was that the act of 1844, by which the judges are exempted from half their duties on the circuit, was passed; what reason was given for its passage. His answer was, that it was passed on the recommendation of the judges, or upon their representation, in order to enable them to spend the time that they would otherwise be required to spend in holding more than one term of their respective circuit courts at this capitol, to clear off the docket of the Supreme Court. That was the purpose, as I understand, for which that act was passed.

Mr. ASHLEY.—I will refer the honorable Senator to a table which I have procured, showing the progress of business in the Supreme Court for three years, before and after the passing of that act. In 1842, there were sixty-four cases on the docket; of these, fifty-two were decided. In 1843, there were thirty-six cases decided. In 1844, at the January term, they decided forty-six cases; and again, in the December term—for in that term the act that has been referred to was passed, and by it the terms of the Supreme Court were changed, and extended about six weeks I believe—in the December term forty-four cases were decided. The next year there were sixty-four cases decided. In 1845, there were fifty-three; and in 1846, there were forty-six decided. In the three years preceding the passage of the act, they decided one hundred and thirty-four cases; and in the three years following its passage, one hundred and sixty-three. The addition of eighteen weeks to their time of sitting has made an increase of twenty-nine cases decided by the court.

Mr. ALLEN.—I was induced to turn my attention to that act because its existence seems to be an ample answer to those who urge the passage of this particular bill; for if the object of the Supreme Court be barely to do the central duties of the Supreme Court at this Capital, they have it in their power to do so without further legislation. What is their motive, then, for not doing so when they have it in their power? That is the question. Their only motive for not doing so is this—it is the only way of accounting for it—that they will not clear off the docket when they have it in their power to do so, because they want the cases to accumulate in order that this accumulation may strengthen the reasons for dispensing with circuit duties altogether. That is the only reason that can be assigned for it. They want to get rid of circuit duties altogether. One-half of the circuit duties have been dispensed with in order to enable them to finish up the cases on the docket, yet instead of finishing them they adjourn at the end of March, eight months before they have to meet here again. Why did they not sit here until the last of August and dispense with the spring term of the circuit courts as they were authorized to do, and thus take time to conclude their business here? Sir, if you pass a bill to release them from circuit duties one year, the reasons for a perpetual release will not only be rendered stronger by the state of the docket of this court, but also by the state of the dockets of the circuit courts. The business of the circuits will accumulate in consequence of the absence of the judges from their circuit duties. In the course of one or two years the business of the circuits will be so much increased that additional reason will be given for relieving the judges from either circuit or Supreme Court duties. They will say the augmentation of the circuit duties is so great that we cannot attend at Washington for the decision of cases at all; and, therefore, you must cut us loose from circuit duties or you must appoint somebody else to attend at Washington and perform the central duties there. That will be the argument then. They are preparing evidently for a division of their duties, and they know very well that if they do not attend in the circuits for a year or two the circuit duties will increase to such an extent that they who do the circuit duties cannot come to Washington at all; and there must necessarily be two sets of judges to perform the two classes of duties. This is as plain as anything can possibly be.

What is the argument that is employed here? Give these gentlemen one year; for what? To enable them to pass upon all the cases upon the docket of the Supreme Court. That is the object. Well, how long will it take to do this? Why at the rate at which they proceeded at the last session of the court it will take exactly three hundred and twenty-six days to get through the docket. Their progress was about at the rate of one case in two days. There are on the docket one hundred and sixty-three cases yet to be disposed of, and that will require, according to the rate at which they have been going on, three hundred and twenty-six days. They must sit then for one year to clear off the docket, that will bring us to May next year, which will be after Congress shall have adjourned. The consequence will be that whilst Congress is in session next year we shall be told that the docket has not yet been cleared off, that there are still fifty or sixty cases remaining and that their exemption from circuit duties must be extended for another year.

There is no such spectacle anywhere in these States or, perhaps, in the world as that exhibited by the sessions of our Supreme Court. I did not choose to allude to this matter the other day, and shall only briefly allude to it now. The business of the Supreme Court is a very limited business so far as the personal acts of the judges are concerned. Every man that has ever practised law in a State knows, that the business of a judge in deciding State cases consists, in a great degree, in plodding over old records; reading depositions and long bills in chancery, written in all manner of handwriting—noting down authorities out of this lawyer's library at this end of the town, and that lawyer's at that end of the town—all which labor he incurs himself. One half of the labor of a State judge is physical labor. But how is it with the Supreme Court? All is cut and dried to their hands. I believe that the very record in the cases which come up from the circuits is printed. The arguments of the counsel are printed; they are drawn up with brevity and precision; every authority is stated; the whole work is in fact brought down to the single act of judgment. The ablest counsel in the United States are employed in the causes, for we know that the reputation of a lawyer often depends upon his success in these intellectual conflicts at the bar of the Supreme Court, and thus it is that the labor of the judges of the Supreme Court is exceedingly small when compared to that to which the judges of the State courts are subjected. Nine tenths of the labor of the State judges is superseded in the Supreme Court by the agencies of counsel and the rules adopted by the court. Here then are nine full grown men selected for their legal wisdom—and they are supposed to know some law before they are appointed to this legal tribunal—with the printed facts of the case before them, with the printed references, all the authorities, and with the aid of the ablest lawyers of the country upon each side to detect any fallacy or expose any erroneous authority. Here then are these nine men, with their arms folded, and with what sort of expedition do they get through their docket? I have heard of consultations. Oh, the immense amount of humbug in this world! An idea has gone forth that every case brought to Washington involves some constitutional question upon which the very form and structure of this government depend. It is all nonsense! Nine tenths of the cases which come up here, are of the ordinary character of the cases which are argued and decided in the woods of Iowa, and involve no constitutional question whatever. But they are here—they are before the Supreme Court, and they cannot be decided but by the united wisdom of nine men with black gowns on—the gowns forming a very large part of the tribunal! These venerable gentlemen come up to the capitol at eleven o'clock in the morning and sit a few hours. I believe that they take Saturday as a sort of appendage to the Sabbath, and as an additional release from the toils and labors of life. Now, although I do not wish to raise any clamor against this tribunal, yet I think it does not become us who are intrusted with the affairs of the nation to lend ourselves to any such system as this, or to allow this tribunal to become a mere locality of Washington city, enjoying all the repose and dignity of indolence.

The House of Representatives have a rule which I was always opposed to, and shall oppose any attempt to apply it to any legislative body, but which, nevertheless, I regard as being very well adapted to this judicial tribunal. I refer to the rule limiting speaking. I would be opposed to it as a rule applicable to a legislative body, for two reasons—first, because the representatives represent the people who should never have any restraint put upon their will or their voice; and, secondly, because the question in a legislative body is not what the law is, but what it ought to be; and that is always a broad question, and gives room for large and extended views. In a court of law, however, the question is what the law is, and that cannot be expanded—cannot be enlarged—cannot be multiplied—because it is applied to a given point. As long as a man talks as a lawyer should talk, confining himself to the points at issue, and is not allowed by the court to talk about what the law ought to be, there will be a limit to his speaking. But, now-a-days, this tribunal listens to a great deal more talking as to what the law ought to be, than as to what the law is, over which alone it has any jurisdiction. If the system be allowed to continue, it will require a dozen such courts to get through with the duty. This is too serious a business to be regarded as a mere matter of personal favor. If it were a matter of personal favor merely, I am as ready as any man to yield it; but sitting here as a body, entrusted with the great interests of the nation, we have no favors to confer upon anybody—none whatever. Therefore, I am opposed to this proceeding. I belive that this bill, if adopted, will eventuate in the destruction of the court; and that is by far the greatest good that is likely to result from it—I mean the destruction of the present organization of the court, which I believe to be radically wrong. I believe the true mode of preventing the evil, is to curtail its jurisdiction as to subject matter.

I contend that the withdrawal of these gentlemen from circuit duties will increase these duties until it will be said, that we must of necessity create separate and distinct tribunals, one in the States and the other here; in other words giving this court a permanent location in Washington.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—I am aware that this discussion is of a very dry character; and which even the great talent of the gentlemen who have spoken has failed to render particularly interesting; and I confess that it is with reluctance I again rise to address the Senate upon the subject. Happily, the objections which have been urged against the bill, have been of such a nature as to furnish very little justification in occupying much of the time of the Senate in replying to them. The gentlemen who oppose the bill, have selected questions which have nothing to do with the subject before the Senate, and a great portion of their remarks has been addressed to other tribunals. It would appear, indeed, from these remarks, that the Supreme Court has fallen into a condition of the greatest possible imbecility and mal-practice. And gentlemen here, tell us, by way of manifesting their disinterestedness and perfect capacity to judge, that they never had a case in the court, and that, therefore, they have a right to rate and berate this tribunal, and point out in the minutest manner the smallest details of mal-practice. To all that, sir, I have nothing to reply. If that tribunal needed an apologist and an advocate, it is not my function to discharge the duty. I am neither the advocate nor apologist of that tribunal. It is not to vindicate them against any such imputations that I now stand before you. I do not stand here to say that this bill is not intended, as it has been insinuated it is, to be an "entering wedge" as it is called. This bill came to us from another branch of the legislature; and it is founded upon a fact incontestible, and not to be denied by any one, that there has been from some cause or another, say if you please, by the negligence of the judges—such an accumulation of business, that cases now coming up, cannot be reached before the expiration of three years. This bill simply provides a remedy for this evil. It may not be sufficient to relieve the community from this evil, for, sir, the object of the bill is to relieve the community—it is to relieve public justice from the reproachful obstructions which now exist. That is the object of the bill, and it furnishes the reason why I desire to see it passed. I desire to say to these judges—"Come back here—you have left public business undone—come back here, immediately, and finish it, making no apology about the necessity of attendance on circuit courts. Come here and finish this business, which has accumulated, and finish it within a year." That is the language of this bill. Yet gentlemen, because of prejudice against this court, because of errors ascribed to it, and perhaps to some extent justly ascribed to it; for I think there has been some dilatoriness in the performance of the duties of that tribunal, in consequence of an amiable fault in permitting counsel to speak at too great length—but gentlemen, because of prejudice against the court, refuse to grant this temporary measure of relief, which will enable the court to dispose of the public business. And here let me revert to the complaint to which I have just referred, that the court has extended too great indulgence to the counsel. Gentlemen have suggested that some hour rule, or something of that kind, should be applied to the arguments before that court. These gentlemen seem to think that within such a limitation all the law knowledge that could possibly be required in any case could properly be confined. Well, certainly such a rule might lead to economy of time. But I should like to know by what rule gentlemen would limit all the politics in the world. I should like to know what length of time honorable Senators suppose a well stored politician would require, in which to pour out all his treasures of political lore. I cannot say, no more than I would undertake to limit exactly the space and compass within which the law and knowledge of certain counsel are to be confined. But, as I have already said, it is not my purpose to furnish an apology for the conduct of the judges, nor vindicate them against any charges which may be preferred against them. I leave them where I find them, to be judged of by the country. If this bill be not calculated to relieve the country—to relieve litigants and expedite public business I do not desire it to pass. If it do, I trust it will pass.

The great objection to this bill is directed not against what it does, but against that which, in the imagination of Senators, it may be connected with hereafter. It is supposed that this bill will hereafter cut the judges off from all circuit duties. Now, is this a fair deduction from the bill itself? If the bill ever have such a result, it will be because the Senate so decides, and not because of the bill itself. If there is any danger of such a decision on the part of the Senate, it is neither increased nor diminished by this bill. It is objected, however, that if the court be confined to the discharge of its duties here, an additional number of appeals will come up from the circuit courts, making the docket as much loaded as if things continued as they are at present. All this, mark you, sir, in the face of the allegation, that the release of the judges from one circuit in the year should have enabled them to dispose of the business of the Supreme Court! But when it becomes necessary to the argument of gentlemen, the non-attendance of the judges in the circuits is presented as an objection to the bill, on the ground that it will lead to an accumulation of business.

I confess that I have been greatly surprised at the apprehensions which seem to have been excited by this bill. All the evil consequences which have been spoken of, have been attributed arbitrarily, and the more so because every gentleman favorable to the bill, has again and again disclaimed any such objects or designs. It is a measure of very little consequence after all. It merely aims at the correction and prevention of an existing evil. It may prove more or less adequate. I believe that it will be sufficient. I think that we have every reason to apprehend that the respectable gentlemen who constitute that court, will come back here, under this mandate of Congress, and accomplish the work, willingly profiting by the lessons which have been read to them here, and determined to curtail all improper prolixity of discussion before them, and which I am sure cannot be more tedious and irksome to any others than themselves. I do hope, then, that when this matter is coolly and dispassionately viewed—when the utter want of any serious excuse for the tocsin of alarm that has been sounded here, must be admitted, that there will be no longer any objection to the adoption of this experiment for the removal of an acknowledged evil.

Mr. BUTLER.—I reluctantly rise to make a very few remarks at this stage of the debate on this bill, but really I cannot sit patiently, and hear a respectable body of gentlemen, constituting one of the departments of this government made the subject of denunciation and invective, without at least raising my voice to vindicate them against unmerited and gratuitous censure.

Let us look at the facts in this case. In 1844 there were fifty-five cases despatched. In 1845 we find one hundred and thirty-six on the docket. Now, is the Supreme Court responsible for this accumulation of business? Are we to require them to despatch one hundred and thirty six cases in three months, when they were able in the same period to despatch only fifty-five cases? But the gentleman from Ohio, proceeds farther, and assuming that this tribunal is an institution inconsistent with the constitution of the United States, he contends that it ought to be broken down, and attempts to cast ridicule on a respectable body of gentlemen. More than that, the Senator from Ohio arraigns the motives of the judges. He has deliberately alledged, that it is the design of the members of the Supreme Court of the United States, to aggravate the evil of a crowded docket to such an extent, that Congress will be forced into the necessity of reorganizing a supreme appellate court, having no connexion with circuit jurisdiction. Is it possible that gentlemen acting under as high responsibility, and deep a sense of that responsibility as any member of this body, can be actuated by such motives? I do not believe that such a design can possibly be entertained. It is quite easy, however to direct against a tribunal of this character, invested with certain aristocratic attributes, invective which may not be without popular effect. But I am quite convinced that the judges of that court have, to the best of their ability, discharged their duties so as to subserve the great ends of the institution of that tribunal. The closeness with which they attend to the duties of the court, is an evidence of their fidelity. They go into court at eleven o'clock in the morning, and sit till four o'clock. At five they go into consultation, in which they frequently continue till nine or ten at night.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland.—(In his seat.) Often till eleven at night.

Mr. BUTLER.—Next morning the judges go to the library, for the purpose of examining authorities. But why should I enter into any detail of the labors of these judges, when, to all acquainted with the nature of their judicial avocations, the arduous character of it must be well known? But the judges wear black gowns, and because they thus adhere to the ancient usage, they are made the subject of ridicule and contempt! From the very nature of the tribunal, the members of it must, in some measure, be separated from the people; and that is seized upon for the purpose of exciting popular odium. Now, sir, if there is anything on earth that I particularly venerate, it is an independent judicial tribunal? It is the independence of this court, and its elevation above the reach of popular aspirants, that secures to it the confidence of all. When the day comes in which a supreme judicature will be forced to maintain itself by declaiming to the populace from the court-house door, or by resorting to newspapers, or any other mode in which those that aspire to public office seek the attainment of their ends, I shall regard the liberties of the country and the rights of the people, especially the rights of the poor and humble, as sacrificed and destroyed. I repudiate all ideas of making this tribunal elective by the people. Is it to be supposed that by making those judges elective, you will confer upon them the capacity to decide one hundred and fifty cases in three months, when four years ago it was found impossible, with the utmost diligence, to decide more than fifty-five? I may be permitted to remark that while denouncing the present system, gentlemen have perhaps had in view some project of establishing a separate court of appeals on the Mississippi; and others entertaining the idea that the judges shall be made elective.

As to the allegation that the judges have permitted a waste of time by idle discussion, I would remark that it is very easy to suggest here, rules of action to govern the conduct of the judges, in limiting counsel in the course of argument. For myself, I regard it as one of the most sublime principles to be found anywhere that no man is to be condemned without hearing, and it is a principle incident to our institutions that both sides should have a fair hearing. Justice is not to be sacrificed to mere despatch of business. I believe, indeed, that there was a Virginian judge who was accustomed to say that he could decide a case better after hearing one side. Perhaps his ideas of prompt administration of justice would suit those gentlemen who insist so rigidly upon the despatch of cases in the Supreme Court, by curtailing the arguments of counsel.

For myself, I do not fear any of those evils which gentlemen seem to apprehend, as inevitably to follow from even a temporary separation of the judges of the Supreme Court from the circuit duties. I do not at all believe that this court is likely in such circumstances to grow up into a central, irresponsible despotism. Not at all. There is little danger to be apprehended to the liberties of the country from any such source. The Supreme Court, in my opinion, ought to be a court of law, in contra-distinction to the circuit courts, which must necessarily be governed more or less by the popular will, for juries will mould their decisions to the popular feelings. But the Supreme Court of appellate jurisdiction, ought to be in the highest and fullest sense of the term, a court of law. The evils which some gentlemen appear to apprehend from the passage of this bill, I regard as altogether imaginary. It is because I desire to preserve the present system in all its efficacy, that I advocate the present measure. We must take one of two alternatives. But the Senator from Arkansas says, that if we adopt this measure, the appeals from the circuit courts will be multiplied in consequence of the absence of the judges of the Supreme Court. Well, I have always understood that the most effectual method of preventing the multiplication of appeals was to keep down the appeal docket. When the docket is crowded, the appeals to stay judgment will be numerous. Many of the appeals made, have no other object than to obtain delay, and that is defeated when the cases can be taken up and despatched promptly. If the docket then be discharged, the number of new appeals will be diminished. In the meantime, it is also to be remarked, the circuit court business is not suspended. The district judges will be required to discharge some of the duties of the circuit judge. But the Senator from Arkansas says, that the district judges are old and imbecile. He says that they have not enough to do, and they become incompetent. Well, then, this bill will give them some mental exercise—some salutary employment. It is very likely that the remark of the gentlemen is to some extent quite true. Why? Because the Presidents of the United States are in the habit of selecting political favorites, under the influence of the popular will, as district judges; instead of resorting to the ranks of able and experienced lawyers, who may perhaps, have nothing to recommend them but their competency for the office.

I repeat, sir, that I am in favor of this bill, because it will remedy an acknowledged evil—prevent the multiplication of appeals by discharging the docket, and thus remove one strong temptation to bring up new causes, for the purpose of delay—and preserve the admirable system of our supreme judicature, in all its efficiency and value. It was not my wish to go into the discussion of any topics foreign to the subject before the Senate, but I was compelled to do so, from the denunciations which had been uttered against the judges, by way rather of showing off the rhetorical powers of gentlemen, than of offering solid objections to the passage of the bill.

Mr. ALLEN.—I did not introduce this subject here. The court introduced itself to the Senate; and having done so, the Senate has a right to look at the court and to inquire into the reasons why it has introduced itself here. It is said that we assail the court. That was not my intention I assail only the reasons given for the exemption of the court from a portion of its legal duties.

Mr. BUTLER.—I ask the gentleman whether he did not say distinctly, that he believed it to be the design of the court to suffer business to accumulate, and not despatch it for the purpose of effecting a permanent separation from the duties of circuit court jurisdiction?

Mr. ALLEN.—I did say that, and I repeat it.

Mr. BUTLER.—Very well.

Mr. ALLEN.—I cite the law of the land in proof. Their argument for the bill now before us is, that it is necessary that they should be exempted from circuit duties in order to clear off the docket here. That is the argument. Well, I believe that by the law of the land they are already exempted, and have been exempted for three years, from all their circuit duties, with the exception of the one term of the circuit; and yet, notwithstanding that exception, and when in the last of March they had it in their power to postpone the spring circuit throughout the Union, and proceed with the docket of the Supreme Court, sitting here until the first of August, they adjourned on the first of March, to hold the State courts. They have had then, for three years, the means of doing all that they now ask permission to do. Why have they not availed themselves of the exemption from circuit duties, which has been already given them by law? The object of the act of '44 was to enable them to sit longer at Washington and complete the business of the Supreme Court. I ask why they have not complied with that law? I see no other reason, then, why they should desire the exemption which this bill proposes to give, than to get rid of the remaining circuit term.

But the honorable Senator—who is I know a much better lawyer than I am, understands all these details of legal business very well—seems to arraign me for a suggestion which I made the other day as to the mode in which these judges are appointed. Now it is very well when we undertake to argue a point, that we make the close, consistent with the beginning of the argument. I will take the reason given by the honorable Senator from South Carolina at the close of his speech, as amply sufficient to sustain the argument to which that speech was intended as an answer. The appointing power of these judges he alledges, proceeds upon political and party considerations, and overlooks the great judicial, and, what ought to be the paramount consideration of the interests of the nation, and therefore that the judges are not competent. Now if that argument be good, the conclusion is obvious that the appointing power seould be taken away from the agent who abuses it, and lodged somewhere else. According to the Senator's argument, the President errs in making the selection, and the Senate in confirming it. The President and Senate then are not the authority from whence these judges should derive their political selection. If that fact be so, I say then, go to the people, and I will measure the strength of the argument with the Senator by reference to the recorded history of the country. I undertake to assert, that the people who appoint the President have been wiser in their choice, than the President has been in his selection of judges. The people have selected more able men in proportion to the number, than the Executive power in its appointments to the bench. The first selection ever made by a great people, scattered extensively over a vast country, was the best ever made. The very first exercise of the power of a great people, in the selection of their first officer, was made in favor of that man, whom we all feel pride in calling the "Father of his Country." We have had some eight or nine Presidents since, and notwithstanding what may be said of the political views of the men who have occupied that chair, it must be acknowledged on all hands, that in intellectual strength and general ability, they have been amongst the most distinguished men that ever held power in the world. They were selected by the people too in circumstances exciting in a high degree, and calculated—if anything could give popular passion too great an ascendancy—to give an improper bias to the judgment of the people. But we have only to turn to those States in which the judges are elected, in order to obtain conclusive evidence of the fact that the people would select far abler men than the Executive.

We have two sorts of law in this country—one called common law and the other equity. The equity jurisprudence exerted by our courts is intended to supply the imperfections of the common law, arising from the fact that that common law has originated under the arbitrary impositions of force in the form of the feudal system, and is defective in its abstract justice, so as to make it necessary to call in the aid of civil law. Whence do we derive that civil law? Whence did Europe derive it? It came from ancient Rome and its original principles were laid down and executed by judges elected only by the Roman people. That civil law constitutes a body of jurisprudence, compared with which, all the rubbish of the English common law is nonsense. That law is founded in the eternal principles of justice. Ethics pervade the whole system and not the arbitrary institutions imposed by a barbarous people. Till this day, that law holds its place in France amongst the most enlightened of the European nations—in one of the States of this Union to a great extent, and even amidst the common law of England as we have it in England, and as we have it here. And yet that civil law was laid down by judges elected amid the shouts of the Roman people, and that annually too—before the people had newspapers to read, before they had a press to aid them! Such was the work accomplished under that dreaded influence of popular opinion to which the Senator from South Carolina adverts—a work performed with such precision and knowledge of the principles of justice, that it has outlived for ages the military power which sustained the empire and the empire itself.

I am not afraid then, that to the great tribunal of the people should be confided the election of the judges. We are not without examples of an elective judiciary. I think Mr. Jefferson speaks, in one of his letters, of a judge in one of the New England States elected fifty years successively, notwithstanding all the vibrations of public opinion. If the Supreme Court were made elective, candidates for its bench, would of necessity, be men of the highest legal reputation, and the most exalted character. Only such men would be heard of at all as candidates for that office. In the States that is the case. A man must have attained great eminence in his profession, before his name becomes sufficiently known to make him a candidate, with any reasonable prospect of success. Another reason presents itself in favor of the popular choice of judges. Every selected tribunal may have personal interests hostile to the interests of the nation. It may seek personal ends inconsistent with the public good, but that is impossible in the case of a tribunal chosen by the people. And the reason is obvious. The interests of the nation, and those of the tribunal chosen by the people must be one. My friend from South Carolina is greatly mistaken if he supposes that the people would attempt to influence judicial decisions. There is an extreme sensitiveness on that very subject in the minds of the people. Hence it is, that in this country the singular and gratifying spectacle is exhibited of judges going into the remotest wilderness unattended, unguarded, and administering the law with perfect security—their judgments respected, and their decisions acquiesced in without a murmur. This arises from the fact, that every man in the United States knows that he has the making of the law in his own hands, and that he who pronounces judgment is the agent of his own selection, subject to constitutional restriction in the administration of his high office.

Mr. FOOTE.—I regret to feel compelled to detain the Senate with a remark or two, quite necessary to be made in order to have my own course in regard to the measure under consideration correctly understood. When this bill made its first appearance before us, I was altogether favorable to its passage. I regarded it as a proposition not intended to effect any serious change in our judiciary system, but designed to supply a remedy for an evil altogether temporary. Whilst the debate which it called forth was in progress, I was much startled by suggestions made by more than one Senator that the bill was designed as an entering wedge to a complete and radical subversion of the existing judicial system, and the substitution of another which seemed to me to be reasonably subject to the many and strong objections urged by several gentlemen of this body. The new plan thus intended to take the place of the old, was one which would limit the Judges of the Supreme Court hereafter to the performance of such duties exclusively as appertain to an appellate tribunal, and would preclude them from the exercise of all authority as men are denied by those who favored the bill, and the very idea seemed to be scouted as utterly unfounded and ridiculous. It so happened though, whilst the discussion was still proceeding, that a printed argument in support of the bill was placed in my hands, which seems to have been laid upon the table of almost every member of this body, urging the passage of the bill chiefly and mainly upon the ground that it was palpably unconstitutional to require of the Supreme Court Judges the performance of duties not to be appellate. This printed argument, whether marked with the highest ability or not I will not undertake to decide, was evidently prepared with singular care, and manifests extraordinary zeal in behalf of the proposed change. I will presently read some extracts from it, in order to show that I am not in error in regard to the character of the document, or the objects of its author or authors, for the name of those concerned in its preparation may, for aught I know to the contrary, be legion. At this moment I will only say, that what I thus heard and read had the effect of alarming my mind as to ulterior results, and I resolved to vote against the measure. It was defeated; after which more than one honored friend among those who advocated the bill urged me warmly to move its reconsideration, alleging as a reason for doing so, that there was not a full Senate when the final vote had been taken, as there would have been, had any serious apprehension been entertained as to its ultimate passage. This application I could not in courtesy refuse, and did therefore move a reconsideration of the question of rejection, which motion prevailing the present discussion has taken place. I am now, sir, as much and even more opposed to the bill than I was originally, nothing having been said here to-day that has in the least degree dispelled my fears as to the effects likely to arise from its adoption; though I certainly give due credit to Senators who disclaim any desire, so far as they are individually concerned, that any such radical change in the judicial system should occur as that alluded to.

And now, sir, having vindicated my own consistency, I hasten to call the attention of the Senate to the printed argument referred to, and beg leave to read only a few extracts in order to show that I cannot be in error touching its true character. On the first page of the document in question, after noticing the severe labors of the Supreme Court judges, the argument proceeds thus:

"Devoting seven entire months laboriously and most correctly assigned to the aforesaid functions, they consume the greater part of the remaining five in innocent rest or recruiting the natural and inevitable wastes of vigor in recent labors, without any escape from their recurrence for the succeeding year.

"In glancing at the origin, progress, and present condition of the original mischief with which we find ourselves so unexpectedly involved, we draw conclusions from things which have no natural connexion, or necessary dependence. A striking characteristic of the common law system is the disproportion of its parts when upon a large scale; for, when we consider the system in which it originated, we find it was designed to operate in a very limited area, and to supply the judges in Equity jurisdiction with the controls of well-defined and settled principles, to be looked to and in imitation of the English Courts. It never believed that it was a universal engine of good when applied to all cases. Even the civil code had impressed lawyers by the flimsy claim to be complete and perfect within its own domain. But by the present petitioner I am told it can not be compared with the machinery of the municipal law extent to the kingdom of England, and capable many of them of sustaining a popular action, great and small, and producing in proportion to its importance all the elements of legislation." &c. &c.

Again, on the second page of the argument, after stating six distinct grounds of distinction between England and this country, in reference to the performance of circuit duties by appellate judges, it proceeds thus:

"The aforegoing considerations, though perhaps unanswerable, or not anticipated by the authors of our judiciary system, are not to a point of sufficiency and uniformity of that system for the present condition of the country."

Again, the pamphlet argument, on the fourth page, thus boldly asserts the unconstitutionality of the present system:

"But connected with this subject there is a far greater consideration—one which ought to control any view that now be taken of it, and is presented in the following enquiry: Is the present organization of the Judiciary system, or is any organization which, like the present, blends in the same officers the functions and duties of the Supreme Court, with the functions and duties of inferior courts, consistent with the meaning and objects, or even with the letter of the constitution? It will facilitate a correct comprehension of this enquiry, to place in a connected view the several provisions of the constitution which relate to the Judiciary. Thus, in enumerating the powers vested in Congress, it is declared art. 1. sec. 8th, clause 10th, that they shall have power to constitute tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court."

In article second, section first, it is provided, "That the Judicial system of the United States, shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behaviour, and, still, at stated times, receive for their services a compensation which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office."

In section second, clause second, of the third article, it is declared, that "In all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, and those in which a state shall be a party, the Supreme Court shall have original jurisdiction. In all the other cases before mentioned, the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction both as to law and fact, with such exceptions, and under such restrictions as the Congress shall make."

The argument then goes on to contend with much ingenuity, and still more earnestness, from the constitutional provisions cited, that Congress never had power to impose upon the judges of the Supreme Court, the performance of circuit duties, concluding one paragraph thus:

"This question naturally arises: Is there any necessity vested in Congress to require of the justices of the Supreme Court the performance of duties not appertaining to the business of the Supreme Court, but wholly separated and distinct therefrom, and which, indeed, experience has shown are incompatible as a burden to, and interference with, the appropriate duties of that Court—duties urgently demanded by the necessities of the country? Every correct interpretation of the 1st. sect. of the 3d art. of the constitution must show that in the separation, both as to personal office and business, was designed between the justices of the Supreme Court, and the judges of the inferior courts, and it may be affirmed that sound policy plainly indicates such a separation," &c. &c.

I will not fatigue the Senate with farther citations from this extraordinary production. What I have read though, I doubt not, will satisfy most of those who listen to me, that there is deeply and cunningly concerted scheme somewhere, in connection with the bill under consideration, so to modify our present judicial establishment as entirely to relieve the Supreme Court judges from the duties of the circuit—a scheme, as I believe, for the many powerful reasons already stated by other Senators, pregnant with the most serious danger to the justice of the country, and even to our republican institutions.

And now, sir, I beg leave to offer a few observations upon what has fallen from several Senators, relative to the necessity of a change in the mode of appointing judges of the Supreme Court of the Union, and in their tenure of office. Sir, I perfectly and cordially concur with all that has been so ably and eloquently said upon this subject, by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. ALLEN.] My feelings are all much in unison with his upon the present occasion, as they were when he so boldly and promptly brought forward his resolution congratulatory of the French Republic; for which certain members of this body seemed to be as little prepared as they are now for this radical reform which he suggests. My own views upon this subject are not of recent adoption; it has been almost twenty years since I first promulged them. In the State which I have the honor in part to represent upon this floor, the judges, high and low, have been elected for more than fifteen years, for a short term, by the people, and the system has worked so well—the tree has borne such good fruit, that I believe there is no intelligent citizen of the State who is not warmly in favor of it; though when it was originally introduced, it had many and most violent enemies, especially among those whose minds having been devoted to the exclusive study of common law books, had received a bias therefrom which they were not able entirely to eradicate.

Sir, I was most highly gratified to hear my distinguished friend, the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. ALLEN.] refer to the example of Rome as supplying a striking instance of the successful application of the great principle of popular election in connection with the judicial office. Nothing can be more certain, than that the highest judicial officers in the Roman Republic were, for many centuries, exclusively chosen by the people; and that to the successful adjudications of these personages the world is chiefly indebted for that invulnerable system of jurisprudence, the civil law, whose majestic remains yet challenge the admiration and command the deferential homage of civilized men in all countries under the sun. My honorable friend might have gone still farther, and have asserted that even the famous Ten Tables of Rome, which are acknowledged to have constituted the broad and firm foundation of that jurisprudential fabric afterwards known as the jus civile of Rome, were themselves of similar origin. Sir, brought across the Atlantic sea, from the classic shores of Greece, they embodied the fundamental principles of judicial science which had first received sanction and become enstamped with commanding authority in Athens and other democratic states of Greece, through the medium of courts whose judges owed their authority to the free suffrages of their enlightened fellow-citizens. Gentlemen who seem to decry this system should remember that at one period of the world's history it has had the open sanction of Jehovah himself; for the judges of the Israelites were elected by their brethren of the immortal twelve tribes, and, for the most part, so conducted themselves in their high office, as to make brilliantly manifest the discriminating sagacity of the Jewish voters, by whose voices they were raised to the seats of judicial power. I am almost tempted here to remind Senators that our own German ancestors had nearly two thousand years ago, ascertained and proved the value of the popular mode of electing judicial officers; but I hasten to more modern instances, whose authority will be held by all considerate men as entitled to high respect. The people of the good old State of Connecticut are understood to have chosen their judges at one period of their history, for more than a century and a half; nor have I heard that its operation was attended with any mischievous effects. But I beg leave to introduce to the notice of the Senate the example of the State of Mississippi, who took the lead of her sister States of the confederacy by making all her judicial officers elective by the people more than fifteen years ago; and where the system has worked so admirably, that though there was originally much and fierce opposition to its introduction, especially among the learned members of the legal profession, yet I do not now know a single citizen of the State at all, remarkable for intelligence, who is not perfectly satisfied of its surpassing value, and who would not as soon part with any other provision of our organic law as that which secures to our citizens the high privilege of electing their judicial agents. Our new system in Mississippi has supplied the bench of the State with a continued succession of able and upright judges, who might well challenge comparison with the judges of any age or country; whose numerous, able, and learned decisions, published annually in well-bound volumes, I am gratified to know have commanded unqualified respect in every State of the Union. The judges who now preside in the high court of errors and appeals of Mississippi, though they do not sit "gowned" for the administration of justice, would, all of them, adorn the bench of the Supreme Court of the Union; and I may mention it as a remarkable fact, which most forcibly attests the infallible trustworthiness of the system, that one of the present judges of our appellate court, the Hon. William L. Sharkey, a man, whose sterling integrity, deep and varied learning, acute and discriminating mind, have established for him a fame as enduring as the mountains of the land, and commensurate with the republic itself, has been uniformly re-elected by his fellow-citizens for more than fifteen years; though he resides in a district where a majority of the voters differ from him in political sentiment. I should be justly censurable, were I to omit the mention of another case equally illustrative of the value of our Mississippi system of election. There is a major general of our army, who has distinguished himself, I hesitate not to assert, as highly as any officer who has been invested with command in Mexico; whose pure and blameless life, extensive attainments in literature and science, and truly democratic sentiments and manners, had made him more a favorite of our State than any of her sons long before the Mexican war commenced—this personage, whom all Mississippi would from this description acclamatively recognize without my naming him, General John A. Quitman, was one of our earliest chancellors, and, for some years before our new constitution was adopted, administered the whole equity jurisdiction of our State. This gentleman happened to be one of those who, when the popular mode of election was proposed, was decidedly adverse to it, though I am gratified to know that the experience of its benefits has long since satisfied him of its high value. Well, sir, when the new constitution was to be put in operation, whom do you suppose the whole people of Mississippi, without a dissenting voice, and without either solicitation or desire on his part, united in electing to the chancery bench? This same John A. Quitman, whose profound legal learning, sound discriminating mind, laborious business habits, and surpassing ability as an equity judge, attested by numerous decisions before that time rendered, at once attracted all eyes and hearts to him, as the worthiest of all our accomplished jurists, to occupy the sacred woolsack, and enter upon the adjudication of questions more difficult than any other judge of our times has been called on to decide.

Let no man say, Mr. President, that the people of the United States can not be safely entrusted with the power of electing the judges of the Supreme Court of the Union. So to assert is to call in question either the sound sense or virtue of the people, without both of which it is impossible that our republican system can be maintained. Sir, the people are competent to decide upon the merits and qualifications of candidates for judgeships, and are moreover less subject to certain sinister influences calculated to prevent a judicious selection, than any legislative body, or executive and Senate, can possibly be. A single individual, or collection of individuals, may very easily contrive to have an interest wholly distinct from that of the community in general; but the peoples' happiness is the public welfare; and the mass of the citizens may be reasonably expected always to feel inclined to choose the most trustworthy person possible to be obtained for the performance of judicial functions.

Those who seriously question the capacity of the people to make a safe and prudent selection among those who may be presented to them as candidates for their suffrages, would do well to remember, that precisely the same qualities which are supposed to be indispensable ingredients in the character of a good judge, are not less necessary to the character of a respectable barrister. Integrity, strength and activity of mind, legal learning, knowledge of men and things, benevolence of heart and refined complaisance of manners, are equally ornamental to the forum and the bench. Yet, it cannot be denied, that it is the people of whom the litigants in courts are only a portion—the voters if you please—who are constantly discriminating among the members of the legal profession, and so discriminating as almost invariably to bestow the most employment upon those who, on the whole, have proved themselves most deserving of patronage. This is so strictly true, that it would be difficult to mention a case in any part of the Union where a truly meritorious attorney has remained long in obscurity, or failed in a comparatively limited number of years to attain honor and emolument. These were the matured views of Thomas Jefferson, who always contended that the appointment of the federal judges by the President and Senate, and endowing them with power to continue for life, constituted a solecism in our system of government which should be gotten rid of as soon as possible. Such also was the opinion of the most sagacious and practical man who ever held the Presidential office, Andrew Jackson, whose views I have heard freely declared in presence of witnesses easy to be produced, if this mention of his name should be adjudged unauthorized. Mr. Jefferson always had a short answer for those who talked, as we have heard gentlemen do on this occasion, about the importance of having an independent judiciary. He insisted that the idea of independence on the bench was derived from Great Britain—that it there meant independence of the crown in favor of the people, but that independence of the people was exactly the opposite of this, which was the only sort of independence that could be expected to arise from the method of appointing federal judges now in use, and the permanent tenure of office which is provided in the constitution. I confess that I have never seen any mischief which appeared to my mind likely to result to the country at large from keeping alive in the bosoms of all our public functionaries a wholesome and habitual sense of responsibility to the people. The three departments of government in this country—the executive, legislative and judiciary—should, in my judgment, be alike independent of each other, and dependant upon the people, the source of all legitimate authority in a republic.

Now is it true, as many suppose, that the election of judges by the people necessarily imposes upon the aspirants to Judicial honors, the practice of any unworthy acts whatever in order to secure election? To suppose so, is greatly to wrong the enlightened voters of the country. I have opportunities of looking into this matter closely in the State of Mississippi, and I have no hesitation in declaring that there, at least, if a judicial candidate should be seen going through the country making popular harangues, such as we often hear from demagogueical aspirants to political station, and especially if he should undertake to treat at groceries and elsewhere in order to obtain additional votes, as to the disgrace of the times and country is yet seen to take place, he would find himself very soon utterly discountenanced by the voters themselves and compelled to retire from the canvass in disgrace and discomfiture. With all proper deference to the judgment of others, I feel bound to urge that it never was reasonable to expect from a Supreme Court whose members owe their appointment to the President and Senate, the exhibition of that perfect independence of action, which can alone secure the liberties of the country from unauthorised encroachment. It is but natural that the judges should feel more or less partiality for the source whence they have themselves derived power; and accordingly, in the various contests that have from time to time ensued in the Supreme Court of the Union, in which the rights of the States and the fundamental principles of popular liberty have been involved, we find that the decisions of that tribunal, have almost without exception, been rendered in favor of the Federal government, and against the states and people. It is obvious that there is something in the constitution of the court itself calculated to federalise those who belong to it; and it is believed that though many have at different times been appointed to Federal judgeships who were thought to be excellent democrats at the time of their appointment, but few have been able to escape the contaminating influence of such promotion for a longer period than four or five years.

The elder Adams seems to have had very clear and accurate views on the subject; and when Federalism was overthrown at the ballot-box in 1800, and his own defeat had been ascertained, he looked to the Supreme Court of the Union, for the ultimate restoration of Federal ascendancy. Accordingly, he appointed, even up to the last moment of his Presidential term, such judges as he believed could be relied on for the effectuation of a purpose so dear to him. His discernment has been well attested by subsequent experience; for, not only have the decisions of the Supreme Court, a majority of whose judges have been generally, if not always, Federalists in principle, been oftentimes stamped with the most unalloyed federalism; but these decisions, for the most part marked with high ability, however unsound in doctrine, prepared for publication with singular care and circulating in well-bound volumes throughout the Union, have been received into all the law libraries of the country, and have gradually obtained so much control over even the State courts themselves, and the lawyers who attend them, that there is obviously much danger of the entire overthrow of sound principles of government, by the instrumentality of Federal adjudication. This would in fact have been long since the case, but that the political complexion of the Supreme Court was more or less modified by General Jackson and Mr. Van Buren, through the appointment of persons, to supply vacancies occasionally arising upon the bench of the Supreme Court, distinguished as much for their sterling democratic opinions and predelections, as for their fitness in other respects for the discharge of judicial duties.

Entertaining these views, Mr. President, Senators will not be much surprised at my declaring, that I shall be more than willing at all times, to lend a helping hand to the work of constitutional reform, suggested by the Senator from Ohio; and I hope that the day is not far distant, when either the distinguished Senator from Ohio, or some other Senator whose high character and long continuance in the public service, would give weight and dignity to the movement, will bring forward a regular proposition for such an amendment of the Federal Constitution, as will make the judges of the Supreme Court elective by the people of the Union, and limit the period of their continuance, in office to a short term of years, instead of installing them for life, above all responsibility to their fellow-citizens, whose servants and agents they are.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, then took the floor, with a view of addressing the Senate, but the hour being late,

STATE PAPERS OF TEXAS.

NEW YORK AND NEW ORLEANS STEAMERS.

Mr. DIX, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the memorial of J. Howard & Son, in reporting a bill extending privileges to American vessels engaged in a certain mentioned trade, and for other purposes, said: As he wished to ask the action of the Senate on it this morning, he would briefly explain its object. It authorizes steamships and other vessels, going from one domestic port to another, to touch at one or more foreign ports to land and receive passengers and their baggage, letters, &c. The immediate object is to enable the vessels of a line of steamships about to be established between New York and New Orleans to touch at Havana. As they must under existing laws be considered as engaged in the coasting trade, they cannot go to a foreign port without becoming liable to forfeiture, if they are licensed and enrolled, and without subjecting the merchandize they are carrying from one port to another to impost duties, if they are registered, as they would be engaged in foreign trade. The bill provides against the latter inconvenience and embarrassment by authorizing them, when registered, to touch at one or more foreign ports to land passengers, &c., but not to land or receive goods, and exempting from duty any merchandize they may have on board, on which the impost has already been paid. The committee have made the regulation general, seeing no reason why all vessels should not be put on the same footing. As the line of steam vessels referred to is about to commence operations, he asked the immediate consideration of the bill.

The bill was then read the second time, by unanimous consent, and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate.

The question being upon ordering the bill to be engrossed, and read a third time.

Mr. HALE observed that this was an important bill, and he desired that it should lie over until to-morrow, to afford him an opportunity to examine it.

Mr. DIX said he had no objection to the bill lying over for one day; and the question on ordering it to be engrossed, and read a third time was accordingly postponed until to-morrow.

Resolved, That James Edwards is not entitled to relief.

The Senate proceeded to consider the report of the Committee on Indian Affairs, on the petition of George S. Gaines; and in concurrence therewith, it was Resolved, That the claim ought to be rejected.

The Senate proceeded to consider the report of the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, upon the petition of Nancy Haggard.

Mr. UNDERWOOD moved to amend the resolution at the close of the report, by striking out the words "be rejected" and inserting "is reasonable and ought to be allowed; and that the petition be recommitted to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, with instructions to report a bill for the relief of the petitioner."

Mr. UNDERWOOD.—The case involved in the report is this. Some years ago a bill passed both branches of Congress and was approved by the President, allowing commutation pay to the petitioner in this case as the representative of her father. The application now, is to allow interest for the time during which the payment was deferred. The only question is, whether in such a case, the interest ought to be allowed. The petition refers to some hundreds of cases where interest has been allowed. Latterly, however, in some few cases it has been refused; but the question seems to have been pretty well settled by Congress inasmuch as it has been allowed in at least ten cases to one where it has not.

Mr. UPHAM.—The petition does set forth many cases in which interest has been allowed, but it does not furnish the evidence upon which the commutation pay was allowed. I believe in this case, the committee refused to allow the interest on the ground that it was not the practice to do so. Indeed, the committee thought that although the claims were originally well founded, if the petitioner had a right to claim interest it should have been done by application to the Commissioner of Pensions at the time when the claim for commutation pay was allowed. But having allowed the claim to slumber for about fifty years without making any demand upon the government, the committee are of opinion that interest could not accrue until a demand was made.

Mr. UNDERWOOD.—I rise merely to state that no default on the part of the claimant here or of our ancestors, can prejudice the claim of an infant. The evidence will show that her ancestor was killed in one of the early battles of the revolution when she was an infant only a few months old. Of course you could not expect an application by the infant, nor can any thing like laches apply to the case. The passage of the bill heretofore allowing this commutation pay superceded the necessity of presenting the evidence of the claim before the committee, and the petition therefore simply cites the cases in which interest has been allowed, and asks Congress to do her the same justice that has been done in other cases.

The question being put upon agreeing to the amendment, it was determined in the negative.

The question then recurred upon concurring in the report, and it was determined in the affirmative; and it was

Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioner be rejected.

The Senate proceeded to consider the report of the Committee of Claims, upon the petition of George Hervey, and in concurrence therewith, it was Resolved, That the prayer of George Hervey, agent for the owners and consignees of the English ship James Mitchell ought not to be granted.

LESLIE COMBS.

The Senate proceeded to consider the report of the Committee on the Judiciary upon the petition of Leslie Combs; and in concurrence therewith, it was

Resolved, That the secretary do transmit to the President a copy of the memorial and papers of Leslie Combs, praying the payment by the United States of certain securities issued by the late republic of Texas, with also a copy of this resolution, and the report made in said case, and that the President be requested to cause the same to be communicated to the proper authorities of the State of Texas; and, also, that said memorial and papers be referred to the Attorney General and Secretary of the Treasury, who are directed to obtain full information as to said case, and report thereon to the Senate.

THE SUPREME COURT.

The Senate resumed the consideration, on its third reading, of the bill from the House of Representatives supplemental to the act, entitled "An act concerning the Supreme Court of the United States," approved June 17, 1844.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland.—Had it not been that I rose yesterday to address the Senate on one of the topics connected with this discussion, I should not have troubled them this morning. My motive exclusively to reply to what I thought then, and still think, was a most uncalled for and unjust aspersion upon the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States. I beg leave, however, before addressing myself to the single point which I then intended, to say a word or two upon the bill itself. It presents two questions: the first is, whether there is not an existing evil; the second, whether this bill is not the best, if not the only mode of remedying that evil. The honorable Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ASHLEY] attempted to make the Senate believe that there was no real mischief, and he supposed that he did that by analyzing, as he stated he had done, the number of cases on the docket of the court in order to show how many cases came from the respective States of which this Union is composed; and concluded by seriously telling the Senate that it appeared from his analysis that there were fewer cases from Arkansas and from Maryland pending in the Supreme Court and undecided than there were now to be found undecided in the State courts of Arkansas and Maryland, and thence very logically inferred that there was no evil at all of which any body had a right to complain in the present condition of the docket of the Supreme Court. The Senate, I am sure, is not to be led away by any considerations of this kind. The evil complained of is that there are now citizens of the United States—not States of the United States in their sovreign capacity, or having a right to complain in their sovereign capacity—but that there are citizens of the United States appealing for justice to the Supreme Court of the United States, and appealing in vain. And it is for the Senate to say whether, if there can be a remedy to make the appeal effectual, they will not apply it. Sir, if there was but one single cause in the Supreme Court which ought to be tried—if there was but one single suitor whose rights were denied him by his cause by remaining undecided, and it was in the power of the Senate to have it decided, it would be, in my opinion, our duty to provide at once the remedy. The delay of justice may be so great as to amount to a denial of justice. The fruits of the contest cease to be fruits at all, because of the poverty and hopeless poverty to which the party has been reduced before the contest is at an end. And there is now within the limits of the United States many a man and many a woman whose heart is beating anxiously for the passage of this bill in order that they may be vindicated in rights which they fancied we were secured to them by the constitution and the laws. Sir, the very preamble of the instrument which constitutes your form of government tells you that the government itself was created among others for the very leading object for establishing justice. Now what is the state of the docket of the Supreme Court at this time? At the last term there were some forty or fifty cases tried and decided, each one of which had been before that tribunal for at least two or three years; and yet the suitor is led to believe that by your law his cause will be determined at the first term. The mass of the one hundred and sixty-three cases which still remain undecided, are cases which have been two or three years awaiting a decision, and they are likely to continue undecided two or three years longer, unless you pass some such bill as this. Sir, it is a reproach to the jurisprudence of the country; it is a blot upon the fame of the nation which is more truly consulted in administering justice speedily and well between the citizens, and securing to them the rights which the constitution and the laws have promised to secure, than by any thing else that the government can do.

Sir, it has been well said, that almost the entire object of government is accomplished—almost its whole purpose is gratified, when it has secured an honest and competent tribunal to decide disputes between man and man. Yet the Senator from Arkansas supposes that it is no practical wrong—no wrong at all, that there should now be suitors in the courts of the United States, and in its highest court who have been in vain imploring you for three and even four years to have their rights protected by the judicial power, the only power capable of protecting them.

Mr. ASHLEY.—The honorable Senator mistakes what I said. I have not stated that it is not wrong to delay decisions. I admit the wrong. I admit it to be an evil, but I say the Supreme Court has the power to remedy the evil.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I understood the Senator differently; I thought he said it was not an evil comparatively, because a greater existed in the courts of the States.

Mr. ASHLEY.—I said that a much greater evil exists in the subordinate courts.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I am glad I misapprehended the Senator. It is an evil then—and the question is, how is it to be remedied? But, says the Senator, the remedy is in the hands of the judges themselves, and how?—by confining counsel to the points actually at issue. This is more easily said than done. Sir, it is an evil here, and one of which the press is every day complaining, that we talk too much. We do not confine ourselves strictly to the subject before us. The honorable Senator himself, though I do not wish to say any thing disrespectful, affords an exemplification of it. A stronger instance could not be given. The honorable Senator discusses points out of order, and then gravely tells us that the evil in the Supreme Court could be corrected if the court thought proper to correct speaking out of order. Sir, it is an evil, but it is natural to the American character, because the constant attendant upon free institutions. The honorable Senator said too, that he could not imagine any case that would require an argument of more than an hour and a half or two hours. I was not a little surprised to hear such a remark from a chairman of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate of the United States, well versed, as he manifestly is, in judicial matters. He is not to be told, sir, that case after case occurs, in which three, four, five, six, or even ten and eleven hours have been exhausted in argument strictly pertinent in a strain of eloquence directly bearing upon the point at issue, no part of which could have been omitted without spoiling, in some measure, the effect of the whole. Who is to determine when the argument is irrelevant? Such, sir, is the diversity of human intellect, who can tell what course of argument will succeed with each one of the nine judges. Of one which would be sufficient if you were addressing a simple judge would be thrown away as entirely useless, if addressed to some other judge.

It was requisite from the number constituting the tribunal as in the case before a jury, that you should at times elaborate your argument, and present every possible view of the case in order that you may address yourself effectually to the understanding of every judge. But I concede that the speeches are at times entirely too long, and I concede that the court has the power, if they think proper, to exercise it, and that they should exercise it, to restrain them. But it is a very dangerous power to be applied in all cases—exceedingly dangerous—and it is a power, permit me to say to the honorable Senator from Arkansas, of the exercise of which we, a portion of the people of the United States, would complain more than many of the democracy. They would say at once it was interfering with the freedom of speech. There was a case in the Supreme Court at the last term, which involved the constitutionality of the famous Dorr government in Rhode Island. I heard pamphlet after pamphlet, fourth of July speech after fourth of July speech, written and delivered years ago, read before that tribunal to prove that a free people have the right to establish that form of government they think best. Sir, I imagine that if the Chief Justice, speaking for himself and his associates, had said that no such authority should be cited, the press of the country would have run mad, particularly if the result had been, as in all probability it will be, that on the unanimous judgment of that tribunal, the Dorr revolution was nothing but naked and inexcusable rebellion. Besides, sir, as to stopping counsel in their argument, which of the judges is to take it upon himself to do so. Is it to be left to any one of them, to the Chief Justice, to say what point is to be argued and what not? Is he to arrest counsel? My life for it before such a rule is practised for one term, the Chief Justice would be told by some one of his associates, on either side of him, that it was a point on which he wished to be enlightened.

Mr. President, I have said all that I propose to say upon this part of the subject. But there is one other point at which I will briefly glance, before considering the topic which caused me to rise yesterday, and that is as to the remedy for the evil which exists. What is the remedy that is proposed by the honorable Senators from Arkansas and Ohio, [Messrs. ASHLEY, and ALLEN.] If I did not know the elevated character of both the Senators, I should almost be induced to think from the remarks which have fallen from them, that they wish to keep up the present condition of things, in order to bring about the change which they have in view, and which they suppose will lead to good practical results. What is that change? It is the election of the judges by the people, and for a limited period of service. I do not know how the system works in Mississippi, except upon the authority of the honorable Senator from that State, [Mr. FOOTE.] I do not know how it has operated in Arkansas and Ohio, but unless all history is false, unless man's nature has become entirely changed, unless he has become a different being from that which God originally made him, and judging of him as he has heretofore been, it is impossible but that in the end, such a system can be productive of any thing but unmixed mischief. Let us in the first place, sir, see how they are to be elected, if the change be made. Will they be elected by the people? No, sir, the people will have no more to do with it than they have with the election, as times are, of the President of the United States. They will be elected by a convention.—New York changed the tenure of office of her judges, and changed the mode of their appointment, by the late modification of her constitution, and her judges have recently been elected; and in what manner? By the nomination of a political convention, and if we could make this change now, the convention which is announced to meet in Baltimore sometime in next month will be found nominating our judges, as well as the President. It will be a party contest, and we shall have the melancholy spectacle exhibited—a spectacle pregnant with nothing but evil, not only of having the rights of a minority, subjected to a legislative majority—subjected to the action of a party Executive; but, the most direful of all political ills, we shall have them subjected to the decision of a partisan Judiciary. Sir, when such a day comes, the history of this nation will have been told. The constitution, of which we are so justly proud, as it came to us from our ancestors, will not be worth the parchment on which it stands inscribed. No man will then feel secure in his rights of person or of property; and I say it with no disrespect of the people—with no distrust of the people—with no distrust of a majority upon any of these subjects upon which a majority ought to act, but regarding what has ever been the nature of mankind, and consulting the whole history of the civilized world, I state to the Senate and the country, that if the day come when our judiciary is to be selected by a party, and for a limited term, by a popular vote, the rights of the American people will not be as valuable as were those enjoyed by the French people before their late revolution.—Sir, it is not only that the mode of appointment is wrong, but that the other provisions to which both the learned Senators refer, make it still more pregnant with danger, that is the times of appointment, the tenure of office, the re-eligibility of the judges; for you will find judges turning their action upon the bench with a view to re-election, as we find political men guiding their action every where, with a view to the same result. And if there happens to be any particularly, or supposed particularly, influential man around them, whether lawyer or client, upon whom it may be supposed their election depends, they will have especial regard to his interests, and exert all possible means of conciliation towards him. No, sir, the men who framed the constitution of the United States knew the peril of such a judiciary. They were the men, too, of an age deeply versed in man's history, and deeply imbued with all the principles of freedom which he is capable of enjoying; and of course imbued, too, with a sense of justice without which freedom cannot survive. If you look at the proceedings of the convention which formed the constitution, you will find that there was not a single man who suggested that the tenure of the judiciary should be limited. Not one. What is the inevitable result of a change in both of the particulars I have stated? If the present system has worked wrong; if it now works wrong, why is it? Because it is not practicable, not physically practicable, for the judges of the Supreme Bench to discharge all the duties imposed upon them.

Mr. President, some two or three years ago I made an excursion to Europe, and there, among the many things that I observed heard, which made me love and admire my own country more even than when I left it, was to hear from men whose praise is worth having, that that which distinguished the United States more than any thing else, in the judgment of Europe, was the able, pure, and elevated character of our judicial decisions. It is unnecessary to name names; if I were to do so, the Senate would at once see that the compliment was sincere, and must have been deserved, or would not have been paid. In speaking of the late Chief Justice of the United States and Mr. Justice Story, I heard not only from one, but from many, that the world had rarely produced such men; and yet the decisions referred to in those opinions are now by some of ourselves supposed to have come from a tribunal vicious in its organization, because wrong in its mode of appointment. And yet those very decisions would have done honor to any judiciary of any nation upon earth. Among other things the foreigners to whom I allude, said what I felt to be true, with the exception of one or two instances, and they of very recent occurrence, that the ability and purity of our bench was owing in a great measure, in their judgment, not only to the mode of their appointment and the tenure of office, but also and materially to the entire separation of the judiciary from all the political questions and aspirations of the day. There are one or two exceptions of modern origin, and I trust in God they will stand the only exceptions to the general character of our judicial tribunals.

"Sir, the honorable Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. FOOTE,] the other day, in terms unpleasantly harsh to my ear, if he will permit me to say so, thought proper, in reference to one of those instances, to speak of an appeal recently made by one of the justices of the Supreme Court to the citizens of the United States, upon an exciting political subject of the times—an appeal which no one regretted more than I did, and which I am satisfied, in his cooler judgment, the distinguished judge himself will, with the exception of one or —an appeal which every sincere friend of the judge and of the court greatly lamented, because he could not but feel that it has cast something like a shade upon the past absolute and unsuspected purity of the whole bench. But, sir, the judgment of the public, in its almost universal censure of the step, will effectually guard against its repetition. In my opinion, Mr. President, a judge should be seperated not only while he is upon the bench, but forever, from all the agitating political topics of the day. Once a judge, he should be ever a judge. The ermine should never be polluted, nor suspected of pollution; it should be the very type of justice of herself—pure, spotless, faultless.

Now, sir, to the purpose which caused me to trouble the Senate at all—a word or two in reply to the honorable Senators from Ohio and Arkansas, [Messrs. ASHLEY and ALLEN.] I am sure they will pardon me for saying, because I believe they will do me the justice to believe that I say it in all sincerity, that their assault upon the judges was not only most unjust and unnecessarily harsh, but totally unfounded. Those Senators, sir, can hardly have been aware of the force of their own language, and especially must that have been the case with the honorable Senator from Ohio. What was it, sir? That the judges have, at all times, been themselves the authors of all applications to Congress for change and relief from their circuit duties which have been made. The honorable Senator from Arkansas, a few days ago, stated that these changes have been effected by them at their instance, for their ease and their comfort; and among others, that the act of June 3d, 1844, relieving them from one half of their circuit duties, had been passed at their instance. The honorable Senator said yesterday, which caused me inexpressible surprise, that the act of 1844 was passed for the very purpose of enabling the court to cure the then evil, the accumulated business of the Supreme Court, and prevent its recurrence, and that it was amply competent to accomplish that object; but that the judges availed themselves of the law to save themselves from circuit duty without complying with the law, which as a substitute for circuit duties imposed upon them Supreme Court duties. Sir, as to one of the judges, I know—and I am sure it is true of all, that charge has not a shadow of foundation. If one can, without impropriety, be allowed in debate, to indulge in expressions of personal friendship, the relation in which I stand to the present Chief Justice, I tell both of these Senators that there never was a more harsh, unjust, and unfounded aspersion made upon any man, if he is to be considered as falling within its scope. A gentleman over seventy years of age, constitutionally feeble, I know that up to the very moment of his coming to Washington to perform the duties of his high station here, he has ever presided in his own circuit in Maryland; and I know that the day after he leaves his business here, he is often to be found in his Maryland circuit, where he is now, performing circuit duties. And I may be pardoned for saying, that whatever differences of opinion may be entertained of his conduct as a public man, before he was called to adorn the bench, no man lives who can point to error or imprudence of his, except, it may be, some error of judgment—and if there be any error of that kind I am yet to learn it—since he has been upon the bench. Studiously abstaining from all the party contests of the day, he has devoted himself to his judicial duties, with an industry, learning, and ability, which challenging admiration, have proved him to be a worthy successor of a judge, whose fame fills the world of jurisprudence. To say of an ornament of this description that he gets the act of 1844 passed by a false pretence, (for that is the substance of the charge,) and that having secured it, he avails himself of it to relieve himself from a portion of his duty, without seeking or caring to accomplish the object which we were told it was designed to accomplish, is to charge him with a crime.

What is true of him will be true of all the other judges; and who are they? How came they to occupy the places they fill? Sir, I rejoice—no matter how they came there, no matter what were the motives for putting them there—and it is a fact eminently calculated to establish the wisdom of a life tenure of office, that the moment they got there, they became judges, emphatically judges, ceasing to be politicians, (if they ever were) divested of every political prejudice, men pure and unspotted, looking to duty as their guide, and duty alone. Who put them there? Who put these men there, thus denounced by the honorable Senator from Ohio? Why, sir, nearly all of them were selected by him, who the friends of the honorable Senator were in the habit of saying, was second only to Washington—the others with the exception of only one, I believe, by him whose chief boast it was, that he would "tread in the footsteps of his illustrious predecessor." Now, sir, is it not a little singular that judges—gentlemen of pure and spotless character in private life before they were appointed, and against whom not a whisper of suspicion has been heard from any quarter, should for the first time, be denounced in the Senate, by their former political friends on this floor, as having been false to their duty—as having designedly brought about the present condition of things in the court, and in order to effect a change in the judicial system, for their own advantage. The honorable Senator from Mississippi, read to us the other day some pamphlet, anonymous I believe it was—which as I understood him, had changed the original opinion he had entertained on the subject of this bill, in order to prove to the Senate that it was seriously contemplated by the judges to throw off their circuit duties, upon the ground that they were unconstitutionally imposed upon them. Sir, if every judge has asserted this, I will not say that he is unfit for his station; he stands upon that question alone. The language of the constitution is that the judges shall be vested "in one Supreme Court," and in such inferior courts, as the Congress may from time to time "ordain and establish." Under this power, it was originally a question whether the judges of the Supreme Court could be made judges of the inferior courts. But it was decided long ago, that they could. Millions and millions of dollars have been decided under the law, devolving circuit duties upon them, and many a poor man has expiated his offences under it, and however unwilling the court may generally be to stop counsel in argument, I will venture to say they would not suffer the constitutionality of their law to be questioned before them. Now, sir, permit me to ask these honorable Senators what is to be gained by fulminating such anathemas against the judges of the highest tribunal in the country? What character is to be established by it, what reputation, what honor in the eyes of the world, is to be won by it? What practical good will it do among our own citizens, what is to be accomplished by it? It can only tend to shake the confidence of the public in the integrity of the highest tribunal of the country. To shake the confidence of the public in the Senate of the United States, bad as that would be, would be nothing in comparison with creating an impression upon the public mind, that the judiciary of the country is not to be trusted. Sir, it has been our pride, and we have just cause to be proud of it, that—as far as I know—in no single instance has the American judiciary been found to be corruptible. Honor is synonymous with the bench. The people know that they can go there with the certainty that their rights will be protected. They regard the judges as men of the highest learning and ability, governed in all their actions by the strictest virtue, elevated and adorned by everything which can confer moral dignity upon man; yet the two honorable Senators think they are doing a great public service by denouncing our highest judges before the world and the country, as corrupt. For, though they do not use the term corruption, they use language that admits of no other meaning. But, suppose it were all true—as it is all false—what argument does it furnish against this bill? The Senators propose no change of the system; they suggest no impeachment of the judges; they condemn them without a hearing. What is to become of the suitors before the court? Are their cases to remain unheard, and undecided, because some Senators on this floor doubt the integrity of the judges? March up, gentlemen, to the line to which your opinions properly carry you. Get your impeachments ready—bring in the judges here for trial! No such course is dreamed of.

Now, sir, as to the labors of the bench. Both the honorable Senators said, I believe, that they knew nothing of the labors of the bench. The Senator from Arkansas told us that he had seldom been in the Supreme Court. The Senator from Ohio attempted to distinguish between the labors of the judges here, and the labors of judges in the inferior courts; and tells us, though he knows little of either, that in the latter the duties were much the most oppressive. Why, sir, the Senator has not the most remote idea of the labors of the bench; and I may say it with no disparagement to him, because he has pursued a different course of life from the profession of the law, which, of course, he would have adorned had he pursued it. Sir, the labors of these judges are herculean. Their physical labor breaks them down at the end of six or seven weeks. The arduous labor which he has undergone has alone brought the Chief Justice to the very verge of death, some three or four times since he has been placed upon the bench, one of its most illustrious ornaments. The Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER,] told you of their labors, yesterday. I know them, perhaps, still more intimately than he does. They meet at eleven o'clock, and hear arguments until four. They then retire to their rooms; dine at five; go into consultation almost every day at seven; sit until nine, ten, eleven, or twelve at night. In the morning, generally, their opinions are prepared, books have to be examined, records are to be pored over. Yes, sir, records, many of them of themselves almost frightful to look at, even, with a view to the mere reading, which is absolutely necessary, in order to be certain that no error is made—records of two, three, four, or five hundred pages to be gone over word by word—authorities without number, owing to the multiplicity of reports to be examined; and no judge does his duty if he does not look at every thing that is exhibited before him. Look at the reports of their decision Every term gives us a volume of eight or nine hundred pages—sometimes two volumes, almost entirely the result of their own labors. Why, Mr. President, how do we feel here after one of our long sessions, lasting until seven or eight o'clock at night? Let each one judge of others as he would have others judge of him. Who leaves this chamber after the excitement of a debate, and particularly after a long session, without being mentally and physically exhausted? Why, during our late secret sessions when a subject relating to a foreign negotiation was occupying our attention, and our sittings extended to eight or nine o'clock at night, what was our situation? A judge of the Supreme Court is obliged to be up at day-break, having little or no time for relaxation or even sleep. We go to our sleep, and sleep long, and come back here only at 12 o'clock on the following day, having, comparatively, no morning labor for the body or the mind. The labors of a former day finds us nevertheless exhausted, and what have we done in comparison unto the labors of the Supreme Bench? I say it with no reflection upon this body—no one holds in higher estimation than I do, the intellectual qualities of its members—but what are our labors compared with those of the judges? They are nothing, literally nothing. I have seen them, sir, barely able to hold a pen in the morning, because of the utter prostration of the nervous system by the labors of the antecedent night. Yet, compelled to be in court at 11 o'clock—compelled to take up new cases heaped upon them continually, and forced to go through the same routine of labor from day to day until the hour of final adjournment arrives. Sir, they deserve to be honored and applauded instead of aspersed. They have not done more, because they cannot do more. Sir, they are all, and should be all comparatively old men. I do not wish to see young men placed upon the bench of such a tribunal. There is many a crude thought in the mind of a young man which the reflection of riper years enables him to see the folly of. They ought to have arrived at the period when man is found to possess the greatest vigor of mind and a matured experience. What is the result? The mind has become matured, but the body has, in a degree, decayed. The physical strength has been wasted whilst the mental power has increased. No one is able to go through the labor of sitting for ten or twelve weeks in succession, engaged in duties of this description, without suffering the exhaustion which necessarily follows. I have heard it intimated, that the business of the court may be somewhat diminished by repealing the 28th section of the judiciary act, and by increasing the pecuniary amount which can be carried by a writ of error into the Supreme Court. As to the repeal of that section of the Judiciary act, I hope, sir, it may never be done. It is the most conservative provision in the law. The very Union has, I am satisfied, been preserved by it. It would not continue, in my judgment, even now that most of the constitutional questions are supposed to be settled, twenty years without it or without some equivalent substitute. Such a remedy as that, therefore, would be worse, ten thousand times worse than a disease. Any evil, sir, but that most direful of all evils, the disruption of our Union. Loss of freedom is alone to be compared to the loss of the Union. Nor, indeed, can freedom be lost, if the Union is in good faith preserved. But if you do both, that will not get clear of the present evil. It is one which cannot be obviated in any other way than by a law authorizing the judges of that court to give their exclusive attention to the business of the court until it is concluded. At the end of the year, you will find the docket will be entirely free. As a measure called for imperatively, in order that justice be done between suitors, then this bill or something like it should pass.

Mr. ALLEN.—The Senator who has just taken his seat, is not only an able lawyer by the common consent of this whole country, but he is likewise a very adroit and skilful advocate of whatever he undertakes to defend. He is too much so, not to know the great advantage which that party in every controversy has, who can impress the tribunal with the belief that he has been attacked, and that therefore he is on the defensive. For that reason the Senator from Maryland represents the Supreme Court as the object of assault, and as the object which is therefore entitled to public sympathy, at the very onset of the case. This is skilful. It is professional. It shows that the gentleman understands how to advance and maintain the position which he takes. But how is it that this tribunal has been assailed? Who brought it here? Who put their case upon the docket? We did not. Here is one of the departments of this government, which by its friends asks a change in its business. It is a public department, transacting public business, under the laws of the land, by which that business is prescribed. The members of that department come forward and ask the legislative authority of the country to pass a law exempting them from the performance of a certain portion of their duties. That is the state of this case. The reason assigned for granting this request is, that they are not competent to discharge the duties prescribed under the present law. It is said that they have not time to do the business of the Supreme Court at Washington City. In answer to that, we allege that they have time, and that by a bill passed three years ago, we exempted them from a portion of their duties.

Mr. BADGER.—(In his seat,)—Four years ago.

Mr. ALLEN.—Four years ago by express law, we exempted them from a portion of their duties, in order that they might have time to attend to all the business at Washington; and we now ask why have they not completed the docket? To that question the honorable Senator makes no reply, and yet it is the turning point in this case. Although I am not profoundly skilled in legal matters, or legal advocacy, having withdrawn at a very early age from that profession, and devoted myself to other pursuits, yet I am enough of an advocate to know where the true point of the case lies, and to hold the adverse party to it. I therefore reply to the whole of the argument of the able Senator from Maryland, by asking him again to answer this question. Why did the court not dispense with the spring circuit, and sit six or eight months at Washington, in order to discharge this docket? That is the main point here. The court desire by the present bill to get rid of the whole of the circuit duties for one year. Now if having been exempted from one half of these duties for three years, the docket is crowded with one hundred and sixty odd cases, how can it be expected that a total exemption from these duties for one year will remedy this evil?

The honorable Senator from Maryland pronounces a eulogy upon the Chief Justice; in every word of which I acquiesce. I am no enemy to the Chief Justice, or any other man on that bench. I believe that I voted to confirm a majority of the members of that court. I stood by the Chief Justice when he wanted a friend. When he was in need of a friend I was at his back Then as now I was among the foremost of his friends. I stood by the other judges of that court, when they were before this body, when they needed friends, and when my absence would have consigned them to other stations than places upon the bench of the Supreme Court. I stood by one of these judges, when at the hour of one at night it was necessary to send the Sergeant-at-Arms to procure the attendance of a sufficient number of members, to obtain the confirmation of his appointment. And now I stand by all the judges, and likewise by the country. But I am charged with assailing the tribunal, because I will not give them the power to do that which the law already empowers them to do, but which they have not done. The honorable Senator from Maryland in his great zeal to defend the court, although not assailed, expressed the opinion that what I have said here amounts to a charge of corruption against that court. Such an idea never entered my mind. I had no more idea of charging any member of that tribunal with corruption, than I had of charging the Senate with corruption. But when they come and ask me to relieve them from the duty of attending circuit court, and at the same time it is plain that they have not released themselves from holding the first circuit, though the law authorizes them so to do, I must ask them the question, why have you not employed the six or eight months of the preceding year to discharge this docket? The law authorized you to do it. The honorable Senator says that the Chief Justice is in favor of this measure. If my memory serves me right, I think I have something like a tolerably good reason to believe that the Chief Justice is not exactly in favor of this bill. I have not conversed with him upon the subject, but I think I have heard an account from other sources, that the Chief Justice is not in favor of the adoption of this bill.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland.—I had intended to say a word upon the point which the Senator supposes I have not answered. The act of 1844 relieves the judges from attendance upon one circuit, but it does not say whether the spring or the fall circuit shall be the term from which they are to be exempted. The same act makes it the duty of the court to be in Washington upon the 1st Monday in December. Well, some of the circuit courts are held at such a distance from this city that the judges cannot hold these courts and be here by the first Monday in December. So that some of the judges are compelled to pass by the fall circuit, obliging the court to adjourn at such a period as will enable them to attend the spring circuits. Whilst up, if the Senator will permit, I will take occasion to read a single sentence from a private letter, which, in the present circumstances, I feel at liberty to do. In a letter dated in Baltimore, on the 14th of this month, the Chief Justice remarks that a Senator who had taken part in this debate was not aware of the state of business in the Supreme Court, and adds, "I am convinced that the public interests require the passage of this bill, and upon that account it has always been, and still is, my earnest wish that the Senate pass the bill now before them."

Mr ALLEN.—In answer to the explanation of the Senator from Maryland, that the circuit court duty is arranged so as to render the act of 1844 ineffective, I would say that this bill ought to be made to amend that act so as to conform the circuits to the assembling of the judges. I predicated my remarks upon the answer given to the question proposed by me to the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, who said that there had been but two or three instances of superior courts being held since the act of '44. If there be an error then, the error is not mine. If, however, the Senator was right in the statement that there had been but one or two instances of more than one term being held in each court since this act was passed, it is a sufficient answer to the argument of the Senator from Maryland, that this act conflicted with the holding of these courts. I deemed it necessary to make these observations without going into the general matter, and would now only make one remark. When this discussion first commenced, I saw what it would lead to, and I admonished the friends of this bill and the friends of this court, that if they wished to see this tribunal retain its present organization, they should do nothing to cut it loose from its communication with the States and the people. I stated to them the circuit feature of the system was the only one that connected the Supreme Court of the United States with the people of the States; that it was to that extent something of a popular institution, and that upon that feature rested the strength of the popularity of the court with the country, and that the moment they separated the tribunal from its intercourse with the States and the people of this Union, and gave it a central, separate, isolated existence, as a sort of Washington star chamber, that moment they would find the public mind calling for a reform in the judicial system. That was the language which I held at the beginning of this discussion, and every thing that has transpired since, confirms me in the justice of that view.

Mr. BUTLER.—For myself I can speak of one of the judges of the Supreme Court, Judge Wayne. It will be no favor to him to pass this bill. He has performed circuit duty during the last fall, and I may say the same of several others. It is not to relieve them of circuit duties, that they desire the passage of this measure. Whilst up allow me to say that in speaking of the nominees of the President, it was entirely in reference to such as had been referred to by the honorable chairman from the Committee on the Judiciary. He spoke of them as unworthy magistrates as imbecile and incompetent. In my remark I had reference to the observations of the honorable chairman himself, and I did not wish to be understood as having gratuitously made any charges against the character of any gentleman.

Mr. BADGER next addressed the Senate.—He alluded to the various matters which had been in his opinion unimportant, which had been irregularly brought forward in connection with the bill. It was solely with reference to the merits of the measure itself, that he desired to occupy a very few moments of the time of the Senate. If any other gentleman designed to attribute corrupt or unworthy motives to the judges of the Supreme Court, he certainly disclaimed any such design, or any such feeling. His opposition to the bill was based upon the principle which he had stated in his remarks a few days since. It was because he was in the highest sense of the term a friend of the court, that he opposed the bill. He believed that it was essential to the efficiency of that court, that the judges should attend to circuit duties. The fact that the exemption from one circuit in the year had not prevented the accumulation of business in the Central Court, afforded abundant evidence that the remedy proposed by the bill would be ineffectual, except upon the view presented by his friend from Maryland, which he would presently notice. If the judges commencing in December had occupied that month, and the five succeeding months in the sessions of the Supreme Court, commencing in 1845, pursuing it in 1846, and continuing it in 1847, it was impossible to avoid the conviction that these one hundred and sixty odd cases could not have been left upon the docket. Nay, there could not have been forty cases left upon the docket. But it was stated by the Senator from Maryland, that by the continued term of the court the judges became broken down and exhausted in body and mind. Be it so—could they not have taken relaxation by keeping the court formally open, adjourning from day to day, for a month, if necessary? Again it was argued that some of the fall circuits were so late that the judges could not attend to them, and be here in December. Could there not have been judges enough to form a quorum on the first Monday in December, suppose that for the first fortnight in that month, they could not attend to business, still was there not the remedy open to themselves of continuing these sessions to the spring? It was then, to his mind, very evident that the act of 1844 might have been adequate to relieve the docket. He would be very sorry to imagine that the judges were capable of wilful neglect of their duties. He felt more and more convinced of the propriety of the views which he had expressed the other day, with regard to their permission of idle and unprofitable discussion. He was confident that all members of the bar of character and intelligence would acquiesce in the adoption of any rule by which the arguments before the court should be restrained within due limits. As for the denunciations of the press, to which the honorable Senator had alluded, he thought that was a consideration not deserving of any attention in the present case. The judges had been made independent in order that they might act entirely irrespective of any such influence. He had heard nothing in the course of the debate which satisfied him that there was any necessity for the passage of the bill. The Senator from Kentucky had remarked, that the judges had the power to omit their circuit duties, and that this bill was only designed to compel them to do so. Certainly the judges could not have misunderstood the purport of the act of 1844, which was passed at their instance, and which sufficiently expressed the will of the legislature. It seemed to him that the power of the court was already ample to relieve it of the accumulation of business, and believing, as he had already said, that the natural and obvious tendency of the measure now before the Senate, if adopted, will be the separation of the judges from the daily legal business of the country—to shut them out from the view of the people, whose rights they determined—and to produce the most deleterious consequences; he, therefore, must vote against it.

Mr. ASHLEY then briefly summed up the arguments which he had advanced against the bill, and replied to the objections which had been urged in its favor. The remarks of the honorable Senator will be found embodied in his speech on this subject, in the Appendix.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—If there were any other consideration than my anxiety to have a decision upon this bill, it would induce me to refrain from making any lengthened observations. I will endeavor, in a very few calm remarks to-day, to close what I have to say upon the subject; and I would embrace this opportunity to say, that if any of the observations which I have made in the course of the debate on this bill, have given offence in any quarter, I regret it very sincerely. I have never seen a measure, sir, which seems to me so unimportant and inconsequential in itself, excite so much alarm. The bill does not propose to alter or change the present federal judicial system of the United States in principle or in the slightest degree. The measure is intended simply, as one of relief—of temporary relief—and has no tendency to any disturbance of the system, and yet it seems to strike upon the minds of wise men—I do not speak ironically—with serious alarm. Well, what is the bill which threatens to make the Supreme Court judges exclusively the judges of that court, and to lead to the establishment of another set of judges for the performance of circuit duties? Four years ago, the Congress of the United States sensible, that at the ordinary term of that court, they could not despatch the business, passed the law referred to by the gentleman from North Carolina, providing that the judges should omit one circuit, and employ the time which would have been thus occupied, in the discharge of the duties of the Supreme Court, giving them discretion in the matter. That law has failed to produce the intended effect. I charge the judges with no neglect; I vindicate them from no charge of neglect. It is an admitted fact, that the bill had no sort of effect.

It has been argued that they might have continued in session until all the business was done, but that is not the meaning of the law according to my views

It is argued that if the judges had thought it necessary, or had considered that their Supreme Court duties were more important than those of the circuit court, they would have continued their session. The argument is that it was upon a sense of duty that they went to their circuits. I ask gentlemen if there is no other way of accounting for it? I ask those gentlemen especially, who are desirous that indulgence should be extended to the court, can they not imagine that after a session of three months and a half, the judges may have been so much exhausted as to have felt themselves incapable of continuing their labors in the Supreme Court? May not this be a reason of their adjournment? There may have been those among the judges who thought it best to go on with the business of the Supreme Court, but there were others who were disposed to attend to their circuit duties. In this way the law has proved inoperative—it has not prolonged the session of the court a single hour. They adjourn just in time to go to their circuits, as before. It furnishes a cause, or apology, for adjourning. The inutility, then, of your law, so long as it leaves them a choice to adjourn or not, at their pleasure, is apparent.

What does this bill propose? Not to give a choice to the judges, in the matter—not to make it dependent upon circumstances whether they shall continue their labors in the Supreme Court or not: but it declares that they shall come here and confine their attention to the duties of the Supreme Court until the docket is discharged, if it can be done within the space of one year. Now, what objection can there be to the passage of such a bill? When the act of 1844, to which reference has been made, was passed, there was no such sensitiveness manifested; there were none of those constitutional arguments which we now hear; there were then no invectives against the court. The subject was calmly considered. Congress was of opinion that a remedy was necessary, and they determined to provide the remedy, by dispensing with one term of their circuit duties. That remedy has proved inefficient, and the reason is apparent—because it was left discretionary with the judges to proceed with their Supreme Court duties, or not, as they pleased. If you wish to render the remedy effectual, say, in the language of this bill, that the business of the Supreme Court shall receive their undivided attention.

Gentlemen argue that the court can apply the remedy by a curtailment of argument, and a strict application to business.—Well, this is a matter wholly within the discretion of the court, and one which we cannot well control. But I should hope, now that the subject has engaged public attention, that a greater economy of time will be practised when they again meet, and I have no doubt the business of the court will be despatched in such a manner as to give entire satisfaction. I believe the judges will come here anxious to accomplish the purposes which Congress has avowed to be so desirable. By this bill Congress declares to them, "we are not disposed to seperate you from your circuit duties; we intend no change in the system; we intend only to apply a particular remedy for an existing evil; we do not want the reproach to exist, that justice is delayed; we would have you come together and continue in session until the business is transacted." That is the purport of the bill. It is declared by all, that there is no intention to make a permanent change in the system; and yet there is a singular sensitiveness, a singular sensibility on the part of some gentlemen who are afraid—who seem determined to be afraid, that it will lead to some consequences that are not reasonably connected with it. It is a matter of mere apprehension. These are feelings that I have no doubt are sincerely entertained, but I say to gentlemen they are fallacious. I feel so far as regards my own opinion no apprehension. There is no gentleman on this floor who more regrets the existence of the evil complained of than I do, and that is one of the strongest reasons why I am in favor of providing this temporary remedy. If the business goes on accumulating as it has done, what is to be the consequence? Gentlemen must recollect that the business of the court is likely to increase itself daily. The retardation of the business becomes the motive for making an appeal; and if we can entertain such a supposition as that the object is to draw Congress into the adoption of some change in the system, what better mode could be taken than by allowing the docket to increase ad infinitum. This bill has for its sole and exclusive object and purpose to take away any such pretext, and to enable the public business to be speedily transacted. It is a matter of no great consequence as far as I humbly conceive to the principles of the government, or to any principles touching our judicial system. Sir, I have occupied more time than I had intended; I am much more anxious for the decision, in order that we may have done with the question, than for anything else.

The question was then taken by yeas and nays, and was determined as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bell, Berrien, Breese, Butler, Crittenden, Davis, of Massachusetts, Greene, Hannegan, Hunter, Johnson, of Maryland, Mangum, Mason, Miller, Phelps, Rusk, Underwood, Upham—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Ashley, Atherton, Badger, Bagby, Benton, Bright, Calhoun, Cameron, Cass, Corwin, Davis, of Mississippi, Dix, Felch, Foote, Hale, Houston, Johnson, of Georgia, Lewis, Moor, Niles, Sprouance, Turney—23.

Mr. BADGER then gave notice that he should move to go into Executive business to-morrow at one o'clock, on a matter that was of some importance.

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 19, 1848.

PETITIONS.

Mr. NILES presented the petition of William Pennover, a revolutionary soldier, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion by Mr. WESTCOTT, it was Ordered, That John S. Harris have leave to withdraw his petition and papers.

CUBA VESSELS.

Mr. WESTCOTT submitted the following resolution for consideration; which was ordered to be printed

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be instructed to bring in a bill repealing "An act concerning tonnage duty on Spanish vessels," passed June 30, 1844, or to modify the said act so as to allow Spanish vessels from Cuba to trade between that Island and any port of the United States upon the same footing as to tonnage duties as the vessels of other foreign countries are allowed to trade between the ports of their country and the ports of the United States.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. HALE gave notice that on to morrow he will ask leave of the Senate to introduce a bill relating to riots and unlawful assemblages in the District of Columbia.

EVANS' SAFETY GUARD.

Mr. DIX, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the petition of citizens of the United States, praying that all steam vessels may be compelled to carry "Evans' safety guard," submitted a report, which was ordered to be printed.

The Senate proceeded to consider said report, by unanimous consent, and in concurrence therewith, it was Ordered, That the Committee be discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

WASHINGTON GAS LIGHT COMPANY.

Mr. CAMERON, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the petition of J. F. Callan and others, reported a bill to incorporate the Washington Gas Light Company; which was read and passed to the second reading.

INSURANCE COMPANY AND SAVINGS INSTITUTION.

Mr. CAMERON, from the same Committee, to whom was referred the bill to incorporate the Washington Mutual Insurance Company and Savings Institution, reported it without amendment.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Richard P. Dove, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WESTCOTT, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of John S. Harris, late deputy collector at Providence, Rhode Island, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

GRADUATION BILL.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to reduce and graduate the price of the public lands, and for other purposes; and

On motion by Mr. BREESE, it was Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed to, and made the order of the day for, Monday, the first day of May next.

ILLINOIS RAIL ROAD.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill granting to the State of Illinois the right of way and a donation of public land for making a railroad connecting the Upper and Lower Mississippi with the chain of Northern Lakes at Chicago; and

On motion by Mr. DOUGLAS, it was Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed to, and made the special order of the day for, Wednesday, the 3d day of May next.

CHANGE OF NAME.

On motion by Mr. BERRIEN, the prior orders were suspended and the Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill from the House of Representatives to change the name of Photius Kavasales to that of Photius Fisk.

Mr. ASHLEY.—It is not my intention to offer any formal opposition to this bill, but merely to state the objection I entertain which is this—I think the act is entirely unnecessary. I have no doubt that this individual has now full authority by law to change his name if he pleases; to legislate therefore is idle. It was for this reason that I opposed this bill in committee.

Mr. BERRIEN.—This bill finds a precedent in the action of Congress in relation to one of the commanders of the American navy. The individual who is an applicant here, is a citizen of the District of Columbia. He is a Chaplain in the navy, and from the circumstance of his being an orphan boy—having become so at the age of four or five years—he was adopted and educated by an American missionary, whose name he now asks to adopt, as an evidence of his gratitude. Since it finds precedents in former legislation—since it can be attended with no injury to any body—since it is to gratify a feeling laudable in itself, I hope the bill will be allowed to pass.

No amendment being made, the bill was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it be engrossed and read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time, by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That the bill pass, and that the title thereof be as aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives in this bill.

COUNTY SEAT IN FLORIDA.

On motion by Mr. UNDERWOOD, the prior orders were postponed, and the bill to confirm the location, and grant a quarter section of the public land for the county site of Hillsborough county, State of Florida, was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole, and no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it be engrossed and read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time, by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That the bill pass, and that the title thereof be as aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives in this bill.

MESSAGES FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their Clerk:

Mr. President: I am directed to inform the Senate that a motion has been made today, under a rule of the House, to reconsider the vote of the House on yesterday, passing the Senate's bill entitled "An act in amendment of an act, entitled 'An act to regulate the postage,' approved the [illegible] March, 1845," more effectually to correct the abuse of the franking privilege, and for the prevention of frauds on the revenue of the Post office Department, approved March, 1845," with amendments, and which was yesterday transmitted to the Senate, and respectfully to request the return of said bill and amendments to the House for the action of the said motion to reconsider.

On motion by Mr. BADGER, it was Ordered, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be discharged from the further consideration of said bill and amendments.

On motion by Mr. BADGER, it was Ordered, That the Secretary return said bill and amendments to the House of Representatives agreeably to the request of that House communicated this day.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their Clerk:

Mr. President: The House of Representatives have passed an act to authorize the citizens of Ozark county, Missouri, to enter [illegible] section of land for the seat of justice in said county; in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The said bill was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and it was Ordered, That it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

THE SPECIAL ORDER.

Mr. ASHLEY moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the special order of the day; being, he remarked, the bill to carry into effect certain provisions in the treaties between the United States and China and the Ottoman Porte.

Mr. BADGER.—I shall not oppose the motion if the subject does not lead to debate. If it does, I will move that it be passed over in order that I may make the motion, of which I apprised the Senate yesterday, to go into Executive session.

Mr. ASHLEY.—I hope that the special order will be taken up: it can, if there should be debate, be passed by informally.

Mr. CASS.—I hope it will not be taken up. There is other business which ought to precede it. The bill for raising volunteers has been long deferred.

Mr. HALE.—I would like to be informed by the honorable Senator from Michigan, if he has heard any news from Mexico which makes it expedient or necessary to pass that bill? Is the country threatened with any imminent danger in case it is not passed? Is there likely to be an invasion of this country by Mexico?

Mr. CASS, (jocularly.)—There may be to-morrow or the next day,if this bill is not passed.

Mr. ASHLEY.—This bill was made the special order some weeks ago, and I have been endeavoring, from time to time, to bring it up. It is a matter which is deemed of very considerable importance by the administration, that the action of Congress should be had upon this bill, or some one of a similar character, in order that it may be sent out by the vessel which the government is about to de-patch to China.

The motion of Mr. ASHLEY was agreed to.

NEW YORK AND NEW ORLEANS STEAMERS.

The VICE PRESIDENT announced that the special order of the day was, the bill extending privileges to American vessels engaged in a certain mentioned trade, and for other purposes; and that the question was upon ordering it be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. ASHLEY.—That is not the bill to which my motion refers, but I have no objection to taking it up for the purpose of having the vote of the Senate upon it, provided there be no debate.

The VICE PRESIDENT stated that the bill was the first special order, as unfinished business.

Mr. HALE.—This bill was postponed at my request. I have since examined it, and have no objection to it; I hope it will pass.

The consideration of the bill having been resumed, it was Ordered, That it be engrossed and read the third time.

The said bill was read a third time, by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That this bill pass, and that the title thereof be as aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives in this bill.

JUDICIAL POWERS TO MINISTERS AND CONSULS.

The VICE PRESIDENT announced that the second special order was the bill to carry into effect certain provisions in the treaties between the United States and China, and the Ottoman Porte, giving certain judicial powers to Ministers and Consuls of the United States in those countries.

The bill having been partially read—

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts.—I suggest to the honorable chairman of the Judiciary Committee the inexpediency of reading this bill further. He was kind enough a few days since to ask my opinion in regard to it, and I feel bound to declare to the Senate that I am entirely convinced that it will require very considerable amendment before the bill can be made to answer the purpose for which it is designed. It relates to a matter of great delicacy and of vast importance, and it involves greater difficulties than I was aware of until I examined into it. It is simply an attempt on our part, under the treaty with the empire of China, to extend the jurisdiction and laws of the United States over our citizens and other persons there to some extent by establishing a judicial system of our own within the territory of China. It is a very complicated and delicate subject, and one difficult to be disposed of. I have been in conference with my friend the Senator from South Carolina in regard to this subject, and I believe that he concurs with me in thinking it a difficult and complicated subject. I trust, however, there are no insuperable difficulties, and that a bill may be framed to answer the purpose designed to be accomplished by this bill, but it should be done with much care and deliberation. I hope the honorable chairman of the Judiciary Committee will allow us a little more time to consider of the matter, and consent that the bill be postponed until a future day.

Mr. ASHLEY.—I did not intend, when I made the motion to take up this bill, to insist upon the immediate action of the Senate upon it. I am aware of the difficulty which surrounds the case, and the more I have examined it the more I have been convinced of the difficulty. My purpose was this: It will be recollected that a bill passed the House of Representatives last year and received the unanimous recommendation of the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate, but it failed to receive the action of this body in consequence of being deferred until too late a period of the session. I have, on several occasions, endeavored to bring the subject up for consideration without being able to succeed, and in order to do every thing that I possibly could to prevent delay, I have procured the proceedings of the British government in relation to this matter, and all the documents that have a bearing on this subject, and have had them placed in the possession of every Senator. All that I desire now is to have the bill placed in such a position upon the calendar, that it may be proceeded with from day to day until it is completed, for if we do not act upon the subject soon we may reasonably expect an interruption to our trade in that quarter.

Mr. DAVIS.—I hope the honorable Senator does not suppose that I have the slightest inclination to delay the consideration of this bill. I see the necessity there is for the passage of some law of this kind, but I see also the difficulties that exist. I have not been able to mature my own views in regard to it, and am not at all prepared to enter into the discussion of it at this time.

Mr. BUTLER.—I have investigated this subject, as well as the documents with which I was furnished, enabled me to do, and I have become satisfied, that it is essentially requisite that any enactment that we may make in regard to it, should be well matured. The purpose of the bill is to make a code of laws for our citizens in China, a code to be administered by persons who are not lawyers. It is a matter then which requires caution. I hope that a day will be set apart for its consideration, and that every Senator who takes an interest in the subject, will be present when it is considered.

Mr. BADGER —I hope the bill will be passed by informally, but before I make a motion to that effect, I beg to suggest to the honorable Chairman of the Judiciary Committee, that there is a very serious difficulty at the very commencement of the formation of such an enactment as this. The rule by which it is proposed by this bill, that contracts shall be decided, and crimes punished, is the common law, and the statute law of the United States. Now it is perfectly well known, that the United States has no common law of its own.

I move that the bill be passed by informally.

Mr. ASHLEY.—It would be better to have some day fixed for its consideration.

Mr. BADGER.—I have no objection to that.

Mr. DAVIS.—I suggest to the honorable Chairman that I could probably submit such views as I entertain upon the subject as soon as Monday next.

Mr. ASHLEY.—I am quite willing that it should be postponed until Monday next, and then made the special order of the day.

On motion by Mr. ASHLEY, it was Ordered, That the further consideration of said bill be postponed to, and made the order of the day for, Monday next, the 24th instant.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion by Mr. BADGER, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business, and after some time spent therein, the doors were opened and,

The Senate adjourned.

RESOLUTION OF THE LEGISLATURE OF MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, presented a resolution passed by the Legislature of that State, approving the measures adopted by the government in the prosecution of the war with Mexico, and in favor of the adoption of measures for its speedy termination; which was laid upon the table and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS.

Mr. DIX presented a petition of citizens of the United States praying that the process of ventilating passenger ships may not be confined, by law, to the use of any particular apparatus; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

On motion by Mr. BELL, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of the Western Cherokee Indians.

TERRITORY OF MINASOTA.

Mr. DOUGLAS, from the Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the bill to establish the territorial government of Minasota, reported it without amendment.

The Senate proceeded to consider said bill; and

On motion by Mr. DOUGLAS, it was Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed to, and made the special order of the day for, Wednesday, the 26th instant.

TERRITORY OF NEBRASKA.

Mr. DOUGLAS, from the Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the bill to establish the territory of Nebraska, reported it without amendment.

The Senate proceeded to consider said bill; and

On motion by Mr. DOUGLAS, it was Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed to, and made the special order of the day for, Wednesday, the 26th instant.

TERRITORY OF OREGON.

On motion by Mr. DOUGLAS, the prior orders were postponed, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill to establish the territorial government of Oregon; and it was Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed to, and made the special order of the day for, Wednesday, the 26th instant.

THE SUPREME COURT.

Mr. BADGER, by unanimous consent, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to promote the despatch of business in the Supreme Court and to repeal the 2d section of the act approved June 17th, 1844, entitled "An act concerning the Supreme Court of the United States;" which was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On motion by Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, it was Ordered, That said bill be printed.

THE CALIFORNIA CLAIMS.

On motion by Mr. BENTON, it was Ordered, That the amendments reported by the Committee on Military Affairs to the bill for ascertaining and paying the California Claims, be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The following message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. WALKER, his Secretary:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

In pursuance of the provisions of the joint resolution of the 13th instant, authorizing the exchange of ratifications of the treaty of peace, limits, and settlement between the United States of America and the Mexican Republic, signed at the city of Guadalupe Hidalgo on the 2d instant, I have appointed Nicholas P. Trist, of Louisiana, commissioner on the part of the United States, and he has accordingly proceeded to the city of Mexico, and has exchanged ratifications of the treaty with the commissioners appointed on the part of the Mexican Government.

I transmit herewith a copy of the treaty, and also of the instructions given to the commissioner of the United States.

JAMES K. POLK.

WASHINGTON, April 20, 1848.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

On motion, it was

Ordered, That when the Senate adjourn, it be to Monday next.

PROTECTION OF PROPERTY IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. HALE asked leave to introduce a bill relating to riots and unlawful assemblies in the District of Columbia.

Mr. HALE.—I wish to make a single remark in order to call the attention of the Senate to the necessity of adopting the legislation proposed by this bill. The bill itself is nearly an abstract of a similar law now in force in the adjoining State of Maryland; and also in many other States of the Union. The necessity for the passage of the bill will be apparent to the Senate from facts which are probably notorious to every member of the body. Within the present week large and riotous assemblages of people have taken place in this District, and have not only threatened to carry into execution schemes utterly subversive to all law, with respect to the rights of property, but have actually carried these threats into execution, after having been addressed, upheld, and countenanced by men of station in society, whose character might have led us to suppose that they would have taken a different course, and given wiser counsels to those whom they addressed. It seems to me, then, that we have approached a time when the decision is to be made in this capitol, whether mob-law or constitutional law is to reign paramount. The bill which I now propose to introduce simply makes any city, town, or incorporated place within the District, liable for all injuries done to property by riotous or tumultuous assemblages. Whether any further legislation on the part of Congress will be necessary, time will determine. But I may be permitted to say, that at the present moment we present a singular spectacle to the people of this country and to the world. The notes of congratulation which this Senate sent across the Atlantic to the people of France on their deliverance from thraldom, have hardly ceased, when the supremacy of mob law and the destruction of the freedom of the press are threatened in this capital of the Union. Without further remark, I move that this bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BAGBY.—I rise for the purpose of giving notice that whenever that bill shall be reported by the committee—if it ever should be—I shall propose to amend it by a section providing a sufficient penalty for the crime of kidnapping in this District. I was struck by a remark made by the Senator from New Hampshire. He adverts to the rejoicing of the people of this country at the events now in progress in Europe, and thence infers that the slaves of this country are to be permitted to cut the throats of their masters. I shall certainly, sir, attend to this subject.

Mr. HALE.—To avoid misapprehension I purposely abstained from saying a word in regard to any thing that might even be supposed to lie beyond the case which it is the object of this bill to meet. I did not make the most distant allusion to slavery. I refrained from it purposely, because I wanted to present to the consideration of the Senate the simple question of the integrity of the law and the rights of property unembarrassed by considerations of the character alluded to by the honorable Senator from Alabama. I shall cordially unite with that honorable Senator in favor of a law against kidnapping; because, if I am correctly informed by individuals upon whose testimony I place the most implicit credit, one of the most outrageous cases of kidnapping was committed within sight of this Capitol, no longer ago than yesterday, and that too in the case of an individual having in his pocket an injunction issued by the highest judicial authority in this district, the Chief Judge of the circuit court, restraining all persons from molesting him. Yet, in violation of that injunction, he was forcibly seized, not only without law, but against law—not only in utter neglect, but in flagrant contempt of the most sacred guaranties of the constitution. This outrage was perpetrated within the limits of the city, in the very neighborhood of this Capitol. I will go then with the Senator from Alabama heart and hand in the adoption of any legislation for the prevention of such outrages, but I must say, that that is very foreign to the object of the bill which I have introduced.

Mr. BENTON.—There is some very pressing business awaiting the action of the Senate, and I do not know that the remarks which have been made are applicable to any motion pending at present. May I ask if there be any question pending?

The PRESIDING OFFICER.—The question is, "Shall the Senator from New Hampshire have leave to introduce his bill?"

Mr. CALHOUN.—What is the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER.—The bill will be read.

The SECRETARY then read the bill which is as follows:

A Bill relating to riots and unlawful assemblages in the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted &c. That if any person or persons shall, by force, or by threats or menaces, unlawfully assemble together, or shall be unlawfully, riotously, or tumultuously assembled together, to the disturbance of the public peace, and shall unlawfully demolish, pull down, or destroy, or begin to demolish, pull down, or destroy, any dwelling house, any house or building, used or designed by any person, or body politic, or corporation, as a place for the transaction of business, or deposite of property, any ship or vessel, ship yard, or lumber yard, any barn, stable or other out-house, or any articles of personal property, shall be injured or destroyed, or if any property therein or thereon, shall be taken away, injured or destroyed, by any riotous or tumultuous assemblage of people, the [illegible] of the damage so done shall be recovered by civil action of trespass, &c., [illegible] against the county, town or city within whose limits such [illegible] shall have been committed.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That in any suit instituted under this act the plaintiff or plaintiffs may declare generally, and give the special matter in evidence.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I suppose no Senator can mistake the object of this bill, and the occurrence which has led to its introduction. Now, sir, I am amazed that even the Senator from New Hampshire should have so little regard for the laws and the constitution of the country, as to introduce such a bill as this, without including in it the enactment of the severest penalties, against the atrocious act which has occasioned this excitement. Sir, gentlemen, it would seem, have at last come to believe that the Southern people and Southern members have lost all sensibility or feeling upon this subject. I know to what this leads. I have known for a dozen of years to what all this is tending. When this subject was first agitated, I said to my friends, there is but one question that can destroy this Union and our institutions, and that is, this very slave question, for I choose to speak of it directly. I said farther, that the only way by which such a result could be prevented, was by prompt and efficient action—that if the thing were permitted to go on, and the constitution to be trampled on—that if it were allowed to proceed to a certain point, it would be beyond the power of any man or any combination of men to prevent the result. We are approaching that crisis, and evidence of it is presented by the fact, that such a bill upon such an occurrence, should be brought in to repress the just indignation of our people from wreaking their vengeance upon the atrocious perpetrators of these crimes or those who contribute to them, without a denunciation of the cause that excited that indignation. I cannot but trust, that I do not stand alone in these views.

I have for so many years raised my voice upon this subject, that I have been considered almost the exclusive defender of this great institution of the South, upon which not only its prosperity, but its very existence depends. I had hoped that younger members who have come into this body, who represent portions of the country at least as much interested as that from which I come, might have taken the lead and relieved me from the necessity of ever again speaking upon this subject. I trust we will grant no leave to introduce this bill—that we will reject it, and that if anything be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, it will be to make penal enactments, to prevent these atrocities—these piratical attempts—these wholesale captures—these robberies of seventy odd of our slaves at a single grasp. Delay is dangerous on this question. The crisis has come, and we must meet it—and meet it directly—and I will add we have ample means to meet it. We can put the issue to the North; if you continue to disregard the provisions of the constitution in our favor, we shall, on giving you due notice, retaliate by disregarding those in your favor. If you do not regard the stipulations of the constitution in our favor, why should we regard those in your favor? If your vessels cannot come into our ports without the danger of such piratical acts; if you have caused this state of things by violating the provisions of the constitution and the act of Congress for delivering up fugitive slaves by passing laws to prevent it, and thus make it impossible to recover them when they are carried off by such acts, or seduced from us, we have the right, and are bound by the high obligation of safety to ourselves, to retaliate by preventing any of your sea-going vessels from entering our ports. That would apply an effectual remedy, and make up the issue at once on this, the gravest and most vital of all questions to us and the whole Union. I do not intend to make a long speech on this occasion, but I would have felt myself to be lacking in my duty to the people of this District—to the people of the South, and to the people of the United States, had I not raised my voice against the introduction of such a bill on such an occasion.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—I am not going to make a speech on this bill, for the simple reason that I intend, after a few observations, to move to lay this motion for leave to introduce the bill, upon the table, to stop debate, and ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CALHOUN.—The bill is not yet introduced.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—The Senator from New Hampshire asks leave to introduce the bill, and I move to lay it upon the table.

Mr. CALHOUN.—Better reject it. I trust we will meet it directly, and reject it.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—I did not understand the honorable Senator from South Carolina; but, now that I do, I am perfectly willing to adopt his suggestion.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I would greatly prefer to meet the motion directly and reject it.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—I have no objection to that, and had taken but another mode of attaining that object. In answer to the suggestion of the honorable Senator from South Carolina, that it was the duty of other Senators, representing the South, to speak on this matter, I will state one reason only why I could not do so. I could not trust my own feelings when I heard the Senator from New Hampshire introduce this bill. Sir, there has been no outbreak—no violence in this District. There has been no disturbance except on the part of a set of men who, it seems, have come into this District for the purpose of assailing slave owners in the peaceable enjoyment of their property, secured to them by the constitution which we have all sworn to support. There has been public indignation manifested by an assemblage of those who have been thus wronged, but has there been any violence as yet?—any destruction of property? No. It may be wondered that there has not been. And when the Senator from New Hampshire proclaims that there is danger of this, I call upon him for his testimony in relation to this matter. Where does he get the evidence that any portion of the property of citizens of this District is to be burned down or destroyed? I was present last night, as a spectator, at a large assemblage of citizens of this District. I heard law officers of this District and other gentlemen speak on the occasion, but I heard nothing by any means so incendiary as I have heard since the honorable Senator from New Hampshire took his seat upon this floor. It is true, indignation was expressed, but leading citizens of this District and slave-holders declared that they were averse to any act of overt violence; indeed, this assemblage which has been called a tumultuous mob, peaceably appointed a committee of fifty citizens to wait on the editor and request him to remove what they supposed to be an incendiary publication which had provoked this excitement. I have only to say, sir, that I readily yield to the suggestion of the honorable Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi.—The Senator from South Carolina has remarked that he expected that younger members of this body would notice the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire to introduce a bill the purpose of which is the protection of incendiaries and kidnappers. I have only to say that it is from no want of accordance in feeling with that honorable Senator, but from deference to him who has so long and so nobly stood foremost in the defence of the institutions of the South, that I remainee silent. It was rather that I wish to follow him than that I did not feel the indignation which he has so well expressed. The time has come when Congress should interpose the legislation necessary for the punishment of those men who come within our jurisdiction, acting in fact and in morals as incendiaries—coming here within the legislative limits of Congress, to steal a portion of that property which is recognized as such by the constitution of the United States, and, therefore, entitled to our protection. Is this District to be made the field of abolition struggles? Is this chamber to be the hot bed in which plants of sedition are to be nursed? Why is it that in this body, once looked to as the conservative branch of the government—once looked to as so dignified that it stood above the power of faction—that we find the subject of this contest so insulting to the south—so irritating always when it is agitated—introduced on such an occasion? Is this debateable ground? No! It is ground upon which the people of this Union may shed blood, and that is the final result. If it be pressed any farther, and if this Senate is to be made the theatre of that contest, let it come—the sooner the better. We who represent the southern States are not here to be insulted on account of institutions which we inherit. And if civil discord is to be thrown from this chamber upon the land—if the fire is to be kindled here with which to burn the temple of our Union—if this is to be made the centre from which civil war is to radiate, here let the conflict begin. I am ready for one to meet it with any incendiary, who, dead to every feeling of patriotism, attempts to introduce it.

Mr. FOOTE.—On the 4th of March, 1837, the American people of all parties assembled at this capitol for the purpose of witnessing the inauguration of a President of the United States. That President was a northern man. I had the honor of listening to his inaugural speech, and in it he wisely and patriotically asserted a principle of which I approved at the time, which I still admire, and which has a close affinity to the question so suddenly presented to this body. Martin Van Buren dared to declare in his inaugural speech that though it was his opinion—and it certainly is not mine—that Congress has the power to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, yet he conceived that the act could not be done without the most odious and unpardonable breach of faith towards the slave States of the confederacy, and especially Maryland and Virginia. This declaration, not altogether unexpected, gave temporary quiet and satisfaction to the South. I had thought, until recently, that there were very few men in the republic, claiming anything like a prominent standing among their fellow-citizens who entertained a different opinion from that thus expressed, or who, if entertaining it, would undertake to express it in the national councils of this republic. But the abolition movement has not been quite so successful as some desired it to be, and now we see plain indications that individuals—for I cannot conscientiously call them gentlemen—asserting themselves to be champions of freedom—have resolved to carry into execution a scheme—an attempt to remove by any means whatever all the slaves now within this District, so that those who have been in the habit of retaining slaves in their possession will be discouraged from bringing others here; and that citizens who may hereafter settle here, will of course, on the principle of obvious pecuniary policy, decline bringing such property with them; and that, then, in this covert and insidious manner, the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia may be accomplished.

The attempt to legislate directly upon this subject in the national councils is at war with the constitution, repugnant to all principles of good faith, and violative of all sentiments of patriotism. With whomsoever it originates, this movement made directly or indirectly, within Congress or out of it, which has been so justly denounced by my colleague, is simply a nefarious attempt to commit grand larceny upon the owners of slaves in this District. I undertake to say that there is not a man who has given his countenance to this transaction in any shape, who is not capable of committing grand larceny: or, if he happened to be a hero, as such men are not, of perpetrating highway robbery on any of the roads of this Union. He is not a gentleman. He would not be countenanced by any respectable person anywhere. He is amenable to the law. I go farther, and I dare say my sentiments will meet the approbation of many even who do not live in Slave States, and I maintain, that when the arm of the law is too short to reach such a criminal, he may be justly punished by a sovereignty not known to the law. Such proceedings have taken place, and there are circumstances which not only instigate, but justify such acts. I am informed upon evidence on which I rely, that this very movement out of which the bill originates, has been instigated and sanctioned by persons in high station. It is even rumored, and it is believed by many—I am sorry for the honor of this body to say so—that a Senator of the United States is concerned in the movement. Certain it is that a member of another body, meeting in a certain Hall, not far distant, was yesterday morning engaged in certain reprehensible contrivances, and that but for his abject flight from the place of his infamous intrigues, he would have been justly punished—not by the mob—but by high spirited citizens convened for the purpose of vindicating their rights, thus unjustly assailed.

Why is it that this question is continually agitated in the Senate of the United States—that it is kept here as the subject of perpetual discussion? Is it simply that gentlemen wish to be popular at home? I suppose so. Is it because of their peculiar sympathies for that portion of the population which constitutes slavery as recognised in the South? What is the motive? Is the object to attain popularity? Is it to gain high station? Is it to keep up a local excitement in some portions of the North, with the view of obtaining political elevation as the reward of such factious conduct? But I care not for the motives of such acts. I undertake to say that in no country where the principles of honesty are respected, would such a movement as that now attempted, be promoted, or even countenanced for a moment. I feel bound on this occasion to say that the bill proposed, could not have any good object. What does it declare? It declares that any attempt on the part of the people of this District, through the only means which they may have in their power, to protect their property, and prevent it from being taken from them, either by stealth or open robbery, shall subject them to be mulcted in heavy pecuniary damages! It amounts then to this, that if hereafter any occurrence similar to that which has recently disgraced the District should happen, and the good people of the District should assemble and proceed to the vessel in which their property had been placed, and the captain of which had become the agent in the nefarious transaction, and should then and there dare to use the only means to prevent that vessel from sailing, and their property from being taken away before their eyes, they would be compelled to pay heavy pecuniary damages. It is a bill, then, obviously intended to cover and protect negro stealing. It is a bill for the encouragement and immunity of robbery! That is its true character, and whatever opinion the gentleman's own self-sufficiency may induce him to entertain of his own conduct on this occasion, I only tell him now the judgment which every honest man will pronounce upon it. If the object of the Senator was as I have described it, and as is apparent on the face of the bill, he is as guilty as if he had committed highway robbery. I regret it, but I am obliged to use harsh terms, but they are true. The Senator from South Carolina asserted with great truth, that the time had come when the South should not only let her voice be heard, but disclose to all her enemies that she not only knows her rights, but "knowing, dare maintain them"—maintain them by all constitutional means—by all legal expedients—if necessary by bloodshed. The Senator from New Hampshire is evidently attempting to get up a sort of civil war in the country, and is evidently filled with the spirit of insurrection and incendiarism. He may bring about a result which will end in the spilling of human blood. I say to him, however, let him come forward boldly and take the proper responsibility. Let him say, "Now I am ready to do battle in behalf of the liberties of my friends the blacks, the slaves of the District of Columbia." Let him buckle on his armor—let him unsheath his sword, and at once commence the contest, and I have no doubt he will have a fair opportunity of shedding his blood on this holy cause on the sacred soil of the District of Columbia. If he is really in earnest, he is bound, as a conscientious man, to pursue his course which cannot be persevered in, without all those awful scenes of bloodshed and desolation long anticipated by good men in every part of this republic. When, I ask, was it that southern men ever undertook to invade the repose and happiness of the North? I hope I may be pardoned in making this suggestion. I do not wish to institute any invidious comparisons. I thank Heaven I have an abiding confidence in the good sense, the virtuous patriotism, and regard for the rights of property, of my northern brethren; and I believe that there are many of them, of both parties, who are perfectly sound upon this question; and who will condemn the act of this morning. The South has been forbearing. She has exercised more than complaisance—more than forbearance. But when, I ask, has any southern man, occupying a seat in either House of Congress, attempted to interfere with any local interests in the North?

All must see that the course of the Senator from New Hampshire is calculated to embroil the confederacy—to put in peril our free institutions—to jeopardize that Union which our forefathers established, and which every pure patriot throughout the country desires shall be perpetuated. Can any man be a patriot who pursues such a course? Is he an enlightened friend of freedom, or even a judicious friend of those with whom he affects to sympathize, who adopts such a course? Who does not know that such men are practically the worst enemies of the slaves? I do not beseech the gentleman to stop; but if he perseveres, he will awaken indignation everwhere, and it cannot be that enlightened men, who conscientiously belong to the faction at the north, of which he is understood to be the head, can sanction or approve every thing that he may do under the influence of excitement, in this body. I will close by saying that if he really wishes glory, and to be regarded as the great liberator of the blacks—if he wishes to be particularly distinguished in this cause of emancipation, as it is called, let him instead of remaining here in the Senate of the United States, or instead of secreting himself in some dark corner of New Hampshire where he may possibly escape the just indignation of good men throughout this republic—let him visit the good State of Mississippi in which I have the honor to reside, and no doubt he will be received with such hosannas and shouts of joy as have rarely marked the reception of any individual in this day and generation. I invite him there, and will tell him beforehand in all honesty, that he could not go ten miles into the interior before he would grace one of the tallest trees of the forest, with a rope around his neck, with the approbation of every virtuous and patriotic citizen, and that if necessary, I should myself assist in the operation.

Mr. HALE.—I beg the indulgence of the Senate for a few moments. Though I did not exactly anticipate this discussion, yet I do not regret it. Before I proceed further, as the honorable Senator from Mississippi has said, that it has been asserted, and he thinks on good authority, that a Senator of the United States connived at this kidnapping of slaves, I ask him if he refers to me?

Mr. FOOTE.—I did.

Mr. HALE.—I take occasion then to say, that the statement that I have given the slightest countenance to the procedure, is entirely without the least foundation in truth. I have had nothing to do with the occurrence, directly or indirectly, and I demand of the honorable Senator to state the ground upon which he has made his allegation.

Mr. FOOTE.—It has been stated to me and I certainly believed it, and believing it I denounced it. I did not make the charge directly. My remarks were hypothetical. I am glad to hear the Senator say that he has had no connection with the movement, but whether he had or not, some of his brethren in the great cause in which he was engaged no doubt had much to do with it.

Mr. HALE.—The sneer of the gentleman does not affect me. I recognize every member of the human family as a brother, and if it was done by human beings it was done by my brethren. Once for all I utterly deny, either by counsel, by silence, or by speech, or in any way or manner, having any knowledge, cognizance, or suspicion of what was done or might be done until I heard of this occurrence as other Senators have heard of it. And I challenge any one who entertains a different opinion to the proof, here, now, and forever. I go farther than that. I never have counselled, advised, or aided in any way, and with my present impressions, I never shall counsel, advise, or aid in any way, any encroachment upon the constitution in any of its provisions or compromises. If the constitution be not broad enough for the protection that I claim, I will go without it. I trust that on this subject I have been sufficiently understood. I deny in general and particular not only cognizance but all knowledge of any such movements.

Whilst I am up let me call the attention of the Senate to the case of a man whom I am proud here and elsewhere to call my friend—the editor of the "National Era." This gentleman in a card published in the "National Intelligencer" of this day declares—

> A paper is now, been circulated that the editor of the National Era was on several occasions, on the recent attempt of a number of slaves to escape on the brig Pearl, in company with and encouraging the flight and himself, encouraging the conveyance of said slaves. Without intending to assail no more than a mere conviction with the slaveholding interest, I am willing to say, once for all, that I am not, and never have been, in any way, directly or indirectly, connected with any movement for the escape of slaves, or with any movement having that object in view, and that I am entirely innocent of the charge of inducing slaves to escape from their masters. I am opposed to slavery as a violation of the natural rights of man, as a sin against God, and as a crime against the country, but I am opposed to it in the spirit of peace, and by the use of those means only which are sanctioned by the principles of the Gospel of Christ.

The position which he has taken is thus laid down in the first number of his paper, and he republishes it in his card:

> "Believing that the extinction of slavery can be effected in accordance with constitutional and legal principles, and that the existence of unconstitutional and illegal measures will but retard its progress, we cannot work with anti-constitutionalists. We cannot encourage disunion at the North, even if we could persuade ourselves that the dissolution of the present Union would be the best means of overthrowing slavery. We shall therefore, as we have heretofore, refuse to encourage the spirit and measures of disunion. We shall labor to secure the abolition of slavery by appeals addressed to the conscience, kindness, and intelligence of the people.
> "In Congress we shall support all measures calculated to limit the area of slavery, to prevent the admission of new slave States into the Union, to abolish the internal slave trade, and to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, whenever a majority of the citizens of the District petition for it. We shall oppose the admission of any more slave States into the Union, even if Texas should come in as a condition of her admission. We shall oppose the extension of the area of slavery in any way, and shall favor the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, whenever a majority of the citizens of the District petition for it. We shall oppose the admission of any more slave States into the Union, even if Texas should come in as a condition of her admission. We shall oppose the extension of the area of slavery in any way, and shall favor the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, whenever a majority of the citizens of the District petition for it.

in the recent transaction which has excited so much feeling, neither myself nor any person connected with me had any share whatever; that the transaction in fact became known to me only through the general report.

"I write this to disabuse the public mind, so that those who do not personally know me may not be imposed upon by any misapprehension of my position. Certainly I feel a great repugnance to being assailed for what I have never done or dreamed of; but if illegal violence be inflicted upon me for writing and printing freely about slavery or any other subject which I may on an American citizen's rights, she will suffer the truth, in the confident hope that when passion and prejudice shall have been dispelled justice will be done to my character. But I will not suppose that they who are rejoicing in the enfranchisement of the press in Paris, will themselves put fetters upon the press in Washington."

Mr. CALHOUN.—(in his seat.)—Does he make any denunciation of the robbery?

Mr. HALE.—He had quite enough to do in defending himself, and it was no part of his duty to denounce others.

Mr. CALHOUN, (in his seat.)—I understand that!

Mr. HALE.—I appeal to the sense of justice of the Senate, and ask what justification there can be for assailing the character and property of a man who knew no more of this occurrence than any of its members? I appeal to the honorable Senator who spoke so eloquently of the high and chivalric ideas of right which are entertained in his section of the country—

Mr. FOOTE.—I ask the Senator—and beg to remind him that twenty millions of people are listening to his answer—in the circumstances of the case, evidently known to him, does he suppose that this occurrence could have taken place without extensive, countenance and aid from men of standing in this District, whether members of Congress or others?

Mr. HALE.—I have no doubt that those persons could not have got away without some aid. It is enough that I have disclaimed all knowledge of it. I thought that when the honorable Senator was speaking more than twenty millions of people were listening. He invites me to visit the State of Mississippi, and kindly informs me that he would be one of those who would act the assassin, and put an end to my career. He would aid in bringing me to public execution—no, death by a mob. Well, in return for his hospitable invitation, I can only express the desire that he would penetrate into some of the dark corners of New Hampshire, and if he do, I am much mistaken if he would not find that the people in that benighted region would be very happy to listen to his arguments, and engage in an intellectual conflict with him in which the truth might be elicited. I think, however, that the announcement which the honorable Senator has made on this floor of the fate which awaits so humble an individual as myself in the State of Mississippi, must convince every one of the propriety of the high eulogium which he pronounced upon her the other day, when he spoke of the high position which she occupied among the States of this confederacy. But enough of this personal matter.

I think, if I did not misunderstand the honorable Senator from South Carolina, that he is surprised at the temerity of the Senator from New Hampshire in introducing this bill. Let me ask, what is this bill? What is this incendiary bill that has elicited such a torrent of invective? Has it been manufactured by some "fanatical abolitionist?" Why, it is copied, almost word for word, from a law on the statute-book which has been in operation for years, in the neighboring State of Maryland. It has no allusion, directly or indirectly, to the subject of slavery. Yet I am accused of throwing it in as a firebrand, and in order to make war upon the institutions of the South!—How? In God's name, is it come to this, that in the American Senate, and in the year of grace, one thousand, eight hundred and forty-eight, the rights of property cannot be named, but the advocates of slavery are in arms, and exclaim that war is made upon their institutions, because it is attempted to cast the protection of the law around the property of an American citizen, who appeals to an American Senate! It has long been held by you that your peculiar institution is incompatible with the right of speech; but if it be also incompatible with the safeguards of the constitution being thrown around property of American citizens, let the country know it! If that is to be the principle of your action, let it be proclaimed throughout the length and breadth of the land, that there is no institution so omnipotent—so almighty—that even the sacred rights of life and property must bow down before it!

Do not let it be said that I have introduced this subject. I have simply asked that the plainest provisions of the common law—the clearest dictates of justice—shall be extended and exercised for the protection of the property of citizens of this District; and, yet, the honorable Senator from South Carolina is shocked at my temerity!

Mr. BUTLER.—Allow me to ask one question with perfect good temper. The Senator is discussing the subject with some feeling; but I ask him whether he would vote for a bill, properly drawn, inflicting punishment on persons inveigling slaves from the District of Columbia?

Mr. HALE.—Certainly not, and why? Because I do not believe that slavery should exist here.

Mr. CALHOUN.—(In his seat,)—He wishes to arm the robbers, and disarm the people of the District.

Mr. HALE.—The honorable Senator is alarmed at my temerity,—

Mr. CALHOUN.—(In his seat,)—I did not use the word, but did not think it worth while to correct the Senator.

Mr. HALE.—The Senator did not use that term?

Mr. CALHOUN.—No. I said brazen or something like that.

Mr. HALE.—The meaning was the same. It was brazen then! that I should introduce a bill for the protection of property in this District—a bill perfectly harmless, but which he has construed into an attack upon the institutions of the South.—I ask the Senator and the country wherein consists the temerity? I suppose it consists in the section of the country from which it comes. He says that we seem to think that the South has lost all feeling. Ah! There is the temerity. The bill comes from the wrong side of a certain parallel! Why, did the honorable Senator from South Carolina imagine that we of the North, with our faces bowed down to the earth, and with our backs to the sun, had received the lash so long that we dared not look up? Did he suppose that we dared not ask that the protection of the law should be thrown around property in the District to which we come to legislate?

I desire no war upon the institution of slavery in the sense in which the Senator understands the term. I will never be a party to any encroachments upon rights guaranteed by the constitution and the law—not at all. I wish no war but a war of reason—of persuasion—of argument; a war that should look to convincing the understanding, subduing the affections and moving the sympathies of the heart. That is the only war in which I would engage. But it is said that the time has come—that the crisis has come, and that the South must meet it. In all candor and honesty, then, let me say, that there could not be a better platform on which to meet the question, than that presented by the principles of this bill. There could not be a better occasion than this to appeal to the country. Let the toesin sound. Let the word go forth. Let the free North be told that their craven representatives on the floor of the Senate, are not at liberty even to claim the protection of the rights of property! The right of speech was sacrificed long ago. But now is it to be proclaimed, that we cannot even introduce a bill looking to the execution of the plainest provisions of the constitution, and the clearest principles of justice for the protection of personal rights, because gentlemen choose to construe it into an attack upon that particular institution?

I ask again, what is it that has produced this strife, called up these denunciations, excited all this invective which has been poured upon me as if I were guilty of all the crimes in the decalogue? I call upon the Senate and the country to take notice of it. I ask, on what do gentlemen of the South rely for the protection of any institutions on which they place any value? It will be answered upon the constitution and the law. Well, then, if the safe guards of the constitution are rendered inadequate to the protection of one species of property, how can it be supposed that there will be protection for any? It is because I desire to maintain in all their strength and utility, the safe guards of the constitution, that I have introduced this bill for the protection of property in this District. And here let me tell the Senator from Alabama, that he will have my full co-operation in any measure to prevent kidnapping. I shall expect him to redeem his pledge. Again; I am shocked to hear the honorable Senator from South Carolina denounce this bill as a measure calculated to rebuke those citizens from the expression of their just indignation.

Mr. CALHOUN.—If the Senator will allow me, I will explain. I said no such thing. But I will take this occasion to say that I would put as soon argue with a maniac from bedlam, as with the Senator from New Hampshire, on this subject.

SEVERAL SENATORS.—"Order—order."

Mr. CALHOUN.—I do not intend to correct his statements.—A man who says that the people of this District have no right in their slaves; and that it is no robbery to take their property from them, is not entitled to be regarded as in possession of his reason.

Mr. HALE.—It is an extremely novel mode of terminating a controversy by charitably throwing the mantle of maniacal irresponsibility over one's antagonist! But the honorable Senator puts words into my mouth which I never used. I did not say that the owners had no property in their slaves. I said that the institution exists, but I have not given any opinion upon the point to which the Senator has alluded. I have never said anything from which the sentiment which he imputes to me could be inferred. It does not become me. I know, to measure arms with the honorable Senator from South Carolina, more particularly since he has been so magnanimous as to give notice that he will not condescend to argue with me. But there is more than one man in this country, who has, whether justly or unjustly, long since arrived at the conclusion, that if I am a maniac, on the subject of slavery, I am not a monomaniac, for I am not alone in my madness. But, sir, I am not responsible here or elsewhere for the excitement that has followed the introduction of this subject. I intended simply to give notice of a bill calculated to meet the exigency. The honorable Senator from Florida calls upon me for proof of the necessity of this legislation, and says that no violence has been committed in this District. I don't know what he calls violence.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—There has been no violence except the running away with some negroes.

Mr. HALE.—Well, I believe that some hundreds of individuals assembled in front of a printing office in this city, and assailed the building with missiles, obliging the persons engaged in their usual employment to abandon their legal occupation. If that does not come up to the gentleman's definition of violence, I do not know what does. I was desirous of introducing this subject without an appeal to any matters whose might be supposed to be behind. I believe that these matters have nothing to do with the subject under consideration. But other gentlemen have chosen to give this subject a different direction. Now, in the bill which I have had the honor to introduce, the provisions are almost identical with the law which has been in existence in many of the States, and is now on the statute book of Maryland. To its enactment here, exception has been taken, and I am quite willing that the country should know the grounds on which opposition is made. If the subject be painful it has not been made so by me. As to the threats which have been made of bloodshed and assassination, I can only say that there have been sacrifices already, and there may be other victims, until the minds of all shall be awakened to the conviction that the constitution was made as well for the preservation of the freedom of discussion, as for the protection of the slave owner.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—I should like to know of the Senator from New Hampshire if he can say, that any non-slaveholding State in this Union has passed a law by which, in case of the abduction of a slave by an abolition mob, the county or town is to be made responsible for the act.

Mr. HALE.—I do not know, sir.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—It is time enough then, when such a law is passed to protect the property of slave-owners, to talk of a law to indemnify for the destruction of property of abolition incendiaries.

Mr. FOOTE.—The Senator seems to suppose that I wished to decoy him to the State of Mississippi. I have attempted no such thing. I have thought of no such thing. I have openly challenged him to present himself there or any where uttering such language and breathing such an incendiary spirit as he has manifested in this body, and I have said that just punishment would be inflicted upon him for his enormous criminality. I have said farther that if necessary, I would aid in the infliction of the punishment. My opinion is, that enlightened men would sanction that punishment. But says the Senator that would be assassination! I think not. I am sure that the Senator is an enemy to the constitution of his country—an enemy of one of the institutions of his country which is solemnly guaranteed by the organic law of the land—and in so far he is a lawless person. I am sure, if he would go the State of Mississippi or any other slave State of this confederacy and utter such language, he would justly be regarded as an incendiary in heart and in fact, and as such, guilty of the attempt to involve the South in bloodshed, violence and desolation, and if the arm of the law happened to be too short, or the spirit of the law to be slumberous, I have declared that the duty of the people whose rights were thus put in danger would be, to inflict summary punishment upon the offender. But, says the Senator, victims have been made and there are other victims ready. I am sure that he could not persuade me that he would ever be a victim. I have never deplored the death of such victims and I never shall deplore it. Such officious intermeddling deserved its fate. I believe no good man who is not a maniac, as the Senator from New Hampshire is apprehended to be, can have any sympathy for those who lawlessly interfere with the rights of others. He, however, will never be a victim! He is one of those petty desperadoes—a windy speaker—a——

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—If the gentlemen will allow me, I rise to a question of order. Good breeding ought to be observed, and I hear on all sides language that is not becoming. I call the gentleman to order for his personal reference to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. FOOTE.—I only said in reply to the remarks of the Senator from New Hampshire ——

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—I did not hear what the Senator from New Hampshire said, but the allusion of the gentleman from Mississippi, I consider to be contrary to the rules of the Senate.

Mr. FOOTE.—I am aware of that. But such a scene has never occurred in the Senate—such a deadly attempt on the rights of the country.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland.—Has the chair decided?

Mr. FOOTE.—Let my words be taken down.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the opinion of the Chair the gentleman from Mississippi is not in order.

Mr. FOOTE.—What portion of my remarks is not in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state that the question of order is not debateable.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—I ask whether the words objected to are not, according to the rule, to be reduced to writing?

Mr. FOOTE.—I pass it over. But the Senator from New Hampshire has said, that if I would visit that State, I would be treated to an argument. Why I would not argue with him! What right have they of New Hampshire to argue upon this point? It is not a matter with which they stand in the least connected. They have no rights of property of this description, and I rejoice to be able to say, that a large proportion of the intelligent and patriotic people of New Hampshire, do not concur in the views expressed by the Senator this morning. They take the ground that the people of the United States, the constitution and the Union, have guaranteed the rights of the South, connected with this property, and that the people of New Hampshire have no right at all to meddle with the subject. Why is it not a fact, that gentlemen, members of this body, amongst them the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, whom I regret not to see in his place, are known to be more or less hostile to the institutions of domestic slavery, but have never entertained the doctrine, that the Congress of the United States, has any jurisdiction whatever, over the subject? They have held that any attempt directly or indirectly, to effect abolition or to encourage abolition by congressional legislation is at war with the spirit and letter of the constitution.

Mr. HALE.—Will the Senator allow me to inquire if he can point out a single instance, in which I have made any aggression upon the rights of property in the South?

Mr. FOOTE.—That is the very thing I am about to show. When the Senator from New Hampshire undertakes to assert that those northern man who do not concur with him are "cravens," he uses language of false and scurrilous import. It is not the fact that his language will be re-echoed in any respectable neighborhood in New England. His sentiments will find no response or approval in any enlightened vicinage in New England, and therefore he has no right to say that those who are faithful to the principles of the constitution and fail to re-echo the fierce, fanatical, and factious declarations of the Senator are "cravens" in heart, and deficient in any of the noble sentiments which characterize high spirited republicans.

Mr. HALE.—I did not use such language.

Mr. FOOTE.—Did the Senator not use the word "craven"?

Mr. HALE.—If the Senator will allow me, I will inform him that when the Senator from South Carolina remarked that he supposed it was thought that the South had lost all feeling, I replied by asking if it was supposed that the North had no sensibility, that we had bowed our faces to the earth with our backs to the sun and submitted to the lash so long that we dare not look up?

Mr. FOOTE.—The declarations of the Senator from New Hampshire just amount to this, that if he met me on the highway and addressing me gravely or humorously—for he is quite a humorous personage—should say I design to take that horse which is now in your possession, and then announce that he wished to enter into an argument with me as to whether I should prefer that the animal should be stolen from the stable or taken from me on the road. How could I meet such a proposition? Why I should say to him, either you are a maniac, or, if sane, you are a knave. And yet this very case is now before us. The Senator from New Hampshire introduces a bill obviously intended to rob the people of the District of their slaves. I will read it and show that such is the import of the bill. I do not know any thing about the paper to which reference has been made. It has been sent to me as to other Senators during the winter, but I always refrain from opening it. The editor of it may be an intelligent man. I have heard that he is. He is certainly an abolitionist. It may be that he has not in his paper openly avowed, as the Senator from New Hampshire seems very plainly to indicate, that he has approved of this late attempt to steal the slaves from this District. But the publication of such a paper has tended to encourage such movements.

Mr. HALE.—When did I avow that I approved of this movement?

Mr. FOOTE.—I will shew it from this bill. I challenge the Senator to produce any such statute from the statute-book of any State of this Union.

Mr HALE.—I have said that the bill is in substance identical with one of the statutes of the State of Maryland. I have that statute before me and will hand it to the Senator.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland.—Allow me to see it.

Mr. FOOTE.—How are we to understand the Senator. He will not acknowledge that his object is to encourage such conduct, and he shuns the responsibility. When we charge upon him, that he himself has breathed in the course of his harangue of this morning the same spirit which has characterized this act, he says most mildly and quietly, "by no means—I have only attempted to introduce a bill correspondingly substantially with the law on the statute-books of most of the States of this confederacy." And the Senator supposes that all of us are perfectly demented, or do not know the nature of the case, the circumstances, or the motives which have actuated the Senator. Will he undertake to assert, that he would have ever thought of such a bill if these slaves had not been abducted from the District, in opposition to the consent of their owners, by the parties engaged in this marauding expedition? He cannot deny it; and, therefore, I am authorized to come to the conclusion, that he introduced the bill for the purpose of covering and protecting that act and encouraging similar acts in future. What is the phraseology of the bill? (The honorable Senator here read the bill.) Who doubts now that the object of the Senator from New Hampshire was to secure the captain of vessels and others engaged in any attempts by violence to capture and steal the slaves of this District? No man can doubt it. Then, I ask, have I used language too harsh, and is it not a fact, that the Senator is endeavoring to evade a responsibility which he is not willing to acknowledge?

Mr. HALE.—Will the Senator give way for a moment? I will read an extract from the law of Maryland to which I referred. Will the Senator be good enough to look at my bill while I read?

An act relating to riots

SEC. 1—Be it enacted by the General Assembly of Maryland, That from and after the passage of this act, if any country or incorporated town, or city of this State, any church, chapel or convent, any dwelling house, any house used or designed by any person or any body politic, or corporate, as a place for the transaction of business, or deposite of property, any ship, ship yard or lumber yard, any barn, stable or other out-house, or any articles of personal property, shall be injured or destroyed, or if any property thereon or thereon shall be taken away, injured, or destroyed, by any riotous or tumultuous assemblage of people, the full amount of the damage shall be recovered able by the sufferer or sufferers, by suit at law against the county, town or city, within whose jurisdiction such riot or tumult occurred. [Provided, however, that no such liability shall be incurred by such county, incorporated town, or city, unless the authorities thereof shall have had good reason to believe that such riot or tumultuous assemblage was about to take place, or having taken place, should have had notice of the same in time to prevent said injury or destruction, either by the mob police or with the aid of the citizens of such county, town, or city, it being the intention of this act, that no such liability shall be devolved on such county, town, or city, unless the authorities thereof having notice, have also the ability of themselves, or with their own citizens, to prevent said injury: Provided further, that in no case shall indemnity be received where it shall be satisfactorily proved that the civil authorities and citizens of said county, town, or city, when called on by the civil authorities thereof, have used all reasonable diligence, and all the powers entrusted to them for the prevention or suppression of such riotous or unlawful assemblies.]

SEC. 2—And be it enacted, That in any suit instituted under this act, the plaintiff or plaintiff-may declare generally, and give the special matter in evidence.

The honorable Senator will surely now do me the justice to say, that the bill was not drafted with reference to any particular case, such as that to which he refers. I had not the remotest reference to the protection of individuals concerned in transactions of that character; but if I should undertake to say, that I had not reference to demonstrations growing out of that transaction, I should be saying what was false, for it was these demonstrations which induced me to introduce the bill.

Mr. FOOTE.—In one breath the Senator makes two directly contradictory assertions. He says that he did not draw the bill in reference to this case, and in the same breath declares that he did! He disclaims in one moment that which he avows in the next! I am sorry that I have occupied the attention of the Senate so long. I have felt deeply on this subject. We have witnessed this morning the first attempt on this floor to violate the constitutional rights of the South, and I hope it will be the last. I trust that the indignation of the country will be so aroused, that even in the quarter of the country from which he comes, the Senator from New Hampshire, although he seems to be not very approachable, will be made to feel ashamed of his conduct.

Mr. MANGUM.—It has been now about fourteen years, I believe, since the Senate very wisely by the concurrence of the ablest and most distinguished men on both sides, came to the resolution to exclude discussion upon the inflaming topic of slavery; and that when abolition petitions were presented, upon the question of reception, a motion should be entertained—which motion is not debatable—and the vote taken upon it, to lay the motion for reception upon the table. There has been ever since this rule was established, a steady and uniform adherence to it, but I am sorry to perceive that there is latterly a disposition manifesting itself to depart from the salutary rule of action which the Senate thus wisely prescribed for itself. Upon this question of slavery we know there are different opinions entertained in different quarters of the Union. I stand here representing the interests of one portion of that Union, but I could not, if I would, bring myself to a state of excitement and alarm in consequence of any menaces that might be thrown out. I stand upon the constitutional compromises; and while I would not invade the rights of others, I am very sure that the sound portion of the community will not invade our rights. Why should we pursue this discussion? Is it believed that we are to be reasoned out of our rights? Are we to be reasoned out of our convictions? No, sir. Then why discuss the subject? Why not stand upon our rights; upon our constitutional compromises? Why not stand thus perfectly passionless, but prepared to defend them when they shall be assailed? But are they to be assailed? Sir, nothing has occurred during this session that has afforded me more satisfaction than to hear from some of the ablest and most distinguished men in this Union, the declaration that while they are opposed to an extension of the area of slavery, they are not disposed to trample upon the compromises of the constitution. This is our strength. It is to be found in the patriotism of those who love the institutions of our country better than party. I believe the great body of the people are prepared to stand upon the compromises of the constitution. It is upon this ground that I stand content and passionless, and if I know myself I shall ever continue to do so.

Sir, no good can result from this discussion. I shall vote against the reception of the bill at this time. And why? Because I think that the occasion which is selected for its introduction is a very unhappy one. It seems to grow out of the occurrence of an unwarrantable trespass, recently committed upon the rights of the citizens of this District, without being directed to the prevention of such aggressions in future, but on the contrary, having for its object the suppression of the manifestations of the feelings of indignation which such acts naturally create. We, who are the only legislators for the District of Columbia, are not informed of their wants and wishes in regard to legislation upon this subject. If the people of this District require any other laws than they already have, for the purpose of protecting their property against unlawful violence, let them indicate to us their wishes; and I shall be ready to lend a willing ear to their request, and to aid in passing such a law as in my judgment may be necessary for their protection. If on the other hand, the citizens of this District, should require other and more penal laws for the purpose of protecting their slave property, I shall be as ready to vote for a bill for that purpose. But I shall never vote for the one nor the other, when I find them pressed forward by gentlemen of extreme opinions—gentlemen from remote portions of the Union, having few feelings in common with the citizens of the District.

Sir, upon these subjects I am accustomed to look to the silent operation of the law for the protection of all our rights. In the State from which I came there is no excitement in regard to these subjects. If I know any thing of the character of that loyal, steady, fixed, and moderate State, there is no State in the Union which will hold to her principles and her rights with more firmness than that State. But we appeal to the silent operation of the law; we know nothing of mob law, or of Lynch law; we know nothing of excesses of this description. Although I have lived to be an old man, most of the time in North Carolina, I have never seen any thing in that State approximating even to a spirit of popular tumult.

Mr. FOOTE.—Will the honorable Senator allow me to ask him whether in the case of a conspiracy to excite insurrection among the slaves, it would not in his opinion justify mob proceedings?

Mr. MANGUM.—Oh! my dear Sir, in former years we had a compendious mode of disposing of such cases. We have now a mode equally certain, though not so compendious. Upon a matter of that nature, we take a strong ground. But I am not to be driven hastily into legislation that is proposed by gentlemen who entertain extreme opinions on either side. I am accustomed to look to the people of the District for an exposition of their wants in regard to legislation. They necessarily understand them better than we can do. Upon their suggestion I am prepared to act either in providing penal enactments for the protection of their slave property, or for protecting other descriptions of property from mob violence. I do not intend to enter into the question as to the propriety of making property holders, to some extent, answerable for any damage that may accrue from such violence, where they have a police in existence. I understand that in Maryland, they have such a law applicable to towns and cities where they have a police. But entertaining the views I do, believing that this movement is wholly inexpedient on this occasion—having no evidence that it would be proper on any occasion, but perceiving that the proposed measure has grown out of excitement, I move that the motion for leave to introduce the bill lie upon the table, and upon that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CALHOUN.—Will the Senator be good enough to withdraw that motion for a moment?

Mr. MANGUM.—Certainly.

Mr. CALHOUN.—If there is any responsibility in regard to this question, that responsibility is on me.

Mr. MANGUM.—No, sir, I do not take it so. I feel that the responsibility is upon the inopportune presentment of a bill of this sort, so soon after the transactions which have recently taken place in the District. That is my notion. I think the responsibility is upon the introducing of such a measure, at a time when excitement exists all around us.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I am very happy to hear that such is the opinion of the honorable Senator; but I disagree with my worthy friend, the Senator from North Carolina, in several particulars. I do not look upon a state of excitement as a dangerous state. On the contrary, I look upon it as having often a most wholesome tendency. The state to be apprehended as dangerous in any community is this; that when there is a great and growing evil in existence, the community should be in a cold and apathetic state. Nations are much more apt to perish in consequence of such a state, than through the existence of heat and excitement. Nor do I agree with the Senator from North Carolina, in thinking that this is an analagous case to that of the question as to the reception of petitions on the subject of slavery; for we all know that in reference to the latter the question was whether the Senate was not bound to receive petitions in all cases and all subjects. Now here is a case in which there is no doubt whatever. All admit that the question of granting leave, is a question depending upon the voice of the Senate as a matter of discretion—there is no question of right whatever. Now, I submit to the Senator from North Carolina, whether under the circumstances of a bill of this kind, introduced at such a moment, to subject the worthy citizens of this District to a high penalty without containing a single clause for the punishment of those who commit outrages upon them, and deprive them of their property—without a single expression against such marauders, must not be considered a most extraordinary measure, let it come from whatsoever quarter it may? Can any man doubt, that whether intended or not, the object of this bill is to disarm the worthy citizens of this District so as to prevent them from defending their property, and to arm the robbers? That is the whole amount of it. The Congress of this Union is the legislature of the District of Columbia; and what is our duty on this occasion? It is to protect these our constituents, who have no other protection but ours. It is our duty to stand forward in their behalf when the extraordinary spectacle is presented to us, of a vessel coming to our wharves, under the color of commerce, and of the men belonging to that vessel silently seducing away our slaves, and getting nearly a hundred of them on board, and then moving off with them under cover of the night, in order to convey them beyond our reach. What is our duty under these circumstances? Is it not to take up the subject, as I trust the Committee on the Judiciary will do, and pass a bill containing the highest penalties known to the law, against pirates who are guilty of acts like these?

I differ also from my honorable friend from North Carolina, in this respect. He seems to think that the proper mode of meeting this great question of difference between the two sections of the Union is to let it go on silently, not to notice it at all, to have no excitement about it. I differ from him altogether. I have examined this subject certainly with as much care as my abilities would enable me, and if I am not greatly deceived, if I have any capacity to perceive what is coming, I give it as my most deliberate opinion, that if such course is pursued on our part, and the activity of those philanthropists on the other side be permitted to go on, the result of the whole will be, that we shall have St. Domingo over again. Yes, and worse than that. Now, sir, we have been asleep, and so far from the thing being stationary, it is advancing rapidly from year to year. What has taken place within the last few weeks in the Legislature of New York? There was provision in the constitution protective of the rights of the south on this subject, and what was it? That the States shall deliver up fugitive slaves that are found within their limits. It is a stipulation in the nature of an extradition treaty—I mean a treaty for delivering up fugitives from justice. Now, what duty does this impose upon the States of this Union? It imposes upon them, upon the known principles of the law of nations, an active co-operation on the part of their legislature, citizens and magistrates in seizing and delivering up slaves who have escaped from their owners. What has been done by the Legislature of the State of New York? I speak on the statements of newspapers which have not been contradicted. They have passed a law almost unanimously, there being but two votes against it—making it penal for a citizen of that State even to aid the federal officers in seizing and delivering up slaves. They not only do not co-operate, they not only do not stand neutral, but they take positive and active measures to violate the constitution and to trample upon the laws of the Union, and yet we are told that things are going on very well and will go on well if we only let them alone; that the evil will cure itself. This is what has been done in the State of New York. The only stipulation in the constitution which confers any benefit upon us, is, without the least regard to faith, trodden in the dust. And New York stands not alone in this matter; many other States have adopted similar measures. Pennsylvania, at the session before last, adopted one, not going to this extreme, but not falling greatly short of it. And what has taken place under that law? A most worthy citizen of Maryland, upon his attempting to recapture his slave, is murdered—that is the proper term—and the perpetration of the act goes in a great measure unpunished. There was a trial and some one may have been found guilty, but little was done. I could go on and consume the whole day in tracing, step by step, the course by which every stipulation in favor of this description of property has been set at nought in the northern States. Now, if all these are the fact, I put it gravely and solemnly to our brethren of the northern States, can this thing go on? Is it desirable that it should be passed without condemnation? Is it desirable that the South should be kept ignorant of all this? I put these questions. No, no. The very inaction of the South is construed into one of two things—indifference or timidity. And it is this construction which has produced this bold and rapid movement towards the ultimate consummation of all this. And why have we stood and done nothing? I will tell you why. Because the press of this Union, for some reason or other, does not choose to notice this thing. One section does not know what the other section is doing. The South does not know the hundredth part of all that has been done at the North. Now, since this occurrence has taken place, a suitable occasion is presented for gentlemen to rise here and tell the whole Union what is doing. It is for the interest of the North as well as the South. I do not stand here as a southern man—I stand here as a member of one of the branches of the legislature of the Union, doing the whole, and desiring to save the whole. How are you to do it? It can be saved only by justice, and how is justice to be done? By the fulfilment of the stipulations of the constitution. I ask no more—as I know myself. I would not ask a particle that did not belong to us, either in our individual or confederated character. But less than that I never will take. Sir, I hold equality among the confederated states to be the highest point, and any portion of the confederated states who shall permit themselves to sink to a point of inferiority—not defending what really belongs to them, as members, sign their own death warrant, and in signing that, sign the doom of the whole. Upon the just maintainence of our rights—not only our safety depends, but the existence and safety of this glorious Union of ours. And I hold that man responsible, and that state responsible, who do not raise a voice against every known and clear infraction of the stipulations of the constitution in their favor. This is a proper occasion, and I hope there will be a full expression of opinion upon it. I hope my friend from North Carolina will reconsider his motion, and not press it. Let us meet this question at once.

Mr. DOUGLAS.—I have listened to this debate with a good deal of interest. But while I have seen considerable excitement exhibited on the part of a few gentlemen around me, I confess that I have not been able to work myself into any thing like a passion. I think that probably the Senator from New Hampshire has done much to accomplish his object. His bill is a very harmless thing in itself; but being brought forward at this time and under the present circumstances, it has created a good deal of excitement among gentlemen on this side of the chamber.

Mr. CALHOUN, (in his seat.)—Not the bill—the occurrence.

Mr. DOUGLAS.—On the occurrence I desire to say a word. In the first place, I must congratulate the Senator from New Hampshire on the great triumph which he has achieved. He stands very prominently before the American people, and is, I believe, the only man who has a rational nomination for the Presidency. I firmly believe that on this floor to-day, by the aid of the Senator from South Carolina, and the Senators from Mississippi, he has more than doubled his vote at the presidential election, and every man in this chamber from a free State knows it! I looked on with amazement for a time, to see whether there could be an understanding between the Senator from New Hampshire and his southern friends, calculated to give him encouragement, strength and power in the contest. But I know that those distinguished Senators from the South, to whom I have referred, are incapable of such an undertaking, yet I tell them that if they had gone into a caucus with the Senator from New Hampshire, and after a night's study and deliberation had devised the best means to manufacture abolitionism and abolition votes in the north, they would have fallen upon precisely the same kind of procedure which they have adopted to-day. A few such exciting scenes sufficed to send that Senator here. I mean no disrespect to him personally, but I say with his sentiments, with his principles, he could never have represented a free State of this Union on this floor but for the aid of southern speeches. It is the speeches of southern men, representing their States going to an extreme; breathing a fanaticism as wild and as reckless as that of the Senator from New Hampshire, which creates abolitionism in the north. The extremes meet. It is no other than southern Senators acting in concert, and yet without design, that produces abolition.

Mr. CALHOUN.—Does the gentleman pretend to say, that myself and southern gentlemen who act with me upon this occasion, are fanatics? Have we done any thing more than defend our rights, encroached upon at the north? Am I to understand the Senator that we make abolition votes by defending our rights? If so, I thank him for the information, and do not care how many such votes we make.

Mr. DOUGLAS.—Well, I will say to the Senator from South Carolina, and every other Senator from the South, that far be it from me to entertain the thought, that they design to create abolitionists in the North, or elsewhere. Far be it from me to impute any such design! Yet I assert that such is the only inevitable effect of their conduct.

Mr. CALHOUN.—(in his seat.)—We are only defending ourselves.

Mr. DOUGLAS.—No they are not defending themselves!—They suffer themselves to become excited upon this question—to discuss it with a degree of heat and give it an importance, which makes it heard and felt throughout the Union. It is thus that abolition derives its vitality. My friend from Mississippi, [Mr. FOOTE,] in his zeal and excitement this morning, made a remark in the invitation which he extended to the Senator from New Hampshire to visit Mississippi, which is worth ten thousand votes to the Senator, and I am confident that that Senator would not allow my friend to retract that remark for ten thousand votes!

Mr. FOOTE.—Will you allow me?

Mr. DOUGLAS.—Certainly.

Mr. FOOTE.—If the effect of that remark will be to give to that Senator all the abolition votes, he is fairly entitled to them. Had the Senator from Illinois lived where I have resided—had he seen insurrection exhibiting its fiery front in the midst of the men, women, and children of the community—had he had reason to believe that the machinery of insurrection was at such a time in readiness for purposes of the most deadly character, involving life, and that dearer than life, to every southern man—had he witnessed such scenes, and believed that movements like that of this morning were calculated to engender feelings out of which were to arise fire, blood, and desolation, the destruction finally of the South, he would regard himself as a traitor to the best sentiments of the human heart, if he did not speak out the language of manly denunciation. I can use no other language. I cannot but repeat my conviction, that any man who dares to utter such sentiments as those of the Senator from New Hampshire, and attempts to act them out any where in the sunny South, will meet death upon the scaffold, and deserves it!

Mr. DOUGLAS.—I must again congratulate the Senator from New Hampshire on the accession of five thousand votes! Sir, I do not blame the Senator from Mississippi for being indignant at any man from any portion of this Union, who would produce an incendiary excitement—who would kindle the flame of civil war—who would incite a negro insurrection hazarding the life of any man in the southern States. The Senator has, I am aware, reason to feel deeply on this subject. But I am not altogether unacquainted with the peculiar circumstances of the sections of the country to which he has alluded. I have lived a good portion of my life upon the immediate borders of a slave State. I have seen the operation of such excitements as those of which he speaks, upon both sides of the line. I can well appreciate the excited feeling with which gentlemen in the South must regard any agitating movement to get up insurrections amongst their negro servants.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi.—I do not wish to be considered as participating in the feeling to which the Senator alludes. I have no fear of insurrection, no more dread of our slaves than I have of our cattle. Our slaves are happy and contented. They bear the kindest relation that labor can sustain to capital. It is a paternal institution. They are rendered miserable only by the unwarrantable interference of those who know nothing about that with which they meddle. I rest this case on no fear of insurrection; and I wish it to be distinctly understood that we are able to take care of ourselves and to punish all incendiaries. It was the insult offered to the institutions which we have inherited that provoked my indignation.

Mr. FOOTE.—Will the honorable Senator allow me to make a remark?

Mr. DOUGLAS.—With a great deal of pleasure.

Mr. FOOTE.—If it be understood that I expressed any fear of insurrection which might grow out of this movement it is a mistake. I said that such an audacious movement as this could not be tamely submitted to without encouraging its authors to proceed; and in that, I think, all who have spoken on this side of the chamber concur.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi.—I did not intend to imply that my colleague had taken any such course as that which I disclaimed. His ground was that which the peace and security of the South has justified, and which will, of necessity, be their position in future. When Dr. Johnson heard that a man, whose life had been a course of villainy, had committed suicide by hanging himself, he replied, "it was a right, that a life which had been uniformly oblique, should be terminated by a perpendicular."

Mr. DOUGLAS.—All that I intended to say was that the effect of this excitement—of all these harsh expressions, will be the creation of abolitionists at the North.

Mr. FOOTE.—The more the better!

Mr. DOUGLAS.—The gentleman may think so; but some of us at the North do not concur with him in that opinion. Of course the Senator from New Hampshire will agree with him, because he can fan the flame of excitement so as to advance his political prospects. And I can also well understand how some gentlemen at the South may quite complacently regard all this excitement, if they can persuade their constituents to believe that the institution of slavery rests upon their shoulders—that they are the men who meet the Goliah of the North in this great contest about abolition. It gives them strength at home. But we, of the North, who have no sympathy with abolitionists, desire no such excitement.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I must really object to the remarks of the Senator. We are merely defending our rights. Suppose that we defend them in strong language; have we not a right to do so?—Surely the Senator cannot mean to impute to us the motives of low ambition. He cannot realize our position. For myself, (and I presume I may speak for those who act with me,) we place this question upon high and exalted grounds. Long as he may have lived in the neighborhood of slaveholding States, he cannot have realized any thing on the subject. I must object entirely to his course, and say that it is at least as offensive as that of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. FOOTE.—Will the Senator from Illinois allow me a word?

Mr. DOUGLAS.—In a moment. I am sorry that the honorable Senator regards my language as offensive as that of the Senator from New Hampshire. Will he allow me to remark, in the first place, that I did not suppose that I should ever be classed with the Senator from New Hampshire or the subject of slavery; and, in the next place, that I did not say anything disrespectful to the Senator from South Carolina, or any one associated with him on this question. I did not impugn his motives. I said explicitly that I did not regard him as being actuated by any but the purest motives. He felt indignant at the recent occurrences, and his indignation, I regarded as being natural and proper. We of the free States share in that indignation. But I said that the Senator from South Carolina, by the violent course pursued here, had contributed to the result which we deplored, and that abolitionism at the North was built up by southern denunciation and southern imprudence. I stated that there were men of the North who are ready to take advantage of that imprudent and denunciatory course and turn it to their own account, so as to make it revert upon the South. I announced in plain terms that truth—a truth which every man from the free States can fully realize—and, sir, I too feel upon this subject, inasmuch as I have never desired to enlist, and never shall enlist under the banners of either of the radical factions on this question. I have no sympathy for abolitionism on the one side, or that extreme course on the other, which is akin to abolitionism. We are not willing to be trodden down whilst you hazard nothing by your violence, which only builds up your adversary in the North. Nor does he hazard any thing; quite the contrary—for he will thus be enabled to keep concentrated upon himself the gaze of the abolitionists, who will regard him as the great champion of freedom who encounters the distinguished Senator from South Carolina and the Senator from Mississippi. He is to be upheld at the North because he is the champion of abolition; and you are to be upheld at the South, because you are the champions who meet him; so that it comes to this, that between those two ultra parties we, of the North who belong to neither, are thrust aside. Now, we stand up for all your constitutional rights, in which we will protect you to the last. We go for the punishment of burglary, stealing, and any other infringement of the laws of this District; and if these laws be not strong enough to prevent or punish those crimes, we will give to them the adequate strength. On the other hand, we go for enforcing the laws against mobs, and any destruction of property by them; and if the law be not strong enough to suppress them, we will strengthen it. But we protest against being made instruments—puppets—in this slavery excitement, which can operate only to your interest, and the building up of those who wish to put you down. I believe, sir, that in all this, I have spoken the sentiment of every Northern man, who is not an abolitionist. My object was to express my deep regret, that any such excitement should have grown out of the introduction of this bill.

Mr. FOOTE.—I had supposed that I had already sufficiently explained myself. No Southern man has ever introduced this question into the halls of legislation. Of this, the Senator must be well aware. If he knows an instance to the contrary, I should be extremely glad to be informed of it. The question is not now brought up by any movement of ours; it is forced upon us by the Senator from New Hampshire. The South has been silent, resting firmly, discreetly, and with dignity, upon her rights which are guaranteed to us by the constitution. It is only in defence of her acknowledged rights, that she undertakes to say anything. The Senator from New Hampshire has now introduced a bill which is calculated to produce mischief. Are we to remain silent?—or if we use language of just indignation are we to be charged with endeavoring to make ourselves popular in the South? Let me say to the Senator from Illinois, that this is a most ungenerous proposition. He says that no unworthy motives lie at the foundation of this measure. Why I can imagine no more unworthy motive than unprincipled demagogueism. I would scorn myself—if I could for a moment permit myself—to give countenance to anything so unworthy. I would say with all possible courtesy to the Senator from Illinois, for whom I entertain the highest respect, and whose general feelings of justice for us in the South, we all understand and appreciate, he will permit me to say to him, in a spirit of perfect courtesy—that there are various ways of becoming popular. Our constituents will have confidence in us, if they see we are ready here to maintain their interests inviolate. And it may be also, that the Senator from New Hampshire will strengthen himself in proportion as his conduct is denounced. But I beg the Senator from Illinois to recollect, that there is another mode of obtaining that popularity, which is expressed in the adage—"In medio tutissimus ibis," and that there is such a thing as winning golden opinions from all sorts of people, and it may be that a man of mature power—young and aspiring, as he may be to high places, may conceive that by keeping clear of all union with the the two leading factions; he will more or less strengthen himself with the great body of the American people, and thus attain the high point of elevation to which his ambition leads. But if the Senator from Illinois thinks that a middle course in regard to this question, is best calculated to serve his purpose, he is mistaken.

Mr. DOUGLAS.—The Senator has hit it precisely when he says that sometimes the course advised in the familiar adage which he has quoted, is, indeed, the course of duty and of wisdom. I do believe that upon this question, that is the only course which can "win golden opinions" from reflecting men throughout the country.

Mr. FOOTE, (in his seat.)—"Golden opinions from all sorts of people."

Mr. DOUGLAS.—In the North it is not expected that we should take the position that slavery is a positive good—a positive blessing. If we did assume such a position, it would be a very pertinent inquiry, why do you not adopt this institution? We have moulded our institution at the North as we have thought proper; and now we say to you of the South, if slavery be a blessing, it is your blessing; if it be a curse, it is your curse; enjoy it, on you rest all the responsibility! We are prepared to aid you in the maintenance of all your constitutional rights; and I apprehend that no man, South or North, has shown more consistently a disposition to do so than myself. From first to last, I have evinced that disposition. But my object was to inform the people of the South, how it is that gentlemen professing the sentiments of the Senator from New Hampshire, get here; how it is that they will see others coming here with similar sentiments, unless they reflect more calmly and coolly, and take a different course; and how this imprudent and violent course is calculated to crush us who oppose abolitionism. If any unpleasant feeling has been excited by these remarks of mine, I regret it. I know that it is not always pleasant to tell the truth plainly and boldly, when it comes home to an individual. But what I have said is the truth, and we all know it and feel it.

I think the introduction of this bill has been ill-timed. I doubt its expediency in any circumstances; but brought up at present, it is peculiarly calculated to produce unnecessary excitement; and I will never consent to the introduction of such a bill under the present circumstances. I am willing to instruct your committee to inquire whether any formal legislation be necessary for the purpose of suppressing kidnapping, mobs, rioting and violence in the District of Columbia. I am prepared to meet the responsibility of passing the most stringent laws against any illegal acts. That is my position.—My views in relation to this subject are well known. I have always supported by my vote the rule excluding abolition petitions. I voted with you of the South to sustain it. It was repealed against my vote. I was ready to stand by it as long as it was necessary for you protection. I will vote for any other measure necessary to protect your rights. But I claim the privilege of pointing out to you how you give strength and encouragment to the abolitionists of the North, by the imprudent expression of what I grant to be just indignation, and which you deem it to be necessary so to utter in self-defence.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—No man in this Senate can more sincerely regret than I do, the obtrusion of this most pernicious question into this body to-day. It has fallen upon us like a dark and withering simoon, as it always does when it enters the halls of legislation. My views and principles upon the subject have been expressed at different periods in both houses of Congress during the last fifteen years. They are entirely unchanged, and will, I presume, be carried by me unchanged to the grave.

I cannot fully coincide, in this instance, with my friend from Illinois, with whom on most occasions I am so happy to agree. I can never admit as a fact here, that the Senator from New Hampshire in agitating this question at this inopportune and most inauspicious moment, whatever may have been the course of others, has increased the number of his supporters among the enlightened people of this country. I do not think that the course which he has pursued this day, has been, in the slightest degree, calculated to advance his views—if he have any, and I do not say that he has—in relation to the Presidency. Neither do I impeach the motives of the honorable Senator in bringing forward this bill thus inopportunely. It is to be presumed that the bill has had its origin in that high-wrought state of feeling with which he has embarked in this cause, as in all others which he embraces. I will not for an instant suffer myself to suppose that any thing improper lurks beneath or behind this movement. Nor, on the other hand, do I find fault with the manner in which this movement has been met, on the part of gentlemen representing in this body the rights and interests of the people of the South. If they had failed to meet it and denounce it, they would have been recreant to their high trust—recreant to their most sacred obligations—recreant to the constitution of their country. Has there not been just cause of excitement in the breasts of those gentlemen? If the scene enacted in the last week, furnishes no justification for that excitement, I should like to know what could! Let us pause, Mr. President, for a moment and look at this case. A piratical vessel steals into your river, bearing the false colors of honorable commerce, anchors at your wharf, and receiving on board nearly one hundred of the domestics of this District, makes all sail to carry off its cargo of plunder! Was the South to sit in silence and without alarm, behold this audacious outrage? As well expect a man to fold his arms and remain unmoved, when the serpent which has crawled into his abode, uncoils itself upon his hearthstone, and its deadly hisses ring in the ears of his children! As well ask him to sit still and exhibit no excitement, as to call upon one-half of this Union to be unmoved in the circumstances which now surround us! Sir, had these gentlemen not manifested these feelings, they would, indeed, have been what the Senator from New Hampshire denominates those of the North who conscientiously sustain the solemn obligations imposed by that oath which you administered to support the constitution of the United States and all its guaranties—they would, indeed, have been in this case, craven, craven!" They would have been unworthy the companionship of MEN!

I have taken my stand on this question, and I shall maintain it at all hazards. I may see all my own political prospects withered before my eyes, in consequence of the course which I pursue on this question; but that consideration deters me not from the discharge of duty. If my constituents think proper to desert me on this occasion, still I shall not shrink. Let it be remembered, I look the storm in the eye, and I defy the thunderbolt! If I fall, I shall fall with the approval of my own conscience, and the preservation of my own self-respect. I seek no higher earthly reward. Not insensible to the approbation of the people or the press when my course deserves it, yet I have no fear of their clamor or invective, so long as I am sustained by a conscientious sense of duty. In the spirit of the memorable sentiment of the great Mansfield, uttered in one of his famous charges, I say "it is true I love popularity; but it is that popularity which follows, not that which is run after!"—I desire that alone which springs from strict and steady adherence to the dictates of my own conscience.

In this case, Mr. President, we have commenced at the wrong end. In the closing remarks of my friend from Illinois I entirely concur. I should desire to see this subject brought before the Senate in the form of a general resolution directed to the Judiciary Committee, whose first care it should be to devise some law for the prevention and punishment of kidnapping in this District—this piratical robbery of slaves. That being done, I would go as far as the Senator from New Hampshire, or any man, in the suppression of mobs. From the bottom of my heart I despise mobs. I never knew of a mob, I never heard or read of a mob, whatever the spirit in which it originated, that did not result in the commission of atrocities at which humanity shuddered. The laws of the land should be competent for the punishment of all offences. But I do not know that there has been any riot in this District. There has been no violation of the rights of property by a mob; and I have no fears that the citizens of this District will not be able to preserve their high and enviable reputation as a community of law and order, by abstaining from every thing like a resort to violence and force. They will, I am confident, abide in the protection of the law against any violation of their rights.

Mr. DAVIS. of Massachusetts.—I wish, before the vote is taken, to say a word or two for the purpose of placing myself right with regard to this matter. I am not very apt to be carried away by any of the excitements that sometimes have existence in this chamber; and I cannot say, at this moment, that I participate at all in the excitement which seems to exist in the minds of many gentlemen here. What is the question that is presented for this body to decide? A stranger coming into this chamber would suppose that we had some measure under consideration which concerned the deepest interests of slavery—that we were about to pass judgment upon some question affecting that great interest—that we were about to legislate upon the subject in some way that would affect it in a manner injurious to the rights of those who own property of this description. Now, I think that whoever has listened to the reading of this bill, must be satisfied that there is no such thing contained in it. If I understand it, it proposes nothing which has any special reference under any construction that can be given to it, to that particular description of property. We have laws which make municipal corporations liable for damage resulting from violence done to property by popular tumults, where such corporation is remiss in its duty in enforcing order and obedience to the law. If I understand the proposition of the honorable Senator from New Hampshire, he intends nothing more than to give security to property. He proposes nothing beyond this. This is the whole matter under consideration. But gentlemen say this is an unpropitious moment to introduce a question of this sort; and why unpropitious? Because, if I understand them rightly—and I learn the fact for the first time—a mob has assailed the office of a newspaper in this city, and has rendered it uninhabitable. Well, how does this connect itself with the question of slavery? Why, it is said that from this office a newspaper issues, which is called an abolition paper. Suppose all this to be true, it is added by the Senator from New Hampshire that this paper is conducted in a temperate manner, that is employs temperate language, addressing itself to the reason and the understanding of the public; and that no complaint has been made against it by the public. Well, how far this mobocratic action is to be attributed to another event which has happened in this District, is not for me to say. Some gentlemen seem to suppose that it has some connection with it.—If it have, I am unable to see it. The Senator from New Hampshire thinks he introduces a measure, and proposes to make the corporation liable for the damages committed, in case they refuse to do their duty and enforce the law. Well, such a law exists in many of the States. But it is said that this is a very peculiar state of things. Here was an abolition press at work in this building. Let me ask gentlemen whether they propose to stop the operations of the press; whether, in other words, they propose to take away from it its freedom? It seems to me that we might learn a lesson, if we would, from what is going on, on the other side of the Atlantic. The agitation of this question alone—the freedom of the press—has overthrown many of the thrones of Europe.

Do you propose by measures of violence, or by any other mode, to put an end to the discussions of the subject, either by speeches or through the medium of the press? Whoever undertakes a work of this description has got an herculean task upon his hands—a task which he will find himself wholly incompetent to accomplish. Well, why is it that the Senate flies in the face of this measure, and objects to its reception? And I put it to the calm consideration of the Senator from South Carolina, and those who think with him, whether the inference I have made will not be made throughout the country; and whether it will not be considered every where, an assault upon the liberty of the press, and of speech—whether it will not be irresistible, and whether it will not make a lasting impression upon the public mind. I think the people will reason in this way, upon the subject, and that they will hold out to us, as the duty of this body, to take the subject into consideration. Send it to a committee, let it be examined, and not presume, as the honorable Senator from South Carolina does, that because its provisions do not cover the whole subject, it cannot be made to cover the whole. If it does not answer the views of gentlemen, it can be made to do so. Then why fly in its face? Why take this very unusual course of refusing to receive the measure at all? Why, simply because, by construction and inference it is supposed to have some connection with the question of slavery. Now, is this wise? Is it prudent? Does it best accomplish the object which gentlemen have in view, which is to protect this kind of property? I have ever been one of that class of persons who have, at all times, considered themselves bound by the terms of the constitution on this subject, and have stood ready to support the guaranties contained in that instrument. But, at the same time, I must confess that I thought the honorable Senator from Illinois, in the remarks which he made here, uttered a great deal of wholesome truth. I thought he administered some wise, and prudent, and salutary admonition in those remarks, worthy of the consideration of all parties here; and I hope they will have their effect. I hope a little reflection—a little consideration—will induce gentlemen to change the course they have adopted on this subject, and to permit this measure to take the usual course of legislation. Suppose we do come to a discussion on the question, where, let me ask gentlemen, is the harm of discussion? Why, gentlemen ask what right have you to discuss our rights of property in slaves? By what authority do you claim the privilege of inquiring into this matter? Sir, we may have no right to disturb this right of property; we may have no right to affect to title to it in any way; no such rights may be claimed. Nevertheless, no one will deny to any citizen the right to discuss the character of property of this kind, and the effect which laws have upon such property. Who denies this right, and where is it denied? It belongs to freedom of discussion, to the freedom of speculation which exists in every free and untrammeled mind. Men may advance very absurd notions; they may reason very preposterously; they may reach very absurd conclusions, but while the whole matter lies in discussion very little, in my judgment, is gained by terming that discussion incendiary in its character. Why do you expect to satisfy the public mind when mankind discusses the question of slavery, however important it may be to any portion of this country, and express their opinions in regard to it—do you expect to put them under foot by saying it is incendiary? If any gentleman flatter himself with hopes, and expectations of this description, he is destined to be disappointed. This discussion will go on, and the way to meet error is by confronting it with truth. Let the discussion go on; let it be free everywhere. My own opinion is, that all considerate minds here and everywhere are entirely disposed to adhere to the guaranties and compromises of the constitution, and instead of being weakened by discussion, they are at every step strengthened; they at every step become firmer and stronger bonds of union. Let no one try, if he can, to suppress discussion. Every attempt to stop it will result, as in Europe, in one general sentiment, which will trample under foot the power that attempts to suppress it. This will be the effect of such attempts. I invite then my friends to meet this question boldly, fearlessly, and not let this subject go to the public in the form in which it now presents itself—as a bill presented here—relating to nothing but the protection of property against the violence of a mob, and denied admission to this hall and that table, because supposed to have some indirect connexion with the question of slavery. Let us take, sir, a more manly view of the subject—one that accords better with the character of high minded men. Let it take its course here. Let it go to a committee; let that committee examine it, and if it does not, from any cause, meet your approbation when it comes to be considered, then let other measures take its place—let it take its fate. But nothing, sir, is to be gained by this unusual course. I assure the gentlemen who represent this slave interest, that instead of gaining they lose much very much.

Why, Mr. President, cannot every gentleman see, and see plainly, that when this bill comes to be published, when the terms in which it is conceived come to be read and understood, it will be seen that it is a measure differing in no essential material point from laws existing in many of the free States and free countries everywhere—and as a Senator near me says in some of the slave States—making corporations under certain circumstances liable for the violence of mobs? And whoever takes the ground that this bill has been brought in at an unpropitious moment, and for that reason denies it admission, assumes a responsibility that he will sincrely wish by and by to get rid of. What have we to do with the present movement, sir—with the particular and peculiar circumstances which surround the question? In my judgment, nothing at all. I do not undertake to say what the motives were, of the Senator from New Hampshire, in introducing this bill; it does not become me to inquire into them. It is enough for me to know that if the printing office of the Union or National Intelligencer were assailed and injured by a mob, that it would be my duty to inquire how it happened, and whether farther provisions were required in addition to the present laws of the District in order to suppress such disturbances. The care and deliberation, I should feel myself bound, under such circumstances, to exercise with regard to the property of others, I should exercise in this case. The same measure of justice I should mete out in other cases, I would mete out in this. The protection which I would feel it my duty to give to the property of others, under all circumstances. I would give in this case. And if it turns out that this care is unworthily bestowed, that it does not demand legislation, then let it take its destiny. But this is not the way to deal with it. It does not, in my judgment, have the sanction of deliberation. I have always been of the opinion that nothing has been gained by the opposition to the introduction of petitions here. I believe if the subject had been left open, and we had been allowed to go into the consideration of the subject, gentlemen would have found less excitement existing, than has been created by the opposite course. It would have tended much more strongly, in my judgment, to tranquilize and harmonize the public mind. Under all the circumstances, then, how are we to act? I think the question is a very plain one. Things are brought in and made to bear strongly on the minds of gentlemen which do not belong to this question at all. I shall vote for the reception of the bill, in order that it may take the usual course of legislation.

Mr. BUTLER.—From the course which this discussion has taken, is clearly indicated the approaching storm which will ere long burst upon this country. I am persuaded that the part of the country which I represent is destined to be in a minority—a doomed minority. I feel satisfied that all that we have to look to for protection are the guaranties of the constitution, and the compromises made under it; and I feel as well assured as I do of any sentiment I ever uttered, that these guaranties will be violated—as well assured as I am that the compromises which have been made have been disregarded. I feel that the sentiment of the North against the institution of slavery is advancing with the certainty of the malaria from the Pontine marshes—with the certainty of all progressive movements, and there is no disguising it.

Why, on all occasions—whether of domestic or foreign consideration—the slave question is obtruded upon us. When a resolution was offered in this body in the name of the nation to congratulate the French people upon the commencement of their efforts in favor of the establishment of republican principles, an amendment was offered to congratulate them upon the confiscation of some of the property belonging to the people—to especially congratulate them on the emancipation of their West Indian slaves. Let it be proposed to acquire territory by the joint arms—the united exertions of the people of the whole Union, and we of the South, are forced to submit to the insult of having it proposed, that the soil purchased and enriched by the blood of southern troops would be polluted by their occupation of it, after a treaty of peace, when brought into comparison with those who claim superiority over them by virtue of their institutions. Sir, we are thus insulted every morning of our lives by the presentation of petitions of individuals, and resolutions of States, stigmatizing southern institutions as unworthily connected with this confederacy, going to show that the guaranties of the constitution will be, as the compromises have been, disregarded. But before I approach this part of the subject, I beg to address to you a few remarks upon the bill which is offered for our consideration. What is the bill, sir? It proposes to require from the inhabitants of this District to enter into bonds—for it amounts to that—to indemnify all persons who shall suffer losses by means of a mob—to indemnify all persons for any possible trespass that may be committed upon them by irresponsible violence. Now, I must be permitted to say that this is a sort of legislation, that is not to be found in that part of the country in which I live. I think it is unknown in the States south of the Potomac. Why should we be called on to pass a law at this time, to give indemnity for trespasses committed by a mob? If I were satisfied that the existing laws of the District, were inadequate to the protection of the property of the citizen, I do not know that I should be averse to the adoption of some measure that might be calculated to control the movements of a mob. But what is the fact? Why, that the laws are inadequate to the protection of the owners of slaves against those who are disposed to interfere with that species of property, whilst other species of property has adequate protection. I put the question to the honorable Senator from New Hampshire, whether he will agree now to bring in a law to give additional security to slaveholders, by the enactment of penalties, and I am told by that gentleman "no; the law I would introduce would be of entirely a different character; one to confiscate their property by the emancipation of slaves in the District of Columbia." And to destroy and undermine the institution, all influences are left to effect their silent work: the press, private counsel, influence of opinion. Here in the District of Columbia a paper, addressed to slaves as well as to others, is issued, inculcating in the minds of the slaves the right to rebel; a more than right: a duty—leading them to acts that are inconsistent with their peace and happiness, and such as will certainly inflict cruelty upon deluded human beings, by seducing them into a condition which compels their masters to use them with greater severity. This is like kindling a fire in the middle of a dry prairie, and expecting it not to burn with certain destruction. I ask the gentleman if he is willing to afford protection to the holders of slave property, and I am answered that slaveholders are entitled to no protection. Am I expected to stand here and under the forms of constitutional legislation, give my support to measures, which must destroy one of the institutions under which we live? I solemnly believe that the gentlemen from the North are not sensible of the tendencies of such measures as they are proposing. When the constitution was formed its provisions were adopted in good faith, and I had hoped that some portion of the same spirit which actuated the framers of that instrument, would be found pervading this body at this time. That good faith, if it were to be found, would preserve to us the guaranties which are provided in the constitution, and I tell gentlemen that our fathers would never have consented to come into the confederacy if they believed that these encroachments would ever have been made, and that too under the authority of their joint constitution. The spirit of fanaticism never commenced to prevail until it was ascertained that the tide was running against us, but from that moment, about 1820, the time of the Missouri compromise, it has gone on with accelerated rapidity, and it now forms one of the dangerous elements of sectional ambition. My colleague has alluded to some of the evidences of this. When the constitution was adopted it was one of its provisions, not implied, but expressed in terms sufficiently explicit, that if slaves escaped there should be a cooperation on the part of the authorities of the State to which they fled to deliver them up, and as the understanding of the terms such until recently was the practice. In 1793 an act was passed making it penal for any one in any of the non-slaveholding States to harbor or conceal a slave; and there is another important commentary contained in that law, that by that very act provision is made that State courts shall use their authority to aid in delivering up fugitive slaves. That act was made to provide the mode of delivering up runaway slaves. It was made on the assumption that they should be delivered up under the provisions of an extradition treaty. The measure received the general concurrence of Congress and the people. This act looked to good faith for its execution and enforcement. It had the sanction of the wisest men of all sections, not as speculative theorists but as practical statesmen, who looked to actual, and I must be permitted to say, mutual interests. When the law was proposed, what would southern men have thought if they had been told that the courts should afford no such relief, and that it would be criminal for State officers to give assistance? Why, sir, they would have gone no further with compromise, but being the stronger party they would have looked out for their own security. The act was made in good faith to coure the provisions of a compromise, to procure a delivery of a slave to his master. How has that act been treated? A law has been enacted in the State of New York, one in Massachusetts, and I believe I could name a dozen other States where similar laws have been passed, declaring that the State courts have no jurisdiction over that matter, and that it belongs exclusively to the federal jurisdiction. Here, then, is one of the compromises of the constitution entirely disregarded, and laws have been passed interposing obstacles to the recapture of slaves, such as would make it nugatory and dangerous for the owner to make the attempt to reclaim his own property.

In Massachusetts it is made criminal under high penalties for constables to aid in apprehending a fugitive slave; and for jailors to allow their prisons to be used for safe-keeping—a law of precisely the same import has been passed in Rhode Island, and of similar import in nearly all the States north of Maryland. To the North we can look for no aid in apprehending this species of property. So far from fulfilling the provisions and compromises of the constitution, it is made criminal for citizens and officers of non-slaveholding States to fulfil the duties of good citizens; and yet we are told that the compromises of the constitution, and its express guaranties, entered into by our ancestors, will be observed in good faith. And that is to be our security—the security of good faith; and by those who have shown that they cannot resist the temptations of ungenerous jealousy, or criminal ambition! This is worse than resting on a broken reed; or to find a sword where you expected a shield. In all cases where controversies have arisen under such laws, the Supreme Court has decided them to be unconstitutional. Do they stop there? Would to God I could say they did. What is our condition when our property of this kind—property recognized by the constitution—is taken away from us? Can we appeal to their tribunals? Why, we are treated by them with scorn. Can we appeal to their municipal officers? They point to the act, and say, we are prohibited. But, worse than all, it is made the interest of political aspirants to excite a feeling of aversion to slaveholders. They have constitutional rights, but no power to enforce them. Yet I am told, rely on compromise, and, at any rate, "that it is unbecoming in the South to manifest excitement—that we must keep perfectly quiet—not be alarmed, it is all perfectly right." When the fire is burning around me, I am told that I must keep cool—that I must not discuss the matter, with anything like heat. We have a right to discuss it. It is proper for us to vindicate our rights; and I wish there was an adequate issue to put them to a full trial. I say to gentlemen that the crisis is approaching—not by any action of the South, but is forced upon us; and if the horrors of a civil war do come, which God forbid—

> "Turn cast not us: I did it; > Strike not thy ivory hooks at me."

I declare solemnly before Heaven, that I believe that we are in a doomed minority, and that it is the duty of the South to take some means to avert the evil. I have no confidence that the guaranties of the constitution will be regarded. I have no confidence in those who choose to preach to me of good faith, while I have examples of its flagitious violations, and tell me all is well when I see ruin impending over me. I wish I could have confidence. I am told that when a measure of this kind is proposed, it is our duty to give it all the forms of legislation. I should be glad, indeed, if I could discover in it anything calculated to defend the rights of the people whom I represent. The issue must come. Ambition will avail itself of it; the elements of its developments, and of mischief are contained in it. I believe from the course which this discussion has taken, that many gentlemen will vote for this bill, but if they do, they will do an act, the effects of which they do not appreciate. Gentlemen do not understand the feelings of the South. I have no fear of insurrection, nor the dangers of slave property. If we were in the midst of a war to-morrow, I tell the gentleman, that we of the South would feel as safe in the midst of a slave population as in the midst of a free. We will see more of this in other forms—I make the prediction, that should any part of Mexico come into the acquisitions of this Union, there will be provisions introduced to prohibit slavery. The whole territory of the South is to be put into the power of those who tell me that "in medio tutissimus ibis," as they express it. Oh, yes, they are very good judges of the middle course, but as good judges as they are when they undertake to pursue the middle course, they keep it so long as it is their interest, and no longer. What a security for moderation on our part—and confident reliance on the good faith of those who have never kept it! I have expressed myself with some warmth, but I hope the Senator from New Hampshire will, at least, do me the justice to say that it has not been without provocation. I have avoided epithets and violent denunciations, because I am prepared for grave issues when solemn determination and not violence must be resorted to. I am willing to wish the Union safe, but to be so it must preserve right, and maintain constitutional obligations. I cannot resume my seat without expressing the high gratification with which I have listened to the eloquent remarks of the honorable Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HANNEGAN.] He has taken the high-minded and independent course which his character entitled us to expect. I am confident that he will be fully sustained by all true-hearted patriots throughout the Union.

Mr. CAMERON.—I rise merely to defend my own State—that great State which I have the honor to represent—on a single point which has been alluded to by the distinguished Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN.] That Senator has done injustice to Pennsylvania, (unintentionally, doubtless,) in comparing a recent law of her's with an act of the late Legislature of New York. The New York statute, it is said, makes it a penal offence for any of her citizens to aid in the arrest or restoration of fugitive slaves to their owners. The law of Pennsylvania is a widely different affair. Her act of 1826 made it the duty of the State officers to aid in the arrest of slaves; which act, as has been stated by the colleague of the Senator, was rendered null by the decision of the courts. The last act, therefore, is merely a declaratory one, setting forth the fact that those officers were not required by the State laws to render such aid. The duty of the citizens remains unchanged, and is in no way affected.

No attempt has been made by Pennsylvania to interfere, in any way, with the power or authority of the general government, nor the duty of the citizens to that government. The marshal or his deputy can call to his aid a sufficient posse at any time, when it may be necessary to sustain the laws of the Union; and no act in the history of Pennsylvania can be pointed to, which will show that she has, in a single instance, been wanting in a due regard for the guarantees of the constitution, and the compromises under it. Nor will she ever be. The Senator alluded, also, to a disturbance in Carlisle. Undue importance has been attached to that affair, the persons concerned in it were tried, and those found guilty were properly, and I may add, severely punished. They are still incarcerated within the walls of a penitentiary. As to the death of a citizen from another State, I am positively assured that he was the victim of disease, and that his death was not at all attributable to this disturbance.

Pennsylvania has no sympathy with the ultra abolitionists. She has within her borders no fanatics as a body. She may have, and doubtless has, a few individuals who join in these movements of the ultra abolitionists; but they have no aid or countenance from the great body of her intelligent people. A very few men—honest and well-meaning, no doubt—sympathize with the Senator from New Hampshire in doctrine and feeling; but the masses of the people are entirely willing to leave the domestic institutions of other States where they properly belong—in their own hands. They feel that they have no right whatever, under the constitution, to interfere with them. What they claim for themselves, they cheerfully accord to others—the right to regulate their own affairs. They are opposed to slavery in the abstract, and have long since abolished it within their own borders. They are willing, as they should be, to let other States act for themselves in this and other domestic matters.

I am not surprised at the feeling evinced upon this subject by southern Senators. It is natural, and not to be wondered at. We have seen a vessel come within sight of this capitol, upon which floats the proud flag which, I trust, will ever remain as the emblem of our happy Union, and in the dead of night decoy and carry off nearly a hundred negroes, the property of citizens of the District. They feel that if such a state of things is tolerated here, in the very presence of the government, to them the guaranties of the constitution are utterly useless—the safeguards and compromises upon which they have been relying are only mockery. I differ in toto from the Senator from Illinois, with regard to the effect of the agitation of this question. If anybody is injured by it, it must be the Senator from New Hampshire, and his friends. Nor do I believe that this body should be deterred from discussing any question, from a fear of its effect upon the presidency. The South, as well as the North, have interests which they value infinitely above the mere question as to who shall fill the presidential chair. And why shall they, therefore, not be excited? In the excitement growing out of the recent outrage, to which I have alluded, the Senator from New Hampshire has gravely introduced a bill, purporting to be a bill to protect the property of citizens of this District; but, rightly viewed, it is a bill calculated to encourage similar outrages. What could have induced him to introduce such a measure at this moment of excitement? He has brought forward this question to-day, as he does often, for his own amusement. It can do no good, except perhaps to extend his popularity.

Mr. HALE.—I call the gentleman to order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER.—Will the Senate reduce to writing his point of order.

Mr. HALE.—Certainly. The words are these: "The gentleman from New Hampshire has introduced this measure, as he has many others, for his amusement."

The PRESIDING OFFICER.—In the opinion of the Chair the Senator is not out of order.

Mr. HALE.—I must take an appeal from that decision.

The question being put upon the appeal; the decision of the Chair was sustained—ayes 23, noes 5.

Mr. CAMERON.—The bill itself is wholly uncalled for. No citizen of the District has called for it; and it would be unjust to force upon them a law for which they had not asked—to say nothing of the inapplicability of its provisions to the circumstances of the District. Whenever any such measure is needed, the people of the District will ask for it; and when properly digested by the committee through which they are represented here, it will receive the due consideration of Congress.

But I rose only for the purpose of putting my State right on a point or two on which her position seemed to be misapprehended—not to discuss this question at length. She needs no vindication at my hands. Her citizens are an intelligent and reflecting people, strongly attached to the confederacy under which they have prospered so greatly. They will abide by the constitution to the last. An occasional excitement may for a moment have misled a few of her citizens; but it has ever been only momentary, and has passed away with the occasion. Much of the recent excitement on this subject may be fairly attributable to the far-famed Wilmot proviso. That is now numbered among the things that are passed, and its results will soon be forgotten. Famous as it was [illegible] a time, there are none now in Pennsylvania "so poor as to do it reverence." An occasional occurrence may give it a temporary importance. Some one may take hold of it, as heretofore, to give himself a local popularity or a general notoriety. He may be encouraged by a recent appointment here, which seems like a reward for having agitated this question, and procuring the instructions by a legislature to her Senators to vote for it in this body. But that will amount to very little in the end, and will die forgotten as a dream. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion being temporarily withdrawn—

Mr. CALHOUN said: I rise simply to state upon what grounds I made the assertion that the act of Pennsylvania was similar to the act of New York, but did not go so far. The act of New York makes it penal even for the citizens of New York to aid the federal officers. The act of Pennsylvania does not, but makes it illegal for her magistrates and citizens to co-operate, except with the federal officers. Now, the provision of the constitution of the United States requires an active co-operation on the part of the State, its citizens and magistrates, in the delivery of fugitive slaves, and anything short of that is a violation of the constitution, and calculated to destroy the efficiency of the law of the United States in reference to that subject. To that extent the law of Pennsylvania, as well as that of New York, is unconstitutional.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—What is the motion pending?

The PRESIDING OFFICER.—The Senator from Pennsylvania made a motion to adjourn, but gave way to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—I intend to renew that motion. I think after the excitement we have all witnessed to-day, we will be better prepared to decide with the deliberation which usually marks the proceedings of this body, at a future session. I move, therefore, that we now adjourn.

Mr. BENTON.—Will the gentleman withdraw the motion for a moment? I move that the paper be printed.

Ordered, That the bill be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, then gave notice, that should the Senator from New Hampshire have leave to introduce his bill, he would move the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee to whom was referred the "Bill relating to riot and unlawful assemblages in the District of Columbia," be, and they are hereby, instructed to amend the said bill by inserting a section on the same for the effectual protection by peaceful petition, or otherwise, of the citizens of the District, and other citizens of the United States, in the undisturbed possession and ownership of their property as slaves in such District.

On motion,

The Senate then adjourned.

MONDAY, APRIL 24, 1848.

Mr. BELL asked the immediate consideration of the resolution, as he presumed no Senator would object to it. It was simply a courtesy that was due to the members of that body.

Mr. TURNEY would remind the Senator that the House had already the Congressional Globe, in which appeared the proceedings as well as the debates published in extenso, and that if they desired the proceedings and debates of the Senate, they could supply themselves. He would prefer, therefore, that the resolution take the usual course, and lie over one day.

The said bill was read a third time, by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That this bill pass, and that the title thereof be as aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives in this bill.

BRIDGE OVER THE EASTERN BRANCH.

On motion by Mr. CAMERON, the prior orders were postponed, and the bill to provide a free communication across the eastern branch of the Potomac, in the District of Columbia, was taken up for a second reading; when,

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, APRIL 25, 1848.

PETITIONS.

Mr. BREESE presented the petition of L. P. Singer, praying compensation for services in carrying the mail, which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, the petition of Frink and Hadduck, praying compensation for their services in carrying the mail; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also a memorial of the Commissioners of Fayette county, Illinois, praying that authority may be conferred on the State of Illinois to collect tolls on that portion of the Cumberland road lying within her limits, for the purpose of raising funds for the repair of said road; which was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. CAMERON presented a memorial of the Professors of the National Medical College in the city of Washington, praying that an appropriation may be made for the support of the Hospital in that place, which was read and referred to the Committee on the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CLAYTON presented two memorials of citizens of Philadelphia, complaining of an alleged monopoly granted to the Camden and Amboy Railroad and Delaware and Raritan Canal Companies, by the Legislature of the State of New Jersey, and praying the construction of a railroad, as a post road, between the cities of New York and Philadelphia.

Mr. CLAYTON.—I shall not at this time go into any detailed statement of the facts presented in this memorial. The memorialists complain of what they regard as a grievance in an act of the State of New Jersey, establishing a railroad company, which enjoys a monopoly of the route between the cities of Philadelphia and New York. They complain that the tolls on this road are excessive—that the exactions from people of other States of the Union are much greater than those imposed upon the people of New Jersey—that the people of other States are compelled to pay four dollars fare, while the citizens of New Jersey themselves are charged with a toll of only three cents per mile, being a little more than one half the amount exacted from citizens of other States passing over the road. I shall not, however, as I said, go at present into this subject, but merely ask a reference of the memorial to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. I know nothing of the facts stated in the memorial, except on common rumor and report, and from what I have understood, I believe that the facts are correctly stated. The subject, however, will receive the consideration of the committee, who will be prepared to report to us whether the prayer of the memorialists ought to be granted, which asks, as it will be perceived, for a survey of the route with a view to further action on the part of the general government.

Mr. DAYTON.—I am certainly somewhat surprised at the statement made by the honorable Senator from Delaware. That newspapers, and newspaper writers should at any time attempt to excite prejudice against local companies in order to subserve rival interests, or from any other motive, is not surprising. But that the Senator from Delaware should give a species of quasi authority to such statements does strike me with surprise. I have no hesitation in saying, that this entire statement in reference to the alleged extortions practised by these companies upon the public, under the authority of the State, is an entire mistake. In the first place in reference to the fare. For some seventy or eighty miles the amount of fare by the charter of New Jersey is fixed at three dollars. That is the maximum. There is an additional charge of one dollar, but that is imposed by running on the Pennsylvania side of the river. So far as the Legislature of New Jersey is concerned, giving them a direct line from city to city, the maximum fare is three dollars.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, (in his seat.)—They hug the Pennsylvania shore!

Mr. DAYTON.—The State of New Jersey has nothing to do with it. Then, in regard to the amount of toll ten cents is levied upon each passenger. Not a very unusual or heavy charge; for you are to recollect, that the stock and dividends of the company do not, as in other States, pay a cent tax. The whole amount which the State now receives as tax from the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company, is a tax of ten cents a head. I believe that the toll levied on the road between Washington and Baltimore is fifty cents, for one-third of the distance.

Mr. PEARCE.—One-fifth.

Mr. DAYTON.—The amount paid by the Camden and Amboy Railroad is nothing more than a fair tax. The stockholders now receive some 12 per cent. as a dividend, I believe, and the stock sells at 140 for 100 par value, and yet the State of New Jersey is charged with playing the extortioners on the public by taxing the company. It is a question between the company and the public, and not between the public and the State. But I do not wish to go into the minutiæ of the matter at the present moment. If the memorial be referred to the committee, I doubt not, if they think it a matter within the jurisdiction of the federal legislature; and that we have no peculiar rights within our own limits, they will look into the facts and report for the information of the Senate and the public.

Mr. MILLER.—I must also express my surprise at the presentation of this memorial. One remark was made which is altogether unfounded. It was said that the State of New York, by law, authorized the increase of the rate of fare taken from citizens of other States, and that the State received a portion. There is no such law in existence. The State of New Jersey, at the time of the passage of these acts, and by way of contract I suppose, to prevent any future tax upon the company and its stock, fixed the amount of tax at ten cents a head on the passengers. That was nothing more than a mode of taxation agreed upon between the State and the company, and it might as well be said that a toll of ten cents levied on a bridge, fixed by a State legislature, and authorized by the statute, was a tax imposed by the State upon persons travelling through the State. It is nothing more than the ordinary tax, and a very small one, upon the amount of capital. But I should like to understand how it is that our good friends in Philadelphia come here to Congress and ask it to interfere with our local institutions—to ask Congress for the purpose of breaking down, as they say, a monopoly in New Jersey—to create a right of way through our limits for the people of other States. This is a new question truly, and I call the attention of my honorable friend from Connecticut, the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Road, to take this affair into serious consideration.

Mr. CLAYTON.—Before I proceed to reply to my friends from New Jersey, I will take occasion to read a very short letter addressed to me with the memorial. My correspondent, who is one of the most respectable citizens of Philadelphia, says:

> "We are getting very tired of monopolies in this part of the country, and I must beg the favor of your presenting the enclosed memorials, signed by many of our respectable citizens, on the subject of that of the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company. It is one more of those instances which something must be done. They are oblivious to all remonstrance, and I feel very much encouraged by "Railroad kings," when they are compelled to be passing through their dominions, and look us out of house and home, to consideration of all usage."

I shall now ask for a reading of the memorial.

The SECRETARY then read the memorial, which is as follows:

> To the Senate and House of Representatives > of the United States of America assembled:
> The memorial of the undersigned citizens of Philadelphia, respectfully sheweth:
> That, on the thirty-first day of March, 1832, the Legislature of the State of New Jersey passed an act, entitled "An act to incorporate the Camden and Amboy Railroad and Transportation Company," by the provisions of which the said company were granted, for the term of twenty-five years, the exclusive right of transporting passengers and merchandize on that portion of the railroad constructed by the said company, which extends from the city of Camden, on the Delaware river, to the city of Amboy, on the Raritan river, in New Jersey, and the exclusive right to navigate in steamboats the waters of the Raritan river, to the point where the railroad constructed by the said company terminates, for the purpose of connecting the said railroad with the steamboats employed in the business of transporting passengers and merchandize on that important link in the chain of communication between the northern and southern portions of the Union.
> That, in consideration of this and other grants, the said Companies conveyed to the State of New Jersey a large portion of their real and personal estate, and agreed, in addition thereto, to pay to the said State transit duties on all passengers and merchandize carried across the State, to wit: ten cents per head for all passengers, and fifteen cents per ton for merchandize, except coal, hay, straw, manure, and emigrants, for every passenger, and eight cents for every ton of merchandize carried on said canal.
> That, in consideration of the privileges and Companies, the passengers, merchandize, and coal have been, and the people of New York and Philadelphia have submitted to three-fold [illegible] on the same road.
> That on the fifteenth day of March, 1837, the Legislature of the said State enacted another law, by virtue of which the said Companies were authorized to charge the sum of four dollars for each passenger carried on any of the railroads of the said companies to and from the said cities by day, and five dollars by night, provided that they should not be charging of the State one half of any sum they should receive for the [illegible] might charge for each passenger so carried.
> That these unconstitutional monopoly, and exclusive privileges, your memorialists believe, to the constitution of the United States, to impose, at its pleasure, duties upon all passengers and merchandize entering into, and departing from its territory, and has constituted the said Companies its agents for the collection of those duties.
> That the [illegible] of the said Companies, by the [illegible] of other States, and thereby to exempt its own citizens from the payment of taxes for that purpose.
> That while thus taxing the citizens of other States, the said State endeavors carefully to guard its own citizens from the effects of the monopoly thus granted, it being specially provided in the law which authorizes a charge of five dollars on passengers [illegible] New York and Philadelphia, that the fare between [illegible] shall not exceed [illegible] the same distance would not exceed [illegible] every mile.
> That in the exercise of their [illegible] the said Companies have imposed duties upon passengers and merchandize, the said State has thus destroyed that competition which is absolutely requisite for securing moderation of charge, frequency of communication, and rapidity of transport.
> That [illegible] the said Companies, being [illegible] these united companies [illegible] would be under a system of free competition, while communication is infrequent, and transportation far less rapid than on other roads.
> That on account of the [illegible] the Company, and to the several subcompanies to whom this monopoly is farmed out, exceeds, as your memorialists have reason to believe, two millions of dollars, and consequently that the tax directly imposed upon the people of the States of the Union considerably exceeds a million of dollars.

That in addition thereto it imposes a heavy amount of indirect taxation in various ways, as we are—

By deterring persons engaged in trade from travelling to attend to their own affairs, and thus compelling them to pay commissions to a vast amount.

By preventing the free interchange of commodities between the several portions of the Union, but more particularly between the cities of New York and Philadelphia.

By compelling the shipment by sea of vast quantities of merchandize, thus causing delay and frequent loss of property.

By preventing that free intercourse between the people of the various portions of the Union, so essential to their own improvement, and to the harmony and prosperity of the Union itself.

That the amount of indirect taxation thus imposed considerably exceeds that of the direct taxation; and that your memorialists believe that it would be well worth making it at treble that amount.

That because of the existence of the monopoly thus secured to these Companies, the Post Office Department has found it all times difficult to make satisfactory arrangements for the transportation of the mail, and that the system of correspondence between the cities of New York and Philadelphia and the intervening populous towns and cities, is in a high degree unsatisfactory: whereas were competition permitted, the mail would be carried more cheaply, more frequently, and more rapidly, as your memorialists believe, than in any other portion of the Union.

That by the constitution of the United States, your Honorable Bodies are empowered to establish post roads, and that in the exercise of that power your predecessors have caused roads to be made through Maryland, Virginia, and other States.

That the difficulties there to be removed were merely natural ones that would in time have been removed without their aid, whereas the difficulty here existing is an artificial one, that the people themselves are not, and never can be competent to remove.

Your memorialists believe, therefore, that this is a case requiring the special interventions of the Supreme Authority of the Union. They have, for many years, been heavily taxed in the payment of exorbitant charges for the transportation of themselves and their merchandize, and they see no prospect of relief from any action within the State of New Jersey itself, which has just now granted to this Company a further extension of its powers. They therefore respectfully pray that your Honorable Bodies will be pleased to direct the survey of route for a post road between the city of New York and Philadelphia, the line of such road to be established under the perpetual control of the Union, and to be used for the construction of a railroad, the said road to be constructed by the United States, or by a Company to be formed by virtue of an act of Congress empowering the Postmaster General to make, or contract to make the same thereto as he may deem best calculated to secure to the people of the Union, for themselves, their correspondence, and their merchandize, frequency and rapidity of intercourse, and moderation of charge.

Your memorialists would desire to call the attention of your Honorable Bodies to the fact, that while by the construction of this road the convenience and advantage of the people of the Union will be greatly promoted, the Post Office Department will thereby be enabled to contract for the transportation of the mail free of expense, and the War and Navy Departments will also be enabled at all times to pass both men and munitions of war at a cost less by more than one-half than is now demanded for them, and that thus the measure now proposed is one the adoption of which must greatly benefit the National Treasury.

And your memorialists will ever pray, &c.

Mr. CLAYTON.—Now I do not know what portion of the memorial which has been read, my friends from New Jersey undertake to deny. The first and most material of the statements is this, that the State of New Jersey has, under a contract with this company, giving it an exclusive right to carry passengers over this route, denying to herself during the continuance of the charter, the right to charter any other company. This she has done for a certain consideration. The whole power of the State over the subject of roads and canals, is given by this charter to this particular company, so as to inhibit the State to charter any rival company. Now if that be not what is called by the memorialists a monopoly, and an odious monopoly, I do not know what can deserve that name. I wish to know whether my friends from New Jersey deny this fact stated in the memorial. If they do not, then the statement which I made in presenting the paper, that this was an odious monopoly, or was held to be so by the public, is certainly sustained. Here, sir, is an allegation by these most respectable memorialists—who, I have no manner of doubt, state what they believe to be true, and what I myself suppose to be true—that there is a considerable level upon the people of the United States for going across the State of New Jersey on this rail road, for the benefit of the State of New Jersey, which they consider to be unjust, because this sum is contracted for entirely to the benefit of the State of New Jersey, and goes into its coffers. They say that the State has derived a revenue from this company, of more than a million of dollars. Now be it more or less, the half or the quarter of that sum, I say it is unjust to the rest of the people of the United States.

Mr. MILLER.—(In his seat.) The State does not receive a quarter of a million.

Mr. CLAYTON.—I give the statement of the memorialists—but let the sum be what it may, I contend that the exaction is unjust. It ought not to be extorted from the people of other States. The memorialists say farther, that one of the acts of the legislature makes a discrimination between the toll charged upon the people of New Jersey, and the people of other States. They allege that the people of New Jersey are charged for way-fare three cents per mile, or a sum not exceeding three dollars, whilst citizens of other States are charged four dollars between Philadelphia and New York; and they say five dollars in the night time.

Mr. MILLER.—There is no such law in existence.

Mr. CLAYTON.—All that will undergo the examination of the committee. These memorialists then consider themselves greatly aggrieved by this monopoly. And my friend says that the general government has no right to interefere. Then I suppose the general government has no right to establish a post route across the State of New Jersey. I shall not debate that question now. Let it go before the committee and they will form their judgment upon it. If they think it is an unjust monopoly, and that the government of the United States has the power to establish a post route, I trust we shall grant the prayer of the memorial, and order the survey to be made. If there is a constitutional inability in Congress to make the law, of course we can do nothing. And if the State of New Jersey can thus extort a tax from the citizens of other States, every other State may do the same. Thus if the example of the State of New Jersey in the matter is to be sustained, we may predict with great certainty, that the other States through which people are compelled to travel, upon that great thoroughfare from North to South, will also lay transit duties, and the result will be a general oppression upon the travelling community, which has hitherto been unexampled. If all this be right on the part of New Jersey, what will prevent Maryland from doing the same thing?

Mr. MILLER, (in his seat.)—She does the same thing.

Mr. CLAYTON.—No. She has granted, as her Senators say, no monopoly. New Jersey stands alone. What is to prevent Delaware from doing the same thing? She has two rail-roads and a canal passing through her limits. If this transit duty can be sustained in one State, why it will be sustained in others, and the consequence will be, that which I have just suggested, a general system of oppression upon the whole travelling community. I do not now intend to go into the question whether there is a constitutional power in Congress to make post routes in the State of New Jersey, because I desire to call the attention of the committee to the facts and the law in the case, leaving them to investigate it. The memorialists are men of the highest respectability; and whether their statement be true or false, can be easily ascertained. In the hands of the committee I therefore leave the subject.

Mr. MILLER.—If the Senator will permit, I beg to state that there is no monopoly in this case in the sense in which the gentleman understands it. There are two roads between the city of Philadelphia and New York, on which the great travelling takes place. The Camden and Amboy rail-road was originally from Camden to South Amboy. Then there is one from Trenton, passing through Princeton, New Brunswick and Newark, an independent road entirely, competing with the other road. These charters were intended to induce parties to invest money in these undertakings, and are quite similar to the charters granted to other roads by Maryland and Delaware, providing that no other rail-road should be constructed within a certain distance of the road constructed by the company to whom the charter is given. If the gentleman means that when a State incorporates a railroad company, and secures to them for a certain number of years the right of carrying freight and passengers on other railroads free of competition, that a monopoly is created, I think that the States of Maryland and Delaware have also created monopolies, for the travelling between Baltimore and Philadelphia, is entirely under the control of one company; and if the State of New Jersey has thought proper to secure to the company this right for a number of years, and has thus created a monopoly; we have monopolies all over the United States. I am somewhat surprised to hear the Senator say that Congress ought to look into this "odious monopoly."—Does he undertake to assert that any one of the independent States of this Union has not a right to give what is called a monopoly, in order to secure her citizens, or other persons who may invest money in canals or railroads, the right of exclusive use for a certain number of years, and that Congress must interfere for the purpose of suppressing this so called monopoly? This, it appears to me, would be a direct interference with State rights of considerable importance. I do not stand here for the purpose of defending this company; I believe the rate of fare is too high, but that is a matter entirely between the company and its customers. I do not see what right we have to interfere. But the city of Philadelphia complains. Now, this Camden and Amboy railroad, for nearly one half the way, traverses the State of Pennsylvania. They own or control a road under the law of Pennsylvania, and I have not inquired into the matter in order to ascertain whether that be a monopoly or not. If it is not, the people can open a new road, because the State of Pennsylvania has the control of that road, and I therefore think that if there is any ground of complaint from the city of Philadelphia, she should apply to the legislature of her own State.

Mr. CLAYTON.—I am glad to hear the Senator admit that the railroad company charges too much; and that if we can relieve the people of the United States constitutionally from this monopoly, we ought to do it. My friend has referred to the legislature of the State of Delaware. He is in error in regard to her legislation, on this whole subject. She has two railroads, in which a capital of six millions has been invested. I believe all the tax she receives from both these roads, is about one or two thousand dollars a year each—not enough to pay her for her trouble in legislating for the benefit of the companies who own these roads. She has also a large canal, which cost three millions of dollars, and does not levy one dollar of taxes upon it; and she has bound herself never to lay a tax upon it. I said that this was a monopoly, if the statements of the memorialists were true; and the Senator from New Jersey says it is, for he admits that the State of New Jersey has prohibited herself from constructing another railroad within ten miles, or within some considerable distance of this one. It is impossible for passengers to go between the two cities in the same time, if they be driven to a railroad route more than ten miles from either of the cities. Therefore the charge of monopoly is fully sustained. It was not my design to say anything upon this subject, and I hope I have not said anything offensive to the feelings of my friends from New Jersey. I have great respect for that State and for her Senators on this floor; but as citizens of the United States do complain of this act of legislation, I can have no hesitation in calling it to the attention of the appropriate committee of this body, in order that if any action be necessary, it may be adopted.

Mr. DAYTON.—I have but a single word to say. In my opinion we are engaged in a debate with which the Senate of the United States has nothing whatever to do, and the Senator from Delaware knows that very well. Will he, as a lawyer, as a Senator, say that Congress has any thing in the world to do with such a matter? He has carefully eschewed saying any thing of the kind. But it was not in reference to the petition that my associate or myself desired to make any remarks, it was to correct the erroneous impression which might be made that the State of New Jersey played the extortioner. Against that impression our feelings revolted, and when there is a quasi authority given to these statements by the allegations made directly, by the Senator from Delaware in presenting this petition, we deem it but respectful to the Senate as well as just to the State which we have the honor to represent, to say that the statement is incorrect. The Senator says that we are mistaken with respect to the legislation of Delaware, and it is very likely to be the case that gentlemen may be mistaken when they speak of the legislation of States to which they do not belong. The "respectable correspondent" of the Senator from Delaware speaks about being "kicked out of the cars," though he does not say exactly if he has been the victim. I am confident that he is entirely mistaken in reference to the acts of which the memorialists complain, and that their statements with respect to them have just as little foundation as that about being "kicked out of the cars." The State derives ten cents for each passenger, and we exact the same charge from our own citizens that we do on the stranger. Now we know that there are public works in Pennsylvania, and almost every other State, the stock and dividends of which are taxed by the State, and the same thing exists in New Jersey only in another shape. The difference between the legislation of New Jersey and other States in this respect are only in the form in which the tax is laid.

Mr. MILLER.—The statement is that the company receives two millions per annum one-half of which goes to the State. I wish the Senator would make that good.

Mr. CLAYTON.—What I say myself I always make good. I have made no statement on my own authority in respect to this matter which is not susceptible of proof, but I referred the Senate to the memorial, and upon that alone I relied for the main facts in the case, of which I myself do not know any thing.

Mr. DAYTON.—I can only say—the Senator not backing the memorial by his own authority—that its contents are entirely incorrect from beginning to end.

Mr. CLAYTON.—I cannot suffer this remark of the honorable Senator to pass. I have not a shadow of doubt that the great leading statement contained in the memorial is strictly true, viz: that the State of New Jersey created this monopoly in order to prevent a rival corporation from entering into competition with it. That neither of the gentlemen can deny. It will not do, then, for them to say that all the statements of the memorial are incorrect. The statement to which I have just alluded is true, and I believe that the others are true also. I know very well that the people of other States complain of this as an oppressive monopoly. There cannot be so much smoke without some fire. It is impossible that there can be so much complaint without some just cause for it.

Mr. CASS.—If this discussion is to continue I must move to lay the subject on the table, in order that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill providing for the settlement of the California claims.

Mr. CLAYTON.—I trust the gentleman will allow me to press my motion to refer the memorial?

Mr. CASS.—Certainly.

The motion to refer the memorial to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads was then agreed to.

CLAIM OF THE CHOCTAW INDIANS.

Mr. ATCHISON, submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before the Senate a report from the Attorney General, in respect to the [illegible] claim of the Choctaw Indians, under the treaty of Dancing Rabbit Creek, of the 27th September, 1830, and the [illegible] thereof, with the opinion [illegible] and the [illegible] thereon, as the [illegible] and the [illegible] of the late January [illegible].

THE PUBLIC PRINTING.

Mr. BADGER submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be instructed to inquire into the [illegible] of the Public Printing, and [illegible] to the Senate and House of Representatives [illegible] to the Senate [illegible].

ADVERSE REPORT.

Mr. UPHAM, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of Rignald alias Nick Hillary, reported it without amendment, and submitted an adverse report on the subject; which was ordered to be printed.

COLT'S REPEATING PISTOLS.

Mr. RUSK, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the message of the President of the United States, of the 14th instant, relative to "Colt's repeating fire-arms," submitted a report accompanied by a joint resolution, requiring the Secretary of War to purchase five thousand of Colt's repeating pistols.

The joint resolution was read and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

PRIVATE BILL.

Mr. BELL, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the documents in relation to the claim of William Lee, reported a bill for his relief; which was read and passed to the second reading.

WABASH AND ERIE CANAL.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. HANNEGAN asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill entitled "An act in addition to an act therein mentioned;" which was read the first and second times by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

RECOMMITTAL.

Mr. UNDERWOOD moved that the bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of David Myerle, be recommitted to Committee on Naval Affairs.

CALIFORNIA CLAIMS.

Mr. CASS moved that the prior orders be postponed, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill for ascertaining and paying the California Claims.

Mr. HALE.—I think that common fairness and candor requires that the Senate should take up my motion for leave to introduce the bill of which I gave notice a few days since. I have been accused of being an enemy to the constitution, and of being "a high way robber," in bringing forward that bill. The charge has gone out to the country, on the wings of the press all over the land, and I feel that it is only just that the Senate should vote upon the motion. I do not care in what form the question may be put. All I desire is a vote, and I ask that it be taken by yeas and nays.

The motion of Mr. CASS was agreed to upon a division—yeas 25, nays 9—and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill for ascertaining and paying the California Claims.

The amendment reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom the bill was recommitted, was read as follows:

Strike out all after the word "delay" in section two hundred and [illegible] of the bill and insert the following:

And no such certified claim shall be paid until it be examined by the late quartermaster of the California battalion, J. C. Fremont, and by the late commissary and the late paymaster of the battalion, Captain Hensley and Major Reading, and allowed by them or a majority of them; and payment of such unascertained claims, as soon as allowed and certified, shall be made to the claimants in California by such proper disbursing officer as may be appointed to accompany the fleet that may convey all claims not presented and allowed within one year and a half from the time of passing this bill shall be forever barred; and the compensation of the volunteers provided for according to that of their respective ranks in the late battalion, and shall be paid out of the appropriation contained in this bill, and shall make return of their proceedings to the War Department. And the mounted non-commissioned officers of the battalion shall be paid as mounted riflemen, and in full of all claims for lost horses, for any loss whatever, in full of all claims for forage, as well as for pay, rations, and use and risk of horses, shall be paid as follows: First sergeant, thirty five dollars and twenty-five cents per month; other sergeants and corporals, thirty-two dollars and twenty five cents per month; musicians, twenty-seven dollars and twenty five cents per month; privates, twenty-seven dollars and twenty-five cents per month.

Mr. MASON.—I am unable to perceive that the objection which I presented to this bill, a few days since, has been in the slightest degree obviated by the amendment which has just been read. The objection which I urged was, that the bill created offices, and appointed certain officers to fill them, which was in violation of the constitution. The honorable Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER,] who, as everybody knows, is a very able jurist, at once took the distinction so well known to the common law, between an "office," and an "employment." That was met by the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. BADGER,] who endeavored to show that this mode of appointing officers was sanctioned by legislative and judicial precedents of which he cited several examples. Deeming this a matter of vital importance, inasmuch as it is of the highest moment, that we should not trench upon the rights of the Executive, I have taken some pains to look into these precedents, and into the authorities generally; and the result of that investigation has satisfied me that the supposed precedents are altogether unsatisfactory.

The bill originally proposed to create a board by name, eo nomine, consisting of Lieut. Col. Fremont and two other officers of a certain class. The objection made was, that that involved the creation of an office, and by law appointed officers, with the duty of adjudicating certain claims against the United States. Now, the amendment proposes, not to create a board eo nomine; but that the unascertained claims shall not be paid unless they have been previously examined, and allowed by three gentlemen whose names are given—John Chas. Fremont, Captain Hensley, and Major Reading. The amendment farther provides, that these gentlemen who are thus to examine these claims shall be compensated according to their respective ranks in the late Cali-ornia battalion. What then does the amendment provide? Why, substantially the very same thing which was provided in the original bill—that these claims are to be examined, adjudicated, and determined upon evidence which shall be laid before these individuals; and when ascertained by them to be correct shall be paid, without further inquiry, by a proper disbursing officer, out of the public treasury. Now, I cannot for my life see any shadow of difference in the substance of this thing, whether you call these three gentlemen, examiners of claims, or a "board" as they were styled in the original bill. It is further provided in the amendment, that all claims shall be barred, which are not presented to these officers for their examination within one and a half years after the passage of the bill—thus during that year and a half, these gentlemen are to continue in the employment of the government, I say in office under the government, at a fixed rate of compensation, to be paid them for the discharge of the duties of that office. Now, the precedents cited by the gentleman from North Carolina, on a former day, were as far as I could understand, in every instance, precedents of mere employment, not of office, by which certain persons were engaged to discharge a certain specified duty; and the employment was to cease when that duty had been performed. He cited cases of artists employed to paint pictures, and execute statuary for the decoration of this Capitol. I have not now the list of cases cited by the gentleman, but I recollect that amongst them was one in which he conceived, that the very case now before us was presented. It was the case of Mr. Choteau, who was employed to visit the Western Indians, and conduct a deputation from them to the seat of government.

Now, sir, I find in the horn book of the law—and this is purely a legal question—that Blackstone thus defines the meaning of the term office:

"An office is a right to exercise a public or private employment, and to take the fees and emoluments thereto belonging—whether public, as those of magistracy—or private, as those of a steward, bailiff, and the like."

"Every man is a public officer, who has any duty concerning the public, and he is not the less a public officer, when his authority is not confined to narrow limits—he is an officer in the state, as the constable is in a town, which makes him a public officer, and not the extent of his authority."

So much for the meaning of the term "office." Now to distinguish between an "office" properly such, and a mere "employment"—I will take the honorable Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. BADGER,] back to the black letter, in the times of Charles the Second, and refer him to a case decided in the King's Bench in 1658, reported in 2d Liderpin, page 142, where the Chief Justice Glyn, thus strikingly draws the distinction—He says:

"I hold in this case, that the grant be the words concessimus," to Sir John Gates is good. I conceive that the consideration of the case upon the point, they not pertaining to office, but an employment—and that there is more than a verbal distinction between them."

Now to explain my distinction between an office and an employment. I hold that although every office be an employment, yet conversely, every employment is not an office. As if I agree with one to make my lawyer or to plough my land—or to herd my flock—these are employments and differ from the duties of my patron, which is an office.

The difference between a "duty continuing" and a duty which ends when the particular object is attained, is here strikingly drawn. In the State of Maine, I find that there was a decision of the judges on this point which I have examined with some care, and which I think fully sustains the view which I have presented.

It will be found reported in 3d Greenleaf, page 482—The question submitted to the Judges of the Supreme Court of that State, by the Governor was, whether an agent appointed by him for the preservation of the timber on the public lands, was to be considered an officer, within the meaning of the constitution of that State—and by the unanimous opinion of the judges, it was decided that he was not—then such agent held no "office," but merely an "employment," under the State—the judges say:

"There is a manifest difference between an "office," and "employment" under the government. An office is that to which certain duties are attached, for the performance of which power is given, and a salary or fees are allowed by the government in consideration of the performance of the duties of the office."

I find the same distinction taken in a case decided by the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania—"Binns' case" reported in 17th, Sergeant and Rawle. Binns had been appointed by Mr. Clay, when Secretary of State, to print certain public papers, &c., for that department, being at that time an alderman of Philadelphia, and the question was, whether this appointment by Mr. Clay made him an officer of the federal government.

It was decided by a majority of the Court, that it was a mere employment, and not an office, and the case in Liderpin was referred to for the distinction.

I apprehend then if there be any foundation for this distinction resting upon the authorities I have cited, that it at once disposes of the whole class of cases of "employment" cited by my honorable friend from North Carolina. The painting of pictures—execution of statuary—the compilation of State papers, are "employments" properly within the meaning of that term.

Then as to Choteau's case, also cited by the Senator from North Carolina. It is found in the law of appropriations for Indian annuities, &c., passed July 7th, 1838—in which amongst a long series of appropriations is the following, viz: $20,000.

"For expenses of mission of A. P. Choteau amongst the wild tribes of the South West, including his outfit, and the expenditures growing out of, and connected with [illegible]."

And this is cited by the honorable Senator, as an instance where one by law was clothed with an office, or made an officer, as is proposed by the bill under consideration.

Now I understand that the intercourse with the Indians is a matter purely pertaining to the Executive. The President is the organ of intercourse with those tribes as he is of that with foreign nations. It is an executive function; and when he deems it right and proper to conduct deputations from those Indian tribes to the seat of government, he can give the necessary orders to that effect. He reports the fact to Congress, and an appropriation is made to defray the expenses. I cannot then perceive any analogy between the case cited and that now before the Senate—There was another case presented by the honorable Senator from North Carolina which struck me with some force at the time, and of which I have made an attentive examination. I refer to the act of Congress, September, 1789, by which it was enacted.

"That the establishment contained in the resolve of the late Congress of the 3d October 1787, except as to the mode of appointing the officers, and except as to the number provided, be and the same is hereby recognized to be the establishment of the troops in the service of the United States."

The "resolve of the late Congress," thus referred to, was a resolution of the old Congress under the articles of confederation, and will be found in their journals, volume 4th, pages 786—7, in these words:

"Resolved, That seven hundred non commissioned officers and privates be raised for the term of three years, unless sooner discharged"— which were to be furnished in certain proportions, by certain states.

In 1789, the federal government had been organized under the present constitution, and this recognition of a levy of troops merely by a resolve of the old Congress the Senator construes into a legislative appointment, of all the officers who were to command those troops. Surely the honorable Senator could not have read attentively the law which he quoted, or he could not fail to see, that the point for which he cited it, is strictly against him—the law in express terms excepting "the mode of appointing the officers," which was to conform to the provisions of the constitution, then recently adopted. So much, sir, for the precedents cited by the Senator from North Carolina.

I now come to the case cited by the honorable Senator from Texas—the case of the mail contractors. A resolution or law passed the two Houses of Congress, referring a matter in dispute between these contractors and the government, to whom? To an officer of the government—the Solicitor of the Treasury. Does any one doubt—has it ever been doubted that the Congress of the United States have authority to prescribe new duties to existing officers, provided these duties are not inconsistent with the rights of the officer for the time being? That was all that was done in the case in question. The Solicitor of the Treasury is an officer of the government, and the first question before the court was, whether the Postmaster General could exercise any discretion in carrying out this law of Congress—whether virtute officii he could exercise that power; and the next question was whether the District Court of the District of Columbia could exercise jurisdiction in the case by writ of Mandamus.

Mr. RUSK.—Will the Senator allow me to ask a single question? I desire to ask if when an act of Congress is brought before the Supreme Court, it would not be wanting in duty, if it failed to inquire into the constitutionality of that act?

Mr. MASON.—I would answer the Senator by stating that, whether the Supreme Court of the United States would, or would not enquire into the constitutionality of the act, would depend upon the preliminary inquiry whether any constitutional question was raised in the case. If there was a constitutional question raised and it were relevant to the matter at issue, I take it for granted that the Supreme Court would determine it. In the case alluded to, the Senator relies upon a loose expression of one of the judges who delivered the opinion that it was competent to Congress to devolve the duty upon that officer or any body else.

Mr. RUSK.—Three of the judges made use of that expression.

Mr. MASON.—It is perfectly immaterial. The honorable Senator well knows, that when you invoke a precedent, and rely upon it as authority, you must have a case, where the point in question is directly adjudged. These loose dicta of the judges if relied upon as precedents, and more especially in constitutional questions, will lead us heaven knows where.

There was another case cited by the Senator from North Carolina, in which certain duties were devolved upon the judges. The court considered the act, and decided that it was perfectly competent to the legislative branch to accumulate any duties they thought proper upon the existing officers of the government. To prescribe new duties to the judiciary, although it were a coequal department of the government, provided the duties prescribed were of a judicial character. But in the case cited the court decided, and as I apprehend, correctly, that the duties prescribed by the act were not judicial. When they had so decided, they had done all that judicially came before them. What then? They determined as benevolent and patriotic men, that although they were not bound by law to discharge these duties, yet that they would for the purpose of carrying out the benevolent designs of the law makers; and they say farther in this recital, that the duties would be discharged by them gratuitously. Having first protested against any right on the part of the legislature to impose such duties upon them, they say that they will act as commissioners in order to carry out the views of Congress. I apprehend that this case does not present any authority for the position taken by the honorable Senator from North Carolina. Surely he cannot mean to affirm that the legislative exposition of the right of Congress to create an officer.

But, sir, on this whole subject of precedent, I enter a protest. I am free to admit that the opinions of judges and Senators with respect to the constitution have great weight, but no authority. I deny that the precedents cited are to be regarded as authoritative in this case. I hold it to be as much the duty of the Senate to respect the rights of the Executive as it is to take care that the Executive does not trench upon their's. If it is true that this is an office, properly such, within the meaning of the constitution, it is our duty to avoid doing violence to that constitution, and interfering with a power that does not belong to us—the power of appointment to office.

We are to inquire from the nature and extent of the duties to be imposed in this case, whether they come within the legal meaning of the term "office." Nothing is changed in the amendment but the language of the bill. Precisely the same trust is expressed. Duties to the same extent are devolved. The same amount of money is to be passed upon and adjudicated—to be disbursed in fact by the persons named, though the existing law to pay it and with their own hands. They are to be compensated for the discharge of these duties. They are to continue in office, if necessary, for eighteen months. What are their duties? Why, to pass upon a series of unliquidated claims, the character of which are unknown to us—in the territory of California, some three thousand miles distant—and then to pass upon, and, in fact, draw upon, when spot, all the property of these gentlemen in the money to be paid. If this be not an office within the definition of the Maine judges I do not know what is. The expenditure of such a large sum of money on account of claims assumed ex gratia, by this country is a grave affair. It should be entrusted to a board of officers appointed in the manner prescribed by the constitution. All the safeguards which the constitution has thrown around the public treasury, should be respected in this instance. Certainly, I cannot be supposed to imply any distrust of the gentlemen named in the bill, not one of whom have I the pleasure of knowing at all. When I speak of safeguards, I mean those legislative safeguards provided by the constitution and the laws, and which are always regarded when expenditure of public money is involved.

If the Senate reject the amendment reported by the committee, I shall offer one with the view of creating this board in the usual manner giving the power necessary to adjudicate these claims, and placing the appointment of the members of the board, where I contend the constitution has placed it, in the hands of the President and Senate.

Mr. BADGER replied, enforcing the argument which he had presented in favor of the measure before the Senate, and rebutting the objections urged by the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. BENTON rose and said: The amendment reported by the committee proceeds upon the principle that the claims in California heretofore ascertained and allowed by the officers under whom they originated shall be forthwith paid, and those not ascertained shall not be paid until examined and allowed by the same officers. Mr. Fremont and his staff officers allowed those which are ascertained; the same officers, by the amendment, are to allow the remainder before they can be paid. This is the principle of the amendment. It appoints nobody to do any things it only names the persons without whose examination and allowance the unadjusted claims shall not be paid. They were officers of the battalion under whom the claims originated and were settled, as far as that has been done, and whose legal capacity to pass upon the claims is revived and continued, if the government chooses to have the claims examined before they are paid, or chooses to save the parties from coming from California to Washington to solicit payment individually from Congress. That they are the proper persons to allow or reject these claims, and the only ones who can do it with justice to the United States and to the claimants, is manifested from the depositions, where their knowledge of the whole subject is fully shown. Capt. Hensley was commissary and quartermaster; Major Reading was paymaster. Both were cognizant of the claims, one in doing the acts which originated them; the other in settling them, so far as he could. The deposition of Capt. Hensley, (a gentleman of character and intelligence, with whom the committee became well acquainted,) establishes this fact, and shows that he and Major Reading, from their respective positions in the battalion, were best acquainted with the claims, and were called by their offices to make an estimate of their amount before he left California. At page 37 of the document of depositions, he testifies thus, in answer to a question from the committee:

"As commander and commissary, I furnished him [Fremont] with the necessary funds to pay the troops, and he appointed me special Commissary to collect the claims, and directed me to make an estimate of the amount. The Navy [illegible] opinion of the whole amount [illegible] and I had the best means to ascertain the amount."

"Question. Did you [illegible] Major Reading [illegible] paymaster and [illegible] in the battalion? Answer. I [illegible] he [illegible] thousand dollars. Major Reading was operating in the north with Col. Fremont, and myself with Com. Stockton in the south."

From this answer of Capt. Hensley to the committee's question as well as from the tenor of other depositions, and the very nature of their places in the battalion, it is clear that he and Major Reading are the proper persons to be associated with Mr. Fremont in allowing or rejecting these claims. They know every transaction, and cannot be deceived. They know every claimant and cannot be imposed upon. They know the true from the false in every instance, both of men and transactions. They can do justice, and that upon their own knowledge. Their own characters are concerned in rejecting false accounts, and preventing their names and acts from being made the means of imposition upon the United States.

At pages 35 and 36 of the document, Capt Hensley shows that all supplies were scarce and dear, and the dearer because necessarily obtained without money, there being none furnished by the United States. He says:

"After the capture of Angels were taken by the United States forces Capt Gillespie [illegible] government, and I acted as assistant quartermaster for the forces stationed there. After the insurrection broke out in September 1846, provisions and supplies of all kinds could only be obtained at the most extravagant prices, the whole surrounding country being in the hands of the enemy."

And he gives a statement of prices fully sustaining this declaration:

Horses	$50 to $75
Saddle horses, valuable [illegible]	50 to 100
Beeves	6 to 10
Sheep	6 to 10
Beans	4 to —
Indian corn	100 to $200 Ans. $150
Powder	$2 per pound
Lead	$1 to 2 per pound
Cheese	100 [illegible]
Flour [illegible]	25 to 50 per head
Brandy	$20 per [illegible] gallon
Soap	2 to 3 per pound
Tea	5 to 10 [illegible] pounds

At such prices as these, except for the horses and cattle, which are below the price of the same in the United States, and without money to pay down, amounts soon run up high; but still small for the great results produced in conquering the country, and pacifying it, before the United States troops arrived.

A great error prevails in the minds of some Senators as to the authority for incurring these claims. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. MASON] classes them all as unauthorized. It is a great mistake. The claims arising from unauthorized operations limit themselves to about thirty days of time, and to the expenses of a force of less than three hundred men. They limit themselves to the operations under the flag of independence—from the first week in June to the 10th of July—when the flag of independence was abandoned, that of the United States adopted, and the battalion went into service with the navy. From this time forth all expenses were duly authorized, the naval commanders acting under special orders from the President to conquer, retain, and govern California.—These orders began in October, 1845, in anticipation of the war, and were continued by successive orders of the most urgent kind. Those of July 12, 1846, though they did not arrive until operations were over, were issued in the very time that Mr. Fremont was in the act of joining the naval forces, and show what the intention of the government was at that time. They were addressed to Commodore Sloat, and said:

"[illegible] have informed you of the intentions of the government, relative to the war with Mexico [illegible] and California.

"You are hereby commanded, should you [illegible] on receipt of this order, to possess yourself of such ports in Upper California [illegible]. The object of the United States has reference to ultimate peace with Mexico, and it, at that time, the basis of the uti possidetis shall be established, the government expects the only war forces to be found in Upper California [illegible] of Upper California. This will bring with it the necessary civil establishment. Such a government should be established under your protection."

These instructions are positive in themselves, and refer to previous instructions. They correspond with all the previous orders to the navy. That branch of the public force was charged in advance, and in anticipation of the war, with the conquest of California whenever war broke out. They were to conquer the country; they were to hold possession of it till peace; and they were to establish a civil government for its temporary administration.—The naval commanders were to do this, and did do it. Commodore Stockton took command in July, immediately after Mr. Fremont came to Monterey, and under his orders all subsequent military operations were carried on, and the civil government established, the expenses of which now remain to be paid. Commodore Stockton received from the government for prosecuting the conquest of California; Commodore Sloat was censured and recalled for not doing it; and Mr. Fremont and his battalion were a part of Stockton's forces, and acted under orders from him.

The very day this letter of the 12th of July was written at Washington, Mr. Fremont was on his way to Monterey, to aid Commodore Sloat to do the very thing which these reiterated instructions required him to do. He was fulfilling, to the letter on that day, the orders which were emanating from Washington. At the distance of 3,000 miles, and without orders, he was doing what the government wished done, and what the naval commanders could not have done without a land force.

The letter of recall to Commodore Sloat, dated August 13, 1846, shows not only that the naval commanders were required to conquer, retain, and govern California, but that they would be censured and superseded for not doing it. Here is that order, dated, as I have said, on August 13, 1846—by a strange coincidence the very day that Stockton and Fremont were entering the city of the Angels, and putting the finishing hand to the conquest of California. Hear it:

"U. S. NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington August 13 1846.

"Commodore: I [illegible] have received your letter, No. 51 of June 6, from which [illegible] have not been aware of the existence of [illegible] between the United States and Mexico, you continued in a state of quiescence, and did not carry out the instructions of June 24, 1845, framed to be executed even in the event of the mere declaration of war, much more in the event of actual hostilities. Those instructions you were ordered to carry out at once.'

In my letter of August 5, 1845, the receipt of which you acknowledged on the 28th January, 1846, referring to them, I said: In the event of your you will obey the instructions recently addressed to you via Panama." In my letter of October 17, 1845, of which you acknowledge the receipt on the 17th of March, 1846, referring to these instructions you remove, I said further: 'In the event of actual hostilities between the Mexican government and our own, you will so dispose of your whole force as to carry out most effectually the objects specified in the instructions forwarded to you from the Department, in view of such a contingency.' And surely there is no ambiguity in this language.

And in my letter of the 23d of February last, sent through Mexico, I remarked:—'This letter is sent to you overland, enclosed, as you suggest, to Messrs. Mott, Talbot & Co., Mazatlan, and you will readily understand the reserve with which it is written.

The Department, on August 5, 1845, had also told you 'that your force should not be weakened, while hostilities are threatened by Mexico.' Your course was particularly approved in detaining the frigate Constitution.

The Department will lose this more urgent necessity than as yet appears, existed for the otherwise premature return of that vessel.

The Department willingly believes in the purity of your intentions. But your caution not to do wrong has led you into a most unfortunate and unmerited inactivity.

Very respectfully, your ob't serv't,

GEORGE BANCROFT.

Commodore JOHN D. SLOAT,
Commanding U. S. naval forces in the Pacific Ocean.

This is the letter recall of Commodore Sloat; recalling him for inactivity; for delay in commencing hostilities; for his unfortunate anxiety not to do wrong. It is full proof, not only of authority to act, but of blame for not acting. Commodore Stockton succeeded Commodore Sloat. He acted, and Fremont with him; and the mass of these claims—the whole, except the insignificant amount accruing during the first thirty days, under the flag of independence, arose under the command of Commodore Stockton, and were doubly authorized, both by his position as commander on the California station, by the reiterated orders to the naval commanders, and by the express approbation of his conduct since he returned home.

The operations without authority limit themselves, then, to about thirty days of time at the commencement, and will not require forty thousand dollars to pay them; and for that sum the United States received more than the amount at the time. in horses, cattle, cannon, and muskets, taken from the enemy, and delivered to the United States, or used in her service. Eighteen brass cannon, two hundred and fifty stand of muskets, four or five hundred cattle, and nearly double as many horses, taken under the independent flag, went to the United States. These materials of war went to the United States, and were worth full fifty thousand dollars in money. The United States received, then, in materials of war, more than it is asked to pay for these unauthorized operations. She received horses, cattle, cannon, and muskets to more than the value; and we are ready to put a proviso to the bill limiting the amount to be paid for these operations to a less sum than the value of the articles actually received. But this would be but a poor way of settling the account. The United States received all the fruits of the revolutionary movement: she received all the benefits of the movement; and these benefits were of a kind not to be weighed or measured against money. She received all the northern half of California, conquered to her hand, before the naval forces began to act; and this half so received by her has remained tranquil in her hands ever since. It broke up the juntas for transferring the country to the protection of Great Britain, and stopped the grants and sales of the public domain to British subjects, and arrested the proceedings in the Macnamara grant of three thousand square leagues before the grant was complete, and all the original papers of which have been brought to the United States. It induced Commodore Sloat to change his mind after he had been five days at Monterey, and decided him to take possession of the place, thus anticipating the arrival of the British admiral by a few days, and converting his arrival into benefit instead of harm. For when he did arrive, finding the place in possession of the United States, he saw that his mission was at an end, and went off as suddenly and mysteriously as he came, abandoning California to its new masters, and putting an end to all hope of British protection. Finally, it saved the American settlers from destruction, gave a body of organized and victorious land forces to the United States to act with the navy, and presented to the view of the British admiral that camp of mounted riflemen which had such a discouraging effect upon his mind and such an encouraging one upon the minds of the naval forces.

These were the benefits received by the United States from the movement under the independent flag. They are above price, and beyond dispute. The historical depositions taken by the committee prove every thing, and the dispatch of Commodore Sloat to the Secretary of the Navy, of July 31, 1846, coincides with the sworn testimony in showing the happy effects all this had upon the British admiral's visit, converting it into a benefit instead of a mischief. He says:

"On the 16th the British admiral, Sir George F. Seymour, arrived in the Collingwood, 80. An officer was immediately sent to tender him the usual courtesies and the facilities of the port. He was subsequently furnished with a set of topgallantmasts and other spars for his ship, and sailed on the 23d for the Sandwich Islands.

"The visit of the admiral was very serviceable to our cause in California, as the inhabitants fully believed he would take part with them, and that we would be obliged to abandon our conquest; but when they saw the friendly intercourse existing between us, and found that he could not interfere in their behalf, they abandoned all hope of ever seeing the Mexican flag during our occupancy again."

Thus the British admiral disappointed the expectations of the British party in California. He came, as they expected, but when he came he did nothing. He did not interfere in their behalf; he behaved friendly. He went off in a few days, carrying with him the emissary Macnamara, and on his departure the inhabitants lost all hope of ever seeing the Mexican flag again flying in California. Thus was California saved from passing, like the Mosquito coast, and so many other places, under British protection. California was saved! And how came it to be saved? Because Mr. Fremont, his topographical corps, and the settlers had overturned the Mexican authority before he arrived—had extinguished the British party—had induced Commodore Sloat to take possession of Monterey, and he himself, with his battalion, had come down to the coast to second the operations of the navy. This saved California. All the depositions attribute these results to Mr. Fremont's movement; and his coming down to Monterey to join the naval forces was the crowning act of his whole conduct. It was decisive upon the minds of both British and Americans. It showed a land force, already victorious over the Mexican authorities, ready to act with the navy. A camp of mounted riflemen suddenly appearing, and as if by magic, was an impressive sight both to British and Americans. It discouraged one as much as it encouraged the other, and assured the conquest of all the remaining part of California. Lieut. Minor, of the navy, then in Commodore Sloat's squadron, has well testified to all this. He says:

"The undersigned was on duty on shore when Captain Fremont arrived with his force at Monterey from the north. The undersigned believes that the appearance of this body of men, and the well known character of its commander, not only made a strong impression upon the British Admiral and officers, but an equally important one upon those of the American navy; that, in Montana, [Monterey?] the undersigned can say, that, after he had seen Captain Fremont's command, all his doubts regarding the conquest of California were removed."

Such is the testimony borne by Lieut. Minor to the decisive effect which the appearance of Fremont's riflemen made upon the minds of both British and Americans at that time. It was certainly a strange and impressive spectacle to see a body of American riflemen at such a place, and at such a time—three thousand miles from home—on the coast of the Pacific—already victorious over the Mexican authorities, and ready to co-operate with the naval forces in repulsing British interference, and in pursuing the conquest of California to its conclusion. Immediately after they went to sea under Commodore Stockton—sailed five hundred miles down the coast, and disembarked for new services on land. But I forbear. The object of these few remarks was to show, not the services of the California battalion in the whole war, but only for the first thirty days, while acting under the flag of independence, without a knowledge of the Mexican war, and without orders from the government. I mean only to show the value of these services, and that all their fruits went to the United States; and that the amount to be paid for these services under this bill will be less than the value of the horses, cattle, arms, and cannon delivered to the United States, to say nothing of benefits of a different kind, above price and above calculation.

The bill and the amendment reported by the committee are drawn with the view to settle up and to close up forever this business of the California claims. It is obvious what a mine of fraud they must become if not settled up and closed up quickly and forever. For this purpose the claims are to be examined on the spot where they occurred before they are allowed. They are to be examined by those who know the truth and justice of every transaction—able to detect at once all false or exaggerated claims—and barring forever all that are not presented and allowed within the limited time. It also closes up another source of fruitful and almost perpetual claims—that of claims for lost horses. This is a most expensive incident of the mounted service—great in itself, and great in its continuance, and hard to be brought to a close. This amendment, if adopted, will prevent all such claims from coming up from California. It will close them all up at the start. It makes an allowance for forage, at the rate of twelve and a half cents a day, in addition to the forty cents a day for the use and risk of the horse—an allowance justly made, as no forage was ever furnished the California battalion by the United States, and the horses were subsisted upon grass while watched and guarded by the men. The whole compensation is made into a gross sum, (consisting of the items of pay, clothing, use and risk of horse, and forage,) and offered in full of all demands for horses lost for any cause, or by any means whatever. It would doubtless be advantageous to the United States to settle with all their mounted forces on the same terms.

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 26, 1848.

PETITIONS.

Mr. PEARCE presented the petition of Ann Jeffers, widow of a revolutionary soldier, praying a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WESTCOTT presented the petition of Major William Bayley, praying to be discharged from liability for certain public property which has been applied to the service of the public; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

On motion by Mr. PEARCE, it was Ordered, That the petition of Littleton D. Teackle, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Claims.

PORTRAIT OF GENERAL TAYLOR.

Mr. BADGER submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Library be instructed to procure the full length original portrait of General Zachary Taylor, painted by William G. Brown, of Richmond, if the same can be obtained at a price deemed by the committee to be reasonable.

Mr. BADGER asked for the immediate consideration of the resolution; but, objection being made, it lies over one day under the rule.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. BRIGHT gave notice that on to-morrow, or some early day thereafter, he will ask leave to introduce a bill to make Madison, in the State of Indiana, a port of entry.

PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE SENATE.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted on the 24th instant by Mr. BELL:

Resolved, That the Reporter of the Senate be directed to supply each member of the House of Representatives with a copy of his report of the proceedings and debates of the United States Senate for the present Congress, the expense to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

Mr. BELL.—I do not know that it is necessary to say anything more in addition to the remark I made upon introducing this resolution, that I consider it but a suitable courtesy to be shown by us towards the House of Representatives. It may be proper to state, however, lest gentlemen may suppose that the suggestion came from the Reporter of the Senate, that I had no communication with that gentleman on the subject, further than to inquire of him whether it would be practicable, from the nature of his engagements, to furnish copies of his reports to the House, which I considered to be due to that body as a matter of courtesy; and, I did not stop to inquire whether this additional number of the reports should be paid for out of the funds of the Senate, or the House. As my colleague suggested the other day, they may be paid for out of the funds of the House; but I will remind him that there can be no material difference, because the two funds are in effect the same, derived from the same source, and applied to the same object, the payment of the expenditures of the two houses of Congress. In regard to whether it is expedient to continue the arrangement under which the debates of the Senate are reported, it is not necessary to express an opinion at this time; that is a matter to be determined hereafter, but so long as it continues, I think it is but a matter of comity that the members of the House should receive those reports, and I trust that my colleague will forbear his opposition. I was somewhat surprised to find that it had not been done before; I supposed that the reports were furnished to the House, and some gentlemen around me were under the same impression. I can conceive no possible objection, and I hope the resolution will be adopted.

Mr. TURNEY. I cannot for my own part perceive the necessity for passing this resolution to furnish the House with the reports of our proceedings and debates. I believe it is a thing that has never been done. If the members of the House require these reports, they can procure them for themselves. But I have another objection. Notice has been given by an honorable Senator from Missouri, that he intends to move to rescind the resolution under which the Reporter of the Senate has his engagement, for reasons stated by him, one of which was, that these reports cost three times as much as they could be procured for. The members of the House of Representatives cannot be much at a loss for the reports of the Senate, because they have the Congressional Globe and Appendix. I was opposed to the resolution for employing a reporter originally, because I believe it to be unnecessary, and I was the more opposed to it upon the assurance of the Senator from Missouri, that we were paying three times as much as the work was offered to be done for by Blair & Rives. This resolution does not specify the amount to be paid for these reports which we propose to furnish to the House; this with me is a decided objection. If the House order them for themselves they will procure them at a specified rate, or by a contract under which they will obtain them at a reasonable price. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. CLAYTON.—I think the motion offered by the Senator from Tennessee is eminently proper, and ought to be adopted by us. It is urged as an objection that the House can purchase these reports, or obtain them by contract, under a resolution to be adopted by itself. I think it will readily occur to every one that it would be improper for the House to contract with our officer. Under all the circumstances, I can see no propriety in the proposition that the House should make any such contract. But I rose not to speak in reference to this resolution merely. Something has been said by the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. TURNEY,] in regard to the report of our debates, which I think demands a reply. Sir, I have been a long time a member of this body, and I venture to say that we never had any think like accurate and full reports until we adopted the resolution appointing this reporter. Any Senator who has been here many years, and has observed the reports of the debates in this body, will concur with me in this. I do not mean to say that we have perfect reports even now; I know there are defects, but I believe those defects do not flow from any fault on the part of the Reporter, but from our own fault in not furnishing an adequate amount to enable him to employ a sufficient number of Reporters, and to procure the printing to be promptly done. It is true, the reports are delayed sometimes for several days, but we can readily understand why. The officers who are reporting for us, have been compelled, often during this session, to report debates lasting through six or eight hours, and not to give two or three speeches only, but the whole debate. This is a difficult thing to be done by so few reporters; and it is easily perceived, that for the sum appropriated, the work cannot be done more speedily than it is. I trust that we shall never abandon the system, but go on and perfect it. I should recommend that instead of abandoning the system, which has been found to be better than any other, we should set about perfecting it, by furnishing a sufficient sum to pay for the printing of the reports promptly, for I think that all must concur with me, even the Senator from Tennessee himself, that the expense is nothing in comparison with the importance of the reports both to this body and the country.

Mr. TURNEY.—In relation to the accuracy of our reports, I do not mean to say any thing further than this: that I believe they are not more accurate than they were last session, and not more accurate than they are this session as given in the Globe.* There is no improvement at all. The Senator from Delaware says we are not paying enough. Why, the newspaper press of this city proposed to report for the Senate at a rate of compensation not exceeding the half of what we are paying. A committee of the Senate made a report on the subject some years ago, and named the amount which they considered necessary to defray the expense of reporting the debates of the Senate, and we are paying double and more than double, as much as any estimate that has been made; and yet it is urged as a reason for not getting our reports furnished, according to contract, that we are not paying enough. We are paying more than double what you have to pay for the Globe and Appendix. I do not see any use for having reporters employed at all, but as we have them, if the House desires to be furnished, let them make their arrangement. I am opposed to the plan of one House undertaking to supply the other with reports of its debates. It is introducing a new principle. It will be forcing upon them perhaps what they do not want. I am opposed to it altogether.

The question being put upon the adoption of the resolution—

Mr. TURNEY demanded the yeas and nays on agreeing to the resolution, which were ordered, and it was determined in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atherton, Badger, Bell, Benton, Berrien, Bright, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Dickinson, Dix, Downs, Foote, Hale, Hannegan, Jarnagin, Johnson of Maryland, Mason, Moor, Pearce, Rusk, Sebastian, Underwood, Upham, Westcott—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Atchison, Bagby, Breese, Butler, Cameron, Dayton, Johnson of Georgia, Lea, Fetes Phelps, Sturgeon, Turney, Yulee—13.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their clerk.

Mr. President: I have the honor to inform the Senate that the House of Representatives have passed a bill entitled "An act to change the name of Photius Kavasalos to that of Photius Fisk."

*The report furnished to the Senate by contract are republished in the Globe.—REPORTER.

RIOTS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The PRESIDING OFFICER.—The next subject for the consideration of the Senate, is the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. HALE,] for leave to introduce a bill relating to riots and unlawful assemblies in the District of Columbia.

Mr. BENTON moved to postpone the prior orders, and proceed with the consideration of the bill for ascertaining and paying the California Claims, which was the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. HALE said the morning hour had not yet expired, and he thought the leave he had asked to introduce a bill ought to be first disposed of. He had no disposition to debate the subject, but he desired to have a vote. If the object of the motion to take up the California hill was to evade a vote upon the leave he had asked to introduce his bill, he must ask the yeas and nays upon it.

The yeas and nays were then ordered upon the motion to take up the California Claims bill, and it was decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Atchison, Atherton, Badger, Bagby, Bell, Benton, Breese, Bright, Clarke, Cass, Crafton, Cuthbert, Davis, of Mississippi, Dayton, Dix, Felch, Houston, Johnson, of Maryland, Johnson, of Georgia, Lewis, Mangum, Mason, Moor, Pearce, Rusk, Spruance, Underwood, Westcott—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Calhoun, Douglas, Hale, Niles, Phelps, Turney, Upham—7.

THE CALIFORNIA CLAIMS.

The Senate then resumed the consideration of the bill for ascertaining and paying the California Claims.

The question pending was upon agreeing to the amendment reported from the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MASON moved to amend the amendment by striking out the first fifteen lines, and the word "department" in the sixteenth line, and inserting in lieu thereof:

"And for the purpose of ascertaining the justice and amount of the residue of said claims, a board is hereby established, to consist of three fit and competent persons, to be nominated by the President, and by him appointed, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, which board shall sit at different places in California, and to give certificates for the amount due, which certificates shall be forthwith paid in California by some proper officer duly appointed or designated for that purpose."

Mr. MASON.—If the honorable Senator from Kentucky will yield the floor for a moment, I would like to state the specific object which I have in view, in offering an amendment to the amendment reported by the committee. It is to strike out so much as constitutes these gentlemen by name to be a board of commissioners, and to substitute this phrase: "a board to be appointed by the President." I offer this amendment, and while up, I will remark that I do so for the purpose of testing the sense of the Senate; upon it I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. UNDERWOOD.—But for the constitutional question that has been raised upon this occasion, I should have contented myself, in all probability, with giving a silent vote. Like the gentleman from North Carolina, I have great respect for precedents, judicial and legislative. But those precedents, to entitle them to respect, should always be settled upon due deliberation; and at the time when they are settled, the attention of the body, whether it be judicial or legislative, should be called to the importance of the subject upon which the precedent is about to be established.—Now, if there has been any formal discussion of the Senate or the House, on this important subject, has a direct bearing upon it, no gentleman who has heretofore participated in the debate, has taken occasion to bring forward any evidence of that discussion, to show that upon arriving at a conclusion, it was done upon mature deliberation, and after full discussion. This, then, as far as I know, is the first time this important question has been brought up and discussed to any considerable length. I do not propose, by any means, to make a long speech upon the subject. I rise, principally, to give my views in regard to two of the cases which the honorable Senator from North Carolina brought forward as precedents to govern our conduct on this occasion; and to show as far as I may be able, that those precedents, thus brought forward and relied on by him, are not, in effect, precedents which ought to govern in this case. The first case to which the attention of the Senate is called, is the one that was decided in '92, by Judges Jay, Cushing and Duane. If I understand that case aright, it operates against the argument of my honorable friend; and if any proper conclusion can be drawn from it, it does seem to me to be adverse to the passage of this bill, as it comes to us from the committee. It is necessary to look for a moment at the law which those judges, in '92, were called upon to enforce. It was an act to provide for the settlement of claims of widows and orphans—claims previously barred by the lapse of time, and to regulate the claims of invalid pensioners.

Now the object of the act which the judges were required to execute, after the limitation had been taken off these claims was this: they were directed to ascertain what widows and what orphans were entitled to the half-pay of the deceased officers, whose half-pay had been granted to them by the Continental Congress. They had another duty, and that was to ascertain what officers were entitled to such half-pay by virtue of the law of the Continental Congress. And what do the judges say in reference to these duties? They say they are not judicial duties, and therefore they decline performing them as judges, but say they will do it as commissioners. What is the argument now based upon this decision? The argument is that, by judicial determination, Congress may legislate so as to appoint a commissioner. I do not deny this; but, you must take into view the nature of the duty which the commissioner is to perform, in order to apply the constitutional test. It will be seen by the decision of these judges, that they recognized the right of Congress to appoint commissioners to enquire and report upon what the legislation of Congress might act. No one ever denied that this may be done. It is the every day practice for either House, to appoint a commission to ascertain facts upon which their legislation shall be based. That is merely an employment as it has been properly defined. It is not a judicial or legislative office, but merely an employment, the result of which is to constitute the basis of future action of some department of government, or of all of them combined. The case before the judges was of that description. And when they reported the facts and their opinion upon them to the Secretary of War, as the act of Congress required them to do, he had the right to carry into effect or suspend the decision of the judges at his decision. This power conferred upon the Secretary to control the action of the judges, proved to their satisfaction that they were required to perform were not judicial; because, if judicial, they must be final and conclusive, unless revised, affirmed, or annulled by a higher judicial tribunal, and not by one of the Executive departments or by Congress. The action of the judiciary, under the constitution, cannot be revised and controlled by the Executive or Legislative departments of the government; and because their action was subjected to a control of that kind, they decide that the duties required of them were not judicial.

The judges were required by the act, to report to the Secretary of War, and when they did report to him, the Secretary had a right, as will be found upon examing the act, to suspend or control their judgment, and further, that it should be submitted ultimately to the revision of the legislature. What does this prove? It proves that the judges were nothing more than commissioners to ascertain facts upon which the war office and legislative department, were to act subsequently to the ascertainment of those facts. What is the case of Gratiot brought forward by the gentleman from North Carolina as a precedent to govern us? He was appointed by act of Congress to unite with two officers of government, to ascertain and report upon facts, but their action was not to be final. I have taken the trouble to look into the act, and I find that they were directed merely to inquire into the facts and make a report. Now how do these cases stand? They show that Congress may appoint a commission to ascertain facts for the future action of the legislature, and this I contend, is not an office within the meaning of the constitution. What is an office within the meaning of the constitution? That instrument has divided the government into three departments, the executive, the legislative, and the judicial. By those departments, all the business of this vast country of ours is conducted. These departments embrace the business of the entire government. The whole business is classified, and the classifications of the business are such, as all men of ordinary intelligence can understand. Now if it be mere preparatory information for these departments, or any of them to act upon, that you are desiring to obtain. I admit that it presents itself according to the distinctions taken in the books not in the form or nature of an office. But if it be the final disposition of the business, that can only be done, I conceive, under the constitution by the agency provided in that instrument. What is the case here? Why this case is finally to dispose of seven hundred thousand dollars, and there is no appeal. According to this bill there is to be no revision on the part of either the Executive, the judiciary, or the legislature. It differs from all the cases then, that have been found inasmuch as the final appropriation of several hundred thousand dollars is to be made by the commissioners appointed by this act. Is it not of sufficient importance to require the constitutional agency of the country to dispose of it. What is this constitutional agency? It is the employment of an executive, a legislative, or a judicial officer. I rose to give this answer to the cases cited by my honorable friend, and to show that they do not apply as precedents in this case, and if they do not, we have only to take up the constitution and construe it for ourselves, not being trammelled by any former action of the Senate, or of any other branch of government. Having reached the conclusion, that the bill could not be sustained in its present shape, I shall vote for the amendment of the honorable Senator from Virginia.

Allow me one more remark, and I have done. I have no personal acquaintance with Mr. Fremont. I have admired the man from character. I have read with pleasure the valuable information he has given with regard to the country in which these operations have taken place. I, therefore, am not actuated in the remarks which I have made by any feeling of hostility towards him, or disinclination, that he should be appointed. If I could be influenced by any feeling at all, it would be in favor of his appointment; and I would readily go for the bill were it not in consideration of the paramount claim which the constitution has upon me. I will also remark, that I perceive this bill allows a greater amount than Colonel Fremont has estimated would be sufficient to pay the claims. I suppose the committee had their reasons for enlarging the amount, but I would like to hear why it has been enlarged? I find his report fixes the amount at less than five hundred thousand dollars. He gives an enumeration of the items, and his estimates seem to be quite liberal. I merely refer to this thing, hoping some gentleman will inform the Senate, why it is the committee thought proper to enlarge the amount.

Mr. BENTON.—Will the Senator have the answer now?

Mr. UNDERWOOD.—I shall be glad to hear it sir.

Mr. BENTON quoted from the testimony taken before the committee.

Mr. UNDERWOOD.—I had not examined that part of the testimony, but I see the basis of their action now.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi.—I think the Senator might have gone much further into the matter of the services rendered by the battalion. I do not intend to occupy the time of the Senate by entering upon any extended argument—that has been fully done by others—but simply to call the attention of the Senate to the subject of constituting by legislation a legal agent. And I will make a supposition. Suppose those officers had remained in the service, it would be demanded of them, that their vouchers should be perfected on the ground where the claims arose. And what is this bill for? Nothing more than to give an opportunity to send those very persons, who, if they had remained in service, would have been selected to discharge that duty, by reason of the offices which they held, to perfect the vouchers for those unpaid claims in California. That is the whole purpose of it. It creates no office; it does not even create an agency. It only limits the payment of the claims in California, to the vouchers which have been thus perfected. If the President does not choose to rely upon the certificates of these commissioners he will require the vouchers to be examined at the Auditor's office. This is the plain view of the case. This is the extent to which it is necessary to legalize the acts of the persons herein named, hence they were named, hence their compensation is fixed at precisely the same rate to which they would have been entitled had they remained in the service. It merely places them back in a position to render that service which they would have performed if their office had not been extinct. I have been somewhat surprised to hear gentlemen arguing upon the question as to the difference between an officer and an agent. I have no desire whatever that they shall be considered as officers. My purpose is merely to legalize the certificates of these commissioners so that they may supersede the necessity of any further formality by ourselves or otherwise.

Mr. NILES.—The yeas and nays having been called for on the amendment of my honorable friend, the Senator from Virginia, I beg leave to give a very brief explanation of my vote upon this subject. The amendment which was reported from the committee as a substitute for the original provisions of the bill has obviated the difficulty which was supposed to exist at that time, and the question now is whether there is still a difficulty. The original bill provided for the establishment of a board to examine and decide upon these claims, to consist of one person named, and two others described as officers of a certain corps. This provision was clearly in conflict with the constitution, as it directed that the appointments were to be made by the President, with the concurrence of the Senate, and, at the same time specified the persons he should appoint. Whilst admitting that the appointment belonged to the President, it undertook to restrain and limit his power. This could not be done, as his power is derived from the constitution and cannot be restrained by law. This struck me at the time as not only exceedingly novel, but as being actually a limitation on the constitutional power of the Executive. To direct the President whom he shall nominate, is a manifest limitation of the power which belongs to him under the constitution. Now, however, we have a different proposition offered to us, and what is it? It is that in one of the sections of the bill certain persons are designated to carry into effect one of the objects of the law. These persons are not called a board, not designated as filling eo nomine any office whatever. Still they have a very important duty to perform, and that is neither more nor less than to execute the law that we are about to pass, at least all that part of the law which provides for examining and adjudicating the claims. Another part of the law provides for their payment, which is to be done by a person to be appointed by somebody, and of course, if we provide by law for any public duty, and do not provide for the appointment of the person to discharge that duty, the constitution in such case directs that the President shall do it. The first portion of the duty then required by this act, we propose shall be performed by the persons named in it. That is the whole matter; and gentlemen cannot make any thing else of it. It is a question whether Congress can themselves execute their own law, because whatever we do by our agents, we do do ourselves. I am not going into any nice examination of these points, but there is clearly no precedent for such a proceeding. I believe the thing never was attempted before. Can Congress execute their own law? Why gentlemen must see that that would be to confound executive and legislative powers. Are we to appoint our own agents to execute our laws? I say, what is the use of having an Executive department at all? The duties of these individuals are of a judicial, a ministerial character, they certainly are not legislative, not such duties as belong to us to discharge ourselves, or by our agents. And if we undertake to do it, we are undertaking to withdraw from the Executive, that which properly belongs to him. And what will be the accountability of these men? To whom will they be responsible? Who can remove them? Who can give instructions to them? Can the President? No, sir, he can have nothing to do with them, any more than he can with a committee in this body. They are substantially a committee of this body. I hope the time is remote when a precedent of this kind can be set. I can say with my honorable friends that I am far from being disposed to increase the Executive power, but at the same time, I am not for depriving the Executive of the power that rightfully belongs to him. I am not for assuming by the legislative department of this government, any Executive function, because it must tend to produce a conflict between the departments which may lead to the destruction of our whole system. How was it in England during that long struggle between prerogative and privilege—prerogatives of the crown, and privileges of Parliament? I know it is said that the President has a veto upon our acts, and can by it, protect his rights. Still that is no reason why Congress should attempt to encroach upon them. Sir, it is the principle with me in all cases, with regard to questions of power, or where a reasonable doubt exists, with regard to the power of Congress, to give the benefit of that doubt to the constitution. But in my judgment, this is not a case of doubt. It is a case perfectly clear, unless it can be made plain, that in some way you can get around the provision of the constitution which has separated, the Executive power being a ministerial power, from the legislative power. We are endeavoring to combine the two when we propose to execute our own law. The only example that has the slightest bearing upon this case, is the action of Congress upon private bills; but is there not a manifest distinction between private and public acts? A private act is not one that requires the action of the Executive; and everything in such a bill which is operative, and has the force of law, is nothing more than authority to some officer, to do an act specified. As for example, to pay money. We investigate the case here either in the Senate or by committee, and direct a sum of money to be paid. The law is executed by the public officer. Such arbitrators do not execute a public trust; they only make the investigation which a committee might make. But, sir, a public law is a different thing altogether. The Executive is sworn to execute the laws of the country, and we create for him such duties as we please, within the limits of the constitution. If we direct a new service to be performed, and either provide officers, or throw it upon those already appointed, the duty devolves upon the Executive in a greater or less degree. Because if you direct the appointment of new officers, these appointments devolve on him, and if the duty is thrown upon existing officers, he has to superintend their action, and you cannot withhold from the Executive that duty. But I ask, if in this case the Executive can remove these men or withdraw from them their power, and if he cannot, then would it be consistent with the constitution that the appointment should be made in this way? This is not a slight matter, I mean of keeping the various branches of the government separate; it is a great fundamental principle. I can therefore support no such provision as this in its present, or in its original form; and the omission to give these agents any distinctive name or character, or even to define their course of proceeding, will not at all help the matter, because they are to execute the law; the bill recognizes them as public officers, I think by providing a rate of compensation. If we can do this, we can pass a law dispensing entirely with the Executive department of the government. It is very easy to see that in this way we could withdraw the whole Executive duty from the regularly constituted officers.

I am not disposed to take up the time of the Senate, but this question involves an important principle. We are getting around the constitution, and the fact that it is done in this covert manner is no recommendation. I am rather more suspicious of it on that account. I do not like that feature of the amendment. I would not vote for a loan which should bear on its face an apparent design to evade and get round the constitution. There is too much of an appearance of an attempt to escape the difficulty by keeping it out of sight—too much the appearance of a studied purpose to cheat the constitution, to cheat the Executive, and to cheat the public. This renders the provision much more objectionable with me, instead of relieving it from the constitutional difficulty. I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from Virginia, not that I dislike the nominations. If they were made in a constitutional manner, I should have as much confidence in those gentlemen, especially one of them, from my knowledge of his public character and services, as in any individual that could be named. Still in all legislative acts I would rather have the guards which the constitution furnishes, and if the bill can be so amended, it will remove all hesitation on my part. It will, I think, remove the difficulty entirely.

Mr. PHELPS.—This is a matter of very great importance; for if a precedent of this kind be set now, it must unquestionably lead to collision between the different branches of the government. If, however, the construction given by the Senator from Mississippi be a correct one, it goes very far to remove the constitutional objection. If this be merely a measure to provide the mode of obtaining the testimony in order that it may be laid before the departments, there can be no objection to it. But the amendment strikes me as carrying upon its face a very different import. It provides that no claim shall be paid unless examined and allowed by these persons. Now, in my understanding of the term allowed, it involves a judicial power. If they determine against a claim, if they disallow it, it is not competent for any of the departments to allow it. No department has power to interfere.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi.—Will the Senator allow me to ask him whether, at the close of this war, the duty of the disbursing officers, the commissioners and quartermasters will not have to be continued for six months, in order to bring up their accounts and their certificates, which will have to be placed in the department exactly as it is proposed to be done here?

Mr. PHELPS.—No doubt the regular distribution of power is the subject of legislation. There is no doubt that Congress can add to the duties of any officer, or transfer duties from one officer to another. Congress has, from time to time, conferred specific duties, but this is a totally different matter from the appointing of officers. But I was remarking upon the feature in the amendment that these men shall allow such claims as they think just, and if they disallow any, nothing but new legislation will cover the case; and if their allowance or disallowance is to be conclusive, is it not conferring upon these men judicial authority, and a judicial authority which is not open to revision, but which is conclusive upon the government itself? But whether their authority be judicial or not, the consideration hinted at by the Senator from Connecticut, has been from the beginning decisive with me. What are their powers? They have power to act upon and decide claims against the government—is this not an official duty? How are these powers exercised now? By the departments. You have a numerous class of executive officers, whose duties are exclusively confined to these subjects. You have auditors in the several departments whose appropriate and principal duty it is to decide upon claims. Now, if we take these powers which the constitution has placed in the hands of these persons, and confer them upon our own appointees, the result is that the appointing power of the Executive is worth nothing; it is entirely useless. This consideration has been decisive with me from the beginning. This bill takes from the officers, established by law, the exercise of their appropriate powers, and confers these powers upon the nominees of Congress. This being the principal official duties of these officers, is that duty to be changed into the character of an employment at your discretion? Does it change the duty because you choose to give it a new denomination? No, sir, the duty is precisely the same, and the objection returns upon you. This bill proposes to take from the accounting officers of the Treasury powers and duties conferred upon them by law, and to place these powers and duties in the hands of persons not appointed agreeably to the provisions of the constitution. If you can do this in one instance, you can do it again. If you once adopt the principle that you can withdraw from these men their power and confer it upon whom you please, can you not withdraw from the departments all their power and place it in the hands of your own nominees? It seems to me there is no avoiding this conclusion. Take any branch of the public service, and if you can once enter upon this course you can carry it to the end. Under these circumstances, without troubling gentlemen or myself with a lengthened discussion, I have merely to say that, if this is an official duty in the hands of these officers of the government, it is so in the hands of our appointee. The duties cannot be changed. And, in my humble judgment, if we can give these duties to whomsoever we please, we can go far enough to make the whole corps of officers appointed by the President entirely useless. I am not in favor of setting such a precedent, which would have the effect of opening the door for a further assumption of power.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—I find that gentlemen the most competent to judge of questions of constitutional power, differ in opinion upon this subject. That would be a sufficient reason with me—if I had no opinion of my own on the constitutional question—to vote in favor of the exercise of the power now in controversy, by Congress rather than by the President. I prefer to see it exercised by Congress as a safer and less dangerous depository of power than the Executive. If it were matter of doubt as to where the power belonged, I should prefer, that it should be placed in the hands of Congress. I am not, however, without an opinion on the constitutional question. I know the powers of government are divided into legislative, executive and judicial; but I know another thing, that this division cannot, in the nature of things, and of the constitution of governments, be perfect and exact. There will necessarily be a small mixture of powers, and this is as requisite as the alloy in your coin. Take your courts of justice—are there not discretionary rules enforced by them independently of enactments affecting the rights of parties? Undoubtedly. You give them power to prescribe rules of practice, and it is necessary that they should have that power. Take the executive department of the government. Are his powers as existing in practice within the limits of the constitution merely ministerial? How often, in the course of his duties, does he exercise a power which, in an abstract point of view, may be regarded as legislative? So with the legislative branch of the government. How can it get along without some portion of executive power—such a portion as is necessary or incidental to the wholesome exercise of the power with which we are unquestionably vested. I do not propose to enter at large into the subject, but merely to call the attention of gentlemen to this view of the matter. The question is whether the provision contained in this bill is an assumption of the power which belongs to the President—an usurpation of his power.—Is it not our constitutional and legitimate province to provide for the payment of these claims? Undoubtedly. Without legislative provision, there could not be the payment of a dollar; and no other power than Congress has a right to provide for that payment. It is a legislative duty. We can prescribe the rules of evidence that shall govern in the establishment of these claims, and the form and mode of their authentication is entirely within the discretion of Congress. We may direct them to be paid in California or in Washington. We can direct them to be paid by a paymaster, or whomsoever we will. We may prescribe the rule of evidence as to the number and description of witnesses upon whose testimony we can rely. We may declare that we will not rely upon California witnesses; they are out of the limits of our criminal jurisdiction. We cannot punish them if they swear falsely. We may therefore exclude their testimony; or we may say we do not choose to trust to that sort of testimony alone. If then, we may do this, can we not point out certain men, and say on these men we can rely; and those claims which they allow shall be paid? We have a right to say in what manner and with what qualification they shall be paid; and in this point of view—contemplated in this aspect—is it not a proper and judicious mode of legislation? It seems to me so, sir; it seems to me that we need not shrink back from it. It may appear, upon a refined construction, to come in conflict with the executive power to appoint to office. But it is rather as witnesses, than as officers of government that these gentlemen are to act. The claims in question originated through their agency, and under their authority as officers of the government. They, of course, are best acquainted with the subject, and cannot be imposed upon by fraudulent claimants.

The object of the bill is, that none of these unliquidated claims shall be allowed unless their validity and amount be certified to by persons upon whom we can rely; and I really do not see how these constitutional questions can be raised, except by an ingenious and refined turn of argument. They do not arise naturally out of the case. We are but giving to the certificates of these gentlemen the same legal operation that they would have had, if they had continued in service. Sir, if we are to admit, to the utmost extent, the claim set up for Executive power, it seems to me that we should find it in the end very inconvenient indeed. It is admitted that there is a distinction between an office and an employment, a nice legal distinction. If gentlemen will search further they would find that there is an admitted legal distinction between an office and a power. Every power that may be granted is not an office. A particular power is, in common language, as distinguishable from an office as an employment. What is this, then, but a mode of legislation by which we are to designate the persons that are to exercise a particular power—that of authenticating and certifying to certain claims? To say that we cannot do this, would be to make the Executive government essential to every agency and every particular power to be created; that we could do nothing in fact without the agency of the Executive; that his power must be invoked in every instance; that the legislative department is an inert mass, requiring the touch of the executive to give it life and vitality. Let us take care that we do not run into an extreme on the one hand or the other. It is our duty to preserve every constitutional power belonging to the executive; but the tendency of our government has not been heretofore calculated to create any alarm of encroachment upon that power. In the nature of things, the encroachment which is to be feared is the encroachment by executive power. But there is no invasion here of executive power. There is no attempt to steal, or to cheat him of his power.

There is but one other question, and upon that I need say nothing—it is, whether Congress is disposed to pay these claims or not. I think we are bound to pay them. They have originated in a manner that is not regular, I admit. They have grown up under peculiar circumstances. These services have been valuable to the country. They are such as we would have directed if we had been acquainted with the circumstances; and it is but just and proper that we should legalize them. Upon every principle of equity we are bound to pay the claims. The parties claiming compensation are entitled, upon every consideration, patriotism, hardihood, courage, and the sacrifices incurred in rendering these services, and by every other consideration that can entitle men to remuneration. The courage and conduct of Col. Fremont have signalised his name. His services were peculiar, attended with great responsibility to himself—characterized by great firmness and humanity, as well as devotion to his country. The expenses incurred in the performance of those services, were incurred under his own orders and those of his quartermaster and commissary, and upon their liquidation and authentication of them, we can most safely rely. And, in my judgment, the mode of settlement prescribed by this bill, is constitutional and proper.

Mr. ALLEN.—Like every other man who is sworn to support the constitution of the country, I should be extremely unwilling even to run the risk of a violation of it, and if I believed that there was just foundation for a reasonable doubt as to the constitutionality of the amendment offered to this bill, I should unquestionably vote against it; but I have no such doubt and I shall therefore support it. It is a mistake to suppose that there can be nothing done on the part of, or for the government of the country, except by an "officer" under the constitution of the United States. An officer under the constitution of the United States derives his appointment from one of three sources, first, from the President of the United States; secondly, from one of the heads of departments; thirdly, from a court. The constitution is perfectly clear on the subject. It declares that "He (the President) shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by, and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law: but the Congress may, by law, vest the appointment of such inferior officers, as they think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of departments. The President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate, by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session."

So that every officer under the constitution of the United States whose appointment is not provided for in the body of the constitution, must derive his appointment from the President, or the heads of departments or from a court: for Congress is not authorized to vest the appointment of any officer, by law, in any body but in the President, in the head of a department, or a court. This is the language of the constitution, and I state it with the view of directly calling the attention of the Senate to another matter. Congress, it appears cannot vest the appointing power in any officer of this government, if that officer be not the head of a department. This being the case, let us see what Congress has done. I go not back to the individual instances that have been cited, but to the uniform practice of Congress—to no solitary case that may have been a subject of particular attention, but to the uniform practice of Congress for the last sixty years. By the constitution Congress is directed to take measures for ascertaining the number of inhabitants every ten years. They have ordered that the marshals of the United States shall proceed to make a count of the whole population and return them within a given period of time. This is the duty of an officer of the United States called a marshal, whose office is created by law and whose appointment is made by the President of the United States. But can the marshal go into every county of his State and make a count of the people? By no means. Consequently Congress has created agents to assist the marshals. Congress has by law authorized the marshals of the several States in the Union to appoint assistants to aid them in counting the people. Are these assistants "officers" within the meaning of the constitution? I hold they are not. Because they are neither appointed in the constitution, nor by the President, nor by one of the heads of the departments, nor by a court, but appointed by a subordinate executive officer in each of the States—to wit: the marshal. Congress may vest the appointment of such officers in the courts of law, and they would then be officers in the strict sense of the term; but when appointed by the marshal they are not officers—still they derive their emolument from the public treasury and are denominated in law not marshals but the assistants of marshals. More than a thousand such were created by law in 1839. Why are they not officers? Because they do not derive their existence through any of the media known to the constitution, through which officers only can be appointed. The law did not create them officers, because their duty, like the duty intended in this case, was temporary in its nature. Here is the act, sir. The number of these appointees of the marshal is not limited. He may appoint any number he pleases. (The honorable Senator here read an extract from the law, wherein it is provided that the marshals shall have power, and are required to appoint one or more assistants in each city or county in their respective districts.)—These assistants of the marshals are to do what? To aid him in the performance of his official duty. Because it was physically impossible for him to do it alone; and yet they are not officers—not one of them deriving his appointment from any of the sources indicated in the constitution. I happened to have my attention called to this subject, from the fact that the marshal of Ohio having appointed assistants, as he was authorized to do under the act of '29, the fall elections came on, and one gentleman who was his assistant, became a candidate for election to the Senate of Ohio. He was elected by a legal majority of votes, and his seat was contested, on the ground that he was an "officer" of the United States, the constitution of that State declaring that no man who held an office, under the general government was eligible even as a candidate to a seat in the legislature. I was employed as counsel for the contesting candidate, and Mr. Ewing was employed on the part of the sitting member. The result was that the sitting member retained his seat upon the ground that he was not an officer of the United States. Here, then, is a large class of public functionaries, who are not officers under the constitution of the United States—who are not recognized as officers, for the reason that they do not derive their appointments from any source pointed out by the constitution. But what is the practice of the federal government continually? Does not the executive department constantly employ special agents? Have they not recently sent agents to Europe, to collect information which the government supposes will be valuable? Does not the Postmaster General constantly send out agents to superintend the external operations of that department? Are there not numberless cases of appointments, where the persons appointed are not known to the law as officers?

But the strong ground on which I rest the whole matter is the uniform practice of Congress itself—six times repeated in public acts—directing the appointment of a large body of men to discharge public functions, and yet not one of these men being an officer within the meaning of the constitution. They have to take an oath. The same law that directs their appointment, prescribes the oath, and fixes their salary; yet all this does not create an office. This is a strong case, sir, and one which cannot well be answered. There is a public duty to be performed. Congress assigns that duty to the marshals of the United States, and authorizes them to appoint assistants, who are not officers under the constitution because Congress has no right to confer upon the marshals the power of appointing officers.

What is the present case? It is nothing more than for the adjustment of claims, which to all intents and purposes legally, are now pending before Congress. It is a congressional business. It is not a claim pending before the Executive department, because it is admitted on all hands, that the way in which these claims accrued was irregular, and therefore, that neither the Executive nor any of the departments can adjust them. They have accrued under no known law. The President cannot appoint an agent to adjust the claims, nor could he adjust them himself, if they were laid before him to-day; neither could one of his subordinate officers. It is a business exclusively belonging to Congress. It is precisely like the matter that was referred to Mr. Sargent, and by law. The claims then are before Congress. It is our business to adjust them; and we propose to appoint a man to stand between the public treasury and the claimants, and see that justice is done to them and the government. It is as if we sent the matter to a committee. It is precisely like the investigation and examination of our own personal accounts in this body. They are claims which have no validity until we give them validity. It is our business. Well, shall it be said here, that in a matter pending before Congress we have no power to prescribe the mode of ascertaining the truth?—that we cannot assign the investigation of these claims to a committee? Why, who dare assert that the constitution stands between us and such a power as that? None, sir. We can pass a resolution this very hour, instructing the Judiciary Committee to do the very thing that it is proposed that these men, that are named in the bill shall do, and that because it is our business and not the Executive's. We are here to adjust claims, which we are under no legal but a high moral obligation to pay, and which because under no legal obligation, cannot go before the Executive department. If this case were now before us in the form of a memorial, could we not refer the claims to some committee of this body, to do the same thing these men are required to do? Shall we be told that it is the business of the Executive? This is all I that I intended to say on the subject, but if I were to indulge myself in commenting upon the events out of which this claim grew, I should be inclined to occupy some of the time of the Senate, in giving my opinion in regard to the conduct of Lieut. Colonel Fremont, and the gallant men under his command. But that opinion could confer nothing upon a name which has acquired greater renown in this country, than that of any other man of his age who now breathes its air. I say, sir, that Fremont is—and if I was called on to speak under oath on the subject, I would declare, I believe him to be the most meritorious man of his age now living in this country. Nor is this my opinion of him just now, or recently formed; for at the opening of the war with Mexico, I took occasion to suggest his name in connection with a command in the war which would have enabled him to exert that military genius and energy which I knew him to possess, and by which he would have conferred yet greater services on his country, and upon his own name still greater renown.

Mr. BUTLER.—I did not, the other day, enter into the debate in any spirit of controversy. At the time I made my remarks it was understood that the vote was about to be taken, and all that I intended was to explain my views, and to assign the reasons which would govern my vote. I then said, and I have heard nothing since that is at all calculated to induce me to change my opinion, that the gentleman nominated in this bill, would have all the duties and more than the authority of a paymaster. Place the matter in whatever light you will, his duties will at last involve those of a paymaster. By reading one or two lines, I believe I can as well illustrate my views as if I were to elaborate them for half an hour. The persons named are to allow the claims, and then they are to be paid by one who is acknowledged to be an officer—to be appointed as all other officers are—that is to be nominated by the President, and confirmed by the Senate. And let me ask, who has the greater duty to perform, he who audits and ascertains what shall be paid, or the paymaster who checks out the money. One forms a judgment and issues, in effect, a peremptory order, and the other is obliged to obey it. To say that a man who is simply intrusted with the payment of money shall be styled an officer, whilst those who are required to say how much shall be paid, and to whom, are not to be regarded as officers, seems to me to involve the mathematical paradox that the minor can contain the major proposition. The difference is this: the president of the bank orders the note to be paid, and the cashier pays it; yet, according to the reasoning of gentlemen, the cashier is the only officer. You can put it otherwise. I do not intend to chop logic, however; I have taken a palpable view, and if I am wrong in that, I am wrong altogether. My view is this: every appointment for the discharge of a duty, which requires judgment and discretion, in the administration of the public treasure of the nation, is an office; and I say that, from the humblest paymaster, who pays a private soldier, up to the Secretary of the Treasury—in the case of every appointee whose duty it is to administer a public trust—he is an officer. I recognize a distinction between this and the employment of a man to do a specific piece of work. Let it be put in this way. Let us ascertain whether the duties to be performed involve a trust. Suppose the claimants come here with their petitions; I might very well say with the Senator from Ohio, we could investigate the claims; but admitting that we could, we may grant a claim directly, by our committee, but the moment we appoint an agent to represent us, and to have vested in him such duties as may be imparted and delegated by legislative authority, it constitutes a public trust, involving official duties for the public. He then should have a power of attorney, under the constitution. If a commissioner were to be appointed to decide and report on all claims, I take it, he would be regarded as an important officer. If a commisioner were to be appointed to sit here, I take it, it would be regarded, and very properly, as a high office, requiring all the guaranties of the constitution, before it could go into operation. Can this be distinguished from such a case? If such a trust will not constitute an office, I confess I am at a loss to know what is sufficient. The Senator from North Carolina said, I believe, that an office involved succession; but it does not do so always. That would not be a test by which this question could be solved. I agree with the Senator from Connecticut, that no appointment should be made under legislative authority, for the reason that there would be no control over the officer thus appointed. Suppose the persons appointed go into California and continue their investigations for four or five years. If they are appointed by the President, their appointment may be revoked; but if they are appointed by the legislative department, the President has no control over them. It does seem to me that those who have to settle these claims have much higher duties involved in their agency, than those who are merely required to pay them. I have very little difficulty in regard to the subject. It seems to me to be a very plain matter, otherwise I would not have supported the amendment.

Mr. CASS.—I think that the course recommended by the committee is the correct one. One point, however, has been touched upon which I think it would be proper to mention. These operations took place at a great distance off, and under peculiar circumstances. A great responsibility devolved upon the officer at the head of the expedition; and I think he is entitled to great credit for the course which he pursued in getting possession of the country. That country has now passed under our jurisdiction; and the operations which took place have thereby been legalized. Suppose we had foreseen what has taken place and has since been adopted as our act, what course would have been pursued in regard to these expenses? The officers would have had nothing more to do than issue their requisitions to the quartermaster and the means would have been furnished, and the accounts paid on the spot and then settled by the proper accounting officer of the treasury. Here you will have not only the requisition of the officer in command, but you will have the additional security of the other officers in the investigation of the propriety of each particular expenditure. These accounts must be settled, and if you send persons unacquainted with the condition of affairs under which the claims arose, it will be utterly impossible for them to arrive at proper results. We all know how easy it is to set up spurious claims in such cases. These were the considerations which operated with the committee. There was almost a parallel case decided in regard to Florida, a case embodying the very principle involved in this case. If the honorable Senator from Kentucky has got that act in his possession I would be glad if he would read the case.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—The Senator from Delaware has it on his table.

Mr. CLAYTON read from the act of 3d March, 1845, "providing payment for certain military services in Florida."—Laws U. S., v. 745.

Mr. BADGER.—I believe there are some other gentlemen who desire to address the Senate on this bill, and as it is necessary to have a brief executive session, I move it be passed over informally.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion by Mr. BADGER, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business, and after some time spent therein,

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, APRIL 27, 1848.

PETITIONS.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, presented the petition of David Baker, praying an extension of his patent for an improvement in the Curvilinear saw-mill; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, presented the petition of Richard T. Merrick, an officer in the army, setting forth the loss of his vouchers after he had deposited them in the hands of the proper accounting officer of the government, and praying the settlement of his accounts upon the principles of justice and equity; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MOOR presented a memorial of citizens of Ellsworth, Maine, and a memorial of citizens of Bangor, Maine, remonstrating against the admission of lumber cut in the State of Maine, and manufactured in the British Province of New Brunswick, into the ports of the United States free of duty; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HALE presented a petition of inhabitants of Winnebago county, Illinois, praying the enactment of a law prohibiting the acquisition of any new territory by the United States, unless on condition, that slavery be forever excluded therefrom; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Also, a petition of inhabitants of Winnebago county, Illinois, praying that two slaves, sold to satisfy a judgment in favor of the United States against the estate of a debtor to the government, may be emancipated, and the money refunded to the purchases; also, the enactment of a law to prohibit the sale of that species of property for any debt to the government, and to forbid the holding of slaves by any officer of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, a petition of inhabitants of Winnebago county, Illinois, praying the repeal of all laws that authorize or recognize slavery, except as a punishment for crime; the motion to receive which, was ordered to lie on the table.

On motion by Mr. MOOR, it was Ordered, That the petition of the heirs of John Riggs, deceased, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

INTERNATIONAL EXCHANGES.

Mr. BENTON submitted the following resolution, which was considered, by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be authorized and directed to purchase one hundred copies of Heckey's edition of the constitution of the United States, and to deliver the same in the name of the Senate of the United States to Mr. Alexandre Vattemare, of Paris, to be distributed by him in France, according to his system of national exchanges of books.

MANUFACTURE OF FIRE-ARMS FOR THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. CLAYTON submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, directed to report to Congress:

First.—How many public armories there are belonging to the United States in which fire arms are manufactured, and where the same are located, and the date of commencing manufacturing operations in each.

Second.—How much actual capital is and has been invested in such armories; and what proportion in each for sites, buildings, power, permanent machinery, etc.; specifying the amounts under separate heads to date of report.

Third.—How much money has been expended annually in each of said armories for the manufacture of arms, in salaries, wages, and materials, or in any of the elements entering into all the current expenses of manufacturing such arms, independently of fixed capital and the interest thereon.

Fourth.—How many small arms have been produced annually from each of the said armories, all the cost of construction, and how many of the various descriptions of arms, and of what descriptions, are now in serviceable condition.

Fifth.—What number of arms have been condemned from time to time, and what disposition has been made of condemned arms at the government armories, and if sold, at what prices.

Sixth.—How many small arms and munitions of war have been procured from other sources than from the government armories; and from what sources and in what amounts; if by private contracts, at what prices for each description; if from other governments, from which and at what price.

VENTILATION OF VESSELS.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives to provide for the ventilation of passenger vessels and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

On motion by Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, it was Ordered, That the further consideration of said bill be postponed to, and made the order of the day for, Monday, the 1st of May.

FOREIGN MAILS.

Mr. NILES, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives to amend the act to provide for the transportation of the mail between the United States and foreign countries, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

THE PRIVATE CALENDAR.

Mr. MASON gave notice that on to-morrow, at one o'clock, he will move to proceed to the consideration of private bills upon the calendar, and devote the remainder of the day thereto.

PAYMENT OF INTEREST TO ALABAMA.

Mr. BAGBY moved to postpone prior orders, in order to proceed to the consideration of the bill authorizing the payment of interest on the amount advanced by the State of Alabama to the general government pending the Creek hostilities in 1836 and '37.

Mr. PEARCE remarked that he desired to offer an amendment to the bill, and wished that the consideration of the bill might be postponed till another day, in order that he might prepare his amendment which had for its object the extension of the general principle of the bill.

Mr. BAGBY said that at the hazard of a little seeming unkindness to the Senator, he must press the motion. A postponement of the bill would be tantamount to its defeat at this session, and he would take the liberty of suggesting that his friend from Maryland, who did not, as he understood, object to the bill, could introduce his proposition in the form of a separate bill.

Mr. PEARCE had no desire to delay action on the bill; but he regarded it as manifestly proper that the principle should be made applicable to other States.

Mr. MANGUM said that the bill should be allowed to remain in its present position.

Mr. BAGBY reiterated his apprehension that if the proposition of the Senator from Maryland were connected with the bill, it would lead to fatal delay.

The question was then taken upon the motion to postpone the prior orders, for the purpose of taking up the bill named, and it was determined in the affirmative.

The Senate proceeded to consider said bills, as in Committee of the Whole, and the amendments reported from the Committee on Finance were agreed to.

No further amendment being made, the bill was reported to the Senate, and the amendments were concurred in.

The question upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time—

Mr. PEARCE explained that his amendment would not in the least militate against the bill. As the bill had been taken up out of its order he was not prepared with his amendment. All that he desired was to make the principle of the bill applicable to Maryland and other States similarly situated.

After a brief conversation in which Messrs. BAGBY, ATHERTON, R. JOHNSON, and PHELPS took part, relative to the circumstances in which the claims of the State of Alabama provided for in the bill, arose,

Mr. PEARCE asked that the bill be passed over informally.

Mr. BAGBY acquiesced in order to allow the Senator to prepare his amendment.

The said bill was then passed over informally.

PORTRAIT OF GENERAL TAYLOR.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted yesterday by Mr. BADGER:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Library be instructed to purchase the full length original portrait of General Zachary Taylor, painted by William G. Brown of Richmond, if the same can be obtained at a price deemed by the Committee to be reasonable.

Mr. HALE.—I desire to know whether it be in order to address such an order to the joint committee?

The PRESIDING OFFICER.—It is addressed to the Library Committee of the Senate only.

Mr. HALE.—I move that the resolution be laid on the table.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—I beg to ask one question. Has there ever been a full length likeness of General Washington or of General Jackson ordered by the Senate?

Mr. BADGER.—I do not know that there has been.

The yeas and nays were then demanded on the question, and being seconded were ordered, and taken with the following result:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Atchison, Atherton, Bright, Felch, Hale, Hannegan, Mason, Sturgeon, Turney, Underwood—11.

NAYS—Messrs. Badger, Bagby, Bell, Borland, Cameron, Clarke, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, of Massachusetts, Dayton, Johnson, of Maryland, Johnson, of Georgia, Mangum, Moor, Niles, Phelps, Spruance, Upham, Westcott—19.

The question recurring on the adoption of the resolution—

Mr. HANNEGAN moved to amend it by striking out the words "General Zachary Taylor," and inserting "Generals George Washington, Andrew Jackson, Winfield Scott, and Zachary Taylor."

Mr. HALE.—I move to amend the amendment as follows:

Add "and all the full length portraits of all the Generals in the American army."

Mr. UNDERWOOD.—I desire to make a very few remarks on this motion. I voted in favor of laying this proposition on the table in order to avoid what we just now witnessed, and what you will always witness whenever a measure of this sort is introduced. I protest against the introduction into this body of any movement of this character, because calculated to excite the heated feelings and partizan views of the members. We are sent here, as I believe, to legislate for the great interests of the American people and not to occupy ourselves in purchasing pictures to form a picture gallery. We do not come here for the purpose of naming one popular man to the exclusion of others, thus exciting debate as to who is most deserving of honor and distinction. If Gen. Taylor receive the nomination for the Presidency I feel very certain that I shall vote for him. I will yield to no gentleman on this floor in admiration of Gen. Taylor. I hope I have also a deep feeling of gratitude to the "father of his country." Although politically opposed to General Jackson, yet I respect and admire his character. So with regard to Gen. Scott. There are many others that I might name, for whom I entertain the same feelings, but without further remark I beg to submit that the resolution is inexpedient.

Mr. HANNEGAN—(in his seat.)—There is General Butler from your own State.

Mr. UNDERWOOD.—Yes, and a schoolmate and associate, and a man whom I am proud to say here and every where, all must respect for his honesty and elevated character, however they may differ from him in political matters. I ask, sir, if we have not already seen enough to convince us of the impropriety of diverting our attention from the legitimate business of the country, in order to select individuals on whom to bestow honor and distinction?

Mr. BADGER.—I had not the slightest expectation when I presented this resolution, either that it would produce or was calculated to produce any species of excitement. I offered this resolution for the purchase of a portrait of Gen. Taylor because we can obtain one which is said to be an excellent likeness, painted from life. It is now exhibted in the rotunda of the capitol, and there seemed to me to be a very evident propriety in the government obtaining possession of it. I hold that there is no member of this body who does not know, that every American citizen is ready to acknowledge that that distinguished and illustrious general, has, by his military services, shed unfading lustre on the arms and character of our country. And I assure my friend from Indiana that when he brings forward his resolution for the purpose of purchasing a full length portrait of the "father of his country," of Gen. Jackson, and of Gen. Scott, he will not find me in the slightest degree disposed either to withhold my assent from his proprsol, or to embarrass it by throwing around it, propositions not calculated to advance his object. The amendment which he proposes makes the resolution absolutely nonsensical. The resolution has for its object the purchasing of a certain full length portrait of General Taylor, executed by a particular artist. It does not designate an individual who is to execute a portrait, but it directs the purchasing of this portrait. Now the resolution would be perfectly absurd if a provision were introduced into it, that there are other portraits to be purchased, to be executed by this artist. I was in hopes that my friend from Indiana would have allowed it to be adopted without embarrassing it with this amendment. I assure him that he cannot introduce a proper resolution to testify respect for any distinguished gentleman without receiving my hearty approbation. Now with regard to the objection of my friend from Kentucky, that the Senate came here to attend to the great interests of the American people, it meets my hearty concurrence. I agree to it out and out. I do assure him that I never entertained a contrary opinion in my life, but when he says that we were not sent here for the purpose of forming a picture gallery, does he recollect that he is pronouncing a solemn judgment of censure upon the American Congress, almost from the commencement of the government? I am sure, observant as he is, he cannot so often have passed from this chamber, to the other, or when a member of it, from that House to this chamber, without seeing that we have been actually engaged in preparing a picture gallery. And what is a very remarkable circumstance, so far from thinking it beneath the dignity of an American legislature, sent here to attend to the national interests, we have purchased many portraits and busts for the purpose of adorning this edifice.

Mr. DAYTON, (in his seat.)—Not exactly "adorning" it!

Mr. BADGER.—The gentleman says not for the purpose of adorning the edifice. Well, that is a matter of taste. But we have gone farther. We have not only been in the habit of purchasing pictures, portraits of individuals, and placing them in our halls; but we have also purchased statues not intended to represent American citizens at all, and sculpture not like any thing in the heaven above nor on the earth beneath nor in the waters under the earth. So that I must be permitted to say that the objection of the Senator from Kentucky has been made rather late in the day. I proposed the resolution in good faith, and I hope that my friend will not insist on complicating it with any amendments, but that the sense of the Senate will be taken immediately upon it.

Mr. ALLEN rose, but yielded to

Mr. HANNEGAN, who said: I am confident that there is no American any where, be he who he may, who holds in higher esteem than I do the eminent services of General Taylor. His patriotism, his valor, his good conduct upon all occasions have won my sincerest regard. But to my mind, sir, there is something invidious in the proposition before the Senate. A Presidential election is approaching and the name of that distinguished soldier stands prominently among the list of those who aspire to the possession of that empty bubble. It is for that reason, in the first place, that I regarded this resolution as out of place. But again, it signalizes General Taylor above all the illustrious men that have adorned your country's history. What is the proposition? To buy the full length portrait of General Taylor and suspend it, I suppose, in one of the panels of the rotunda, or perhaps in the Senate chamber, excluding the "father of his country," Marion, Erin's trusted son, Wayne, Lincoln, and he who fell first at Bunker Hill! Where have you full length portraits of these heroic men? Let me say here, that I have never seen but one life-like full length potrait of the "Father of his country"—taken in the vigor of life—in the bloom of manhood—just after the close of the revolutionary war. Has the nation purchased that picture? Has any man asked the nation to purchased it? It was on occasion of an accidental visit to Princeton, in New Jersey, that I had the pleasure of beholding this soul-stirring picture—Princeton, where his fame first began to approach that proud and glorious zenith from which it never receded! In the college hall of that respectable institution I saw this inestimable portrait, gracing the very frame from which the likeness of George the III was struck by a cannon ball in the battle of Princeton. The portrait was taken at private expense; and it is the only life-like full length portrait of the "Father of his country," taken in '83. Not one human being has ever applied to Congress to bring it here to adorn these walls! And now, sir, I am reminded of what I saw last Saturday amid the hallowed shades of Mount Vernon. On a visit to that sacred spot, I saw what is called a Sarcophagus, of American marble, and I like it none the less for that, though it is not perhaps as fine as the Parian marble! and on the stone which resting on poor, crumbling brick-work, covers the ashes of Washington and his wife, sleeping side by side, I found this inscription:

"By the permission of Lawrence Lewis, the surviving executor of George Washington. This sarcophagus is presented by John Struthers, of Philadelphia, marble mason, A. D., 1837."

"By John Struthers, of Philadelphia." I reverence the man who had heart enough to do it for the "Father of his country!" But talk not to me of patriotism upon an occasion of this kind, so long as the representatives of the country into which he absolutely breathed existence, and to which he gave all the glory of his imperishable name, have left to an obscure private individual the erection of his tomb! And now you propose to select a living man and an aspirant to the Presidency, his heart warm and beating, and signalize him by this public mark of distinction! Well, perhaps I too may vote for him—I do not know—it is impossible in these times of change to tell what men may do! But I do maintain that there is an indelicacy in this proposition which must prevent me from giving it my approval. Where is your monument to the memory of Washington? To you, "Old Virginia," I look for the removal of the stain which this neglect has affixed upon us! You will not surrender his ashes—and you never should—but you alone should give him a monument that should tower to the skies!

Mr. BADGER.—I beg to make an explanation in regard to the remarks of the Senator from Indiana, but I do not propose to enter into any animated discussion on this subject. I do not see any necessity for that, though I listened with great pleasure to my friend from Indiana. The resolution, as I have already remarked, does not propose that a full length portrait should be executed. It is simply a proposal to purchase a full length portrait which happens to be here.

Mr. HANNEGAN—(in his seat.)—Why not buy the full length portrait of Washington from Nassau Hall, and that of Jackson from New Orleans?

Mr. BADGER.—The proposition was made by me, because there were friends of Gen. Taylor here who said that this is an excellent likeness. Now, if there be no objection to the propriety of this thing in itself, why not adopt the resolution? I do not know where the full length portrait of Gen. Jackson which it is proposed to purchase by my friend from Indiana, is to be obtained.

Mr. BUTLER—(in his seat.)—What picture do you propose to buy?

Mr. BADGER.—The full length portrait of Gen. Taylor, now in the rotunda.

Mr. HANNEGAN—(in his seat.)—A burlesque of him I have no doubt!

Mr. BADGER.—Well, it may be so; but his friends say it is an accurate likeness.

Mr. UNDERWOOD.—My friend from North Carolina supposes that my faculties of observation are very obtuse.

Mr. BADGER—(in his seat.)—Quite the contrary.

Mr. UNDERWOOD.—He supposes that I cannot have noticed the other pictures in the rotunda, and the statuary which adorns the capitol.

Mr. BADGER—(in his seat.)—Or deforms it!

Mr. UNDERWOOD.—Or deforms it, then. Now, I think there is a manifest distinction between the proposition of the gentleman and the case of these pictures. The panels in the rotunda were expressly designed for pictures, and I regard those historical paintings as altogether distinct from the formation of a picture gallery. I think that this innovation on the practise of the government with regard to this matter, is most inopportunely commenced in the case of the living instead of the dead. No one's epitaph ought to be written till after his death. We ought to be cautious in our commendations of those who are alive, and particularly those who are situated as General Taylor is at present. It does, as my friend from Indiana, says, look somewhat invidious—a little like rendering personal homage to the man in consequence of the position which he now occupies before the American people. As I have already intimated, I feel deeply interested in every thing that relates to General Taylor. He is a great favorite of mine; but I dislike movements of this sort, in the face of the American people, at this particular juncture, selecting him in preference to the "Father of his Country" or any of the great men of the past. I think the proposition had better be dropped. Not that I would for a moment suggest the propriety of doing so, in order to prevent the remarks which might be made upon our conduct if we were to adopt the resolution. I would not myself be influenced by any such intimidation, and I am equally confident that it would not operate on any member of that body. But I think that it will be altogether in better taste to set aside the proposition. It may be that the adoption of a system of this kind, for the decoration of our public buildings here with portraits of distinguished citizens here, would stimulate laudable ambition; but I am rather inclined to think that it would strike the American people with some surprise.

Mr. ALLEN.—This resolution does not, I believe, purport to be a joint resolution, though it is addressed to a joint committee, and there is, therefore, as I understand, some irregularity in it. But if the Senate be disposed to overlook the irregularity, I have no particular objection to going into the business of commemorating the achievements of the generals of the republic in painting, executed at the public expense, provided, that in order to avoid even the appearance of injustice to others while doing justice to others, the resolution be made sufficiently comprehensive. To be such, it ought to contain within itself something like a system under which the government may act hereafter, and for that purpose I move to strike out all after the word "instructed" and to insert the following:

"To procure to be provided and placed in the Rotunda full length portraits of all the Generals of the republic who may, as generals-in-chief in fields of battle, have achieved victories for which they have received the thanks of Congress."

Mr. DAYTON.—It is no part of my purpose, sir, to embark in this argument. I merely desire to say in reply to my friend from Indiana, that with some knowledge of the feelings of those gentlemen who control the institution of Nassau Hall, the federal government is not rich enough to purchase the full length portrait of Washington to which the gentleman alludes.

Mr. HANNEGAN, (in his seat.)—I do not believe it is.

Mr. DAYTON.—It is within the bounds of possibility that if that should turn out to be the only full length portrait of General Washington, and at any time hereafter it should become a matter of necessity to the federal government to have such a portrait here, it might be presented by that institution to the government. But as a question of dollars and cents, of buying and selling, it is not a thing to be thought of between the parties. My purpose was to make that single remark, and to say, that for one I am always ready to grant these little appropriations for the purpose of distinguishing our illustrious men. I would be glad if the federal government could obtain the full length portraits, or any other memorial, of all the Presidents of the United States, and any other men who stand a head above their fellows—whether it is Jackson, Taylor or Scott.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question? Why distinguish soldiers above statesmen? Where are your portraits of the two Adams—of Jefferson—of Madison—of Monroe,—of a living man, Martin Van Buren, who, although you did not support him, you must admit has rendered the most eminent services to his country?

Mr. DAYTON.—May I beg to remind the Senator that that very remark proceeded from my lips. I said that I should be most happy if the federal government should procure portraits of every one of those eminent civilians. There are many whom I could name, Alexander Hamilton, for instance,——

Mr. HANNEGAN.—(In his seat.) Yes, and John Hancock, and Henry Clay.

Mr. DAYTON.—And many more—republican and federal—whig and democrat. I should gladly see their portraits here, instead of the statue of Columbus, looking like a man rolling ninepins, and the girl frightened, lest the ball should fall on her toes! And it seems that the opposite pedestal is to receive another groupe in equally good taste—a groupe of four figures, illustrating the "triumphs of civilization over savage life,"—a female protecting a child, and standing over her, a savage with a raised tomahawk, and behind the latter, a white man holding back his arm! Certainly, I should greatly prefer making an appropriation to decorate the capitol with portraits of eminent citizens, rather than with such "works of art!" But I did not intend to trespass on the time of the Senate.

Mr. HALE.—I think that this discussion must convince the country of the present extraordinary redundance of great men! They seem to spring up on all hands. I have been revolving in my mind some plan by which the homage which is to be paid them, may find a proper merit. Let a standing committee "ON GREAT MEN" be appointed, whose business it will be to report to us at each session of Congress! The Senator from Indiana has alluded to the neglect with which the "Father of his Country" has been treated. It has been worse than neglect! We have not only neglected to purchase any full length portrait of Washington, but we have disgraced the most beautiful grounds in the country with one of the most ill-conceived statues I have ever beheld. I allude to Greenough's statue. It resembles rather some one of the heathen deities, which, I can hardly say, for it is sometime since I looked into Tooke.

A SENATOR.—Jupiter Tonans!

Mr. HALE.—And a very poor one at that! But this discussion has disclosed another fact, that while there are so many illustrious men whose ears are forever closed to the voice of censure or applause, an attempt is made to select a living man with whose likeness to decorate these halls! Sir, I belive that it is quite time enough to talk of thus distinguishing men when they have passed through all the trying vicissitudes of life. I cordially concur with the gentlemen from Indiana and New Jersey, that we should look to the walks of civil life for objects of respect and homage. I go farther. There is at this moment in our land a female who has done more for humanity, Christianity, and the elevation of man above all that afflicts and degrades him, than a thousand so-called heroes. I refer to that illustrious woman whose "works of mercy and labors of love" are known all over the land, and through whose exertions an hospital for the insane has recently been commenced in the State of Tennessee—Miss Dorothea Dix—a name which will live so long as all that is most estimable in human nature shall command the respect of mankind!

If in order, sir, I move to lay this whole subject on the table.

The motion was decided in the affirmative by yeas and nays as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Atchison, Atherton, Benton, Breese, Bright, Butler, Douglas, Felch, Hale, Hannegan, Lewis, Mason, Niles, Pearce, Rusk, Spruance, Sturgeon, Turney, Underwood, and Yulee—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Badger, Bagby, Bell, Borland, Cameron, Clarke, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, of Massachusetts, Dayton, Foote, Greene, Johnson, of Maryland, Upham, and Westcott—13.

THE CALIFORNIA CLAIMS.

The Senate then resumed the consideration of the bill for ascertaining and paying the California Claims.

Mr. MASON briefly replied to the remarks of the Senator from Missouri, contending that the constitutional objection to the bill had not been at all obviated by the amendment reported by the committee, and of course his argument against the bill was unaffected by it. The Senate would determine whether he was right in his view of the constitutional question. As to the precedents relied upon by the Senator from North Carolina, he had shown that they were not at all appropriate to the present case. He need not remind the Senator, that in a court of law there was no authority but that of a decision of an appellate court upon the point in question. Short of that, the decisions of courts were only persuasive, and entitled to respect. All he desired in this case was, to impose all the safeguards which the constitution provided.

Mr. CLARKE then addressed the Senate at length in favor of the bill. His speech is given in the Appendix.

Mr. RUSK.—I desire to trespass on the patience of the Senate for a moment only before the vote is taken. It seems to me that if any question can be settled, the constitutional difficulty here has been. We find in cases precisely similar, that Congress some seven or eight times has acted just as this bill proposes, by referring claims, for the purpose of ascertaining their justice, to persons who are not officers of the government, and such reference has never been considered, so far as the legislation of Congress is concerned—as constituting the individual to whom such reference is made an officer of the government. There can be no distinction so far as this reference is concerned, between the duty to be performed by the referees, and the duty of an arbitrator to whom a case is submitted by a court. Both perform the same sort of duties. It is competent for Congress, of course to pay the claims without testimony, as well as with the best, or the weakest testimony. It is for them to determine what evidence will satisfy them. They may take the certificates of officers or of individuals cognizant of the origin of the claims, and they may determine those to be sufficient testimony upon which they will authorize the proper officers of the government to pay the claims. That is all that is asked in this case. And it seems to me strange, I say it with the utmost respect for the opinions of those who differ with me, it must I am sure proceed upon this ground alone that they make a mistake in supposing that the right to appoint officers by the President is not inherent in him but confided to him by the constitution, and is more a duty than a right—it does appear to me strange I say, that such should be the conclusion at which Senators arrive, that it is the duty of the President, and not merely a right which he may exercise or not, to fill up such offices as Congress may create by law. What is it that is proposed by this bill? We determine by it, that those claims which are just, shall be paid. The question then is, what testimony will be required to assure us of their justness? The bill proposes that Colonel Fremont, who was the commander, together with the paymaster and quartermaster of the troops who performed the service, shall furnish the evidence upon which the government will authorize their payment. And it does seem to me, that there can be no difference in point of constitutional right, whether we declare that the evidence shall be furnished by these gentlemen or by the officers who have been appointed under all the forms prescribed by the constitution. If there be a difference, which, I confess, I am unable to perceive, then Congress has violated the constitution in several instances, because they have repeatedly referred cases to individuals who were not officers. A case was referred to yesterday, where a law was passed for the payment of some half dozen companies of troops in Florida. How were they to be paid? Why, upon the testimony of two individuals with the approval of the governor of the State. Were they constituted officers of the government of the United States? If they were, they would necessarily have to be appointed by the President. But they were nothing more than arbitrators, or rather examiners for ascertaining and satisfying the government of the justice of the claims. Then, as I said before, if we are wrong in this, Congress has been wrong seven or eight times. The Supreme Court has been wrong in making decisions which they were not authorized to make. Nothwithstanding, with all the arguments which I have heard to the contrary, I insist that the case I read is conclusive of this very point in controversy. That case was on a mandamus requiring Mr. Kendall to perform the award of the solicitor of the treasury. Five judges were in attendance. Two of them dissented from the opinion given by the court—one of the dissentients being the Chief Justice—upon the ground that it was not a subject for a mandamus. If, in dissenting from an opinion of this description, the law that they were required to enforce had been unconstitutional, would it not be a reflection upon the Chief Justice—who took different ground from a majority of the judges—to imagine that he would never once have alluded to the fact of unconstitutionality? Three of the judges say expressly that Congress had the power to pass a law authorizing an officer, or any one else, to determine a claim against the government.

There seems to be another question started upon this subject, and that is the authority under which the claims originated. I wish briefly to explain this authority, and to show the grounds upon which the government ought to recognize the claims. What were the facts in the case? In the year 1845, before the war broke out between this country and Mexico, Commodore Sloat, with a large naval force, is despatched into the Pacific ocean; and for what purpose? To take possession of California. Nobody has contended that this was not the purpose for which the armament was sent there. The Navy Department afterwards, upon sending him leave of absence on account of ill health, gave him something of a reprimand because he had not proceeded to take possession of California at an earlier period. It appears, then, that the sending of the squadron into the Pacific, was not for mere amusement, but for a specific object. It was known that a war was likely to take place, and it was known that England was desirous of obtaining, if not full possession, at least commercial advantages in California. The armament is sent there; and afterwards an officer is sent by the land route with a letter which has been said to be a mere letter of introduction to Col. Fremont. What did Fremont consider it his duty to do after receiving that letter? Had he not gone back, the country would have been in possession of the British. He returned; and it is highly creditable to him that he did so, and these claims accrued in consequence of the military operations which ensued. Will Congress now say that they are going to refuse the payment of these claims, because one of the most gallant officers of the United States, dared to assume the responsibility of defending his countrymen from a merciless foe? For about sixty days only, were the operations of Col. Fremont carried on, previous to the receipt of positive instructions—borne by Commodore Stockton—to take possession of the country. There can be no question as to the policy of the government. So far from being deserving of any blame, the Executive is entitled to the highest credit for foresight and sagacity. Had he not been as prompt as he was, we may be assured from what is now going on in Yucatan, that Macnamara would have been in possession of California. It is not the time now to go into an enquiry of what California is worth to us, in regard to the extension of our commerce or otherwise; it is now in our possession. I will venture the assertion, that at the end of ten years from this time it could not be purchased from the United States for two hundred millions of dollars. This country has been saved to us, in a great measure, by the promptitude, vigilance, and foresight of this officer. The question comes simply to this. If we are willing to avail ourselves of the advantages which the services of these individuals have procured us—actuated, if you will, at the same time by a desire to save themselves and their families—in saving a country which is worth two hundred millions of dollars, exposing them to beggary, refusing to pay them, why then let us vote against this bill. If you are willing to pay for their services then the only question is, whether Col. Fremont and those named in the bill are the proper individuals for the government to trust in investigating the claims. They are, in my opinion, the only individuals that can with propriety be selected. Suppose you select three greedy office-seekers, of whom there are so many to be found about the purlieus of the Capitol, they would not understand the nature of their duties, whilst the persons named in this bill know precisely what the claims are.

I am willing to trust Col. Freemont. In the first place I believe he is well qualified for the task; and for selecting him, we have another reason. He is a young man who has acquired a distinguished reputation, and that reputation furnishes us a bond that he will do nothing to cast a shadow upon his character.

Mr. BAGBY.—I take this occasion to say, that the vote I shall give will be given without the least reference to the distinguished gentleman who is named in the bill. I agree with the Senator from Texas, that he is a man of extraordinary merit and abilities. If my testimony were of any avail, to enhance the estimation in which he is held, he would have it to the full extent. Indeed, if the passage of this bill were dependednt only upon his merits, I venture the assertion that the bill would receive the unanimous sanction of this body. Neither have I any hesitation as to the propriety of paying these California Claims. They ought to be paid. They are as meritorious claims as were ever presented to the Congress of the United States. But I leave out these views entirely, and come to the great question involved, that is, the question of constitutional right between two departments of this government. No matter what may have been the practice of Congress or the decisions of the Supreme Court, they have no proper application to the case now before the Senate. I say it with entire respect for the decisions of that court, I think it is no disrespect to the chief justice to differ with him in opinion, because es "Homer sometimes nodded," the wisest men may sometimes err in judgment. In the proceedings of this body, I am not to be bound by the decisions of the Supreme Court upon constitutional questions. The course of reasoning by which I satisfied my mind in regard to this matter was this. I asked myself, who would have investigated these claims provided they had arisen within reach of the ordinary operations of the Treasury? Can there be any doubt that these accounts would have been investigated by constitutionally appointed officers, and then have gone before the proper accounting officers of the treasury? Inasmuch then, as they cannot be disposed of by reference to the regularly constituted officers of the government, the question comes up how are they to be disposed of? Why, by a law making provision for the appointment of officers, with the same powers that those officers would have for adjusting the claims. I have had no difficulty on the subject from the beginning. I regard the amendment reported by the committee, as precisely the same in substance, in effect and operation, as the bill itself. The same thing is to be done, though in a different manner. It always pains me to differ from the views of a committee, composed too, of the ablest men in the body—but I confess, they have not satisfied my judgment, and by it I must be governed. I dissent from the view taken by the Senator from Kentucky, who says that in doubtful cases, we should exercise the power ourselves. My doctrine on the subject of doubtful power, has always been to abstain from its exercise altogether. But upon this point I have no doubt, and I shall therefore vote for the amendment of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. BREESE said he wished to make one remark. When the bill was reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, organizing as it did, a board with officers and salaries, and appointing those officers by law it was against that provision of the constitution which gives the appointment of officers to the President by and with the advice of the Senate, and he therefore should have voted against the bill for that reason. The amendment, he thought, obviated the objection he entertained, and it seemed to him that the whole case was now in a very small compass. It is nothing more than this: certain claims are alleged to exist against the United States, but from their peculiar nature cannot be adjusted by the officers of the Executive department. Congress then declares by this bill, that if J. C. Fremont, Captain Hensley, and Major Reading, who know all about these claims, will certify to their extent, we will pay them by an officer to be appointed for that purpose; and this, he said, seemed to be most clearly within the constitutional competency of Congress, and he therefore should vote for the bill as amended.

Mr. WESTCOTT said he desired to say a very few words in explanation of the vote he was about to give. He should vote against the amendment of the Senator from Virginia, and for the amendment reported by the Military Committee. When the bill was first introduced, and in the shape it was in before it was recommitted and the amendment made by the committee, he expressed the opinion that he should not vote for it as it then was. He objected to the clause designating Col. Fremont by name, as he regarded it as an encroachment on the power delegated to the President under the constitution. The amendment had obviated the difficulty he then had in some degree. He would not say that his convictions were entirely clear—the question was one of some doubt. But when he reflected that the Executive power of appointment, and of conferring official patronage was the most fearful in our institutions—that its corrupting tendencies and effects were of the most dangerous character;—when the fact stared him in the face, that it has had for years a most pernicious influence upon the action of the government, he felt disposed to circumscribe it in every and any case in which he could do so without plainly and palpably violating the constitution. This is not such a case of palpable, undoubted violation. I find precedents for it approved by Presidents who would not have submitted to encroachments on their power. Among them, one in 1845, passed with reference to the payment of volunteers in Florida, is directly in point. The regiments of Colonel Brown and Major Garrison, and several companies of volunteers, were ordered to be paid at the Treasury on muster rolls to be verified by the oaths of their officers and approved by the Governor of Florida. These officers had been out of service for years, and Florida was made a state the very day this law was passed, and the office of territorial governor therefore became defunct. I regard that law as a precedent that I may, in voting on this bill, follow with safety, and especially when, if there is no constitutional difficulty, all admit the bill in this provision will be judicious. The President must concur in the bill before it becomes a law. If he regards it as an encroachment on his constitutional powers, he can protect himself by rejecting it. I have no idea that under the precedents existing such difficulty will be made.

Mr. CALHOUN.—Before the question is put, I desire to state the reasons upon which I shall feel myself compelled to vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia. I have bestowed upon this case that attention which the magnitude, both of the principle and the amount of money involved, seemed to me to demand; and after the best consideration that I have been able to give it, I have been brought to the conclusion that the original bill as reported by the committee, and the amendment which the committee now propose to substitute for it, are both unconstitutional. In order to understand whether this opinion of mine be correct or not, it will be necessary to understand what are actually the provisions contained in the bill and the amendment, and what is the object intended to be effected? We are told by two of the members of the committee that the object is, to prescribe the evidence on which the claims are to be allowed, and that the persons named are to act in the character of witnesses. If so, the bill and amendment are strangely drawn. I find not a word about evidence or witness, or having the least reference to either, and the language used excludes the possibility that the object was such as they allege. They are vested with the function to examine and allow, and not to testify. They act as a board of commissioners. The majority decides, and their decision is final. By what abuse of language, then, can individuals performing such functions be called witnesses, when they are of a character so wholly different? Two other members of the committee assign a very different object. They allege that it is intended to enable the three individuals named in the amendment, to perform that which they would have performed at the time, had they had funds in their hands to meet the expenses incurred; that is, to enable Col. Fremont to perform the functions of commander, and the other two, those of paymaster and quartermaster respectively. To judge of the correctness of this allegation, it will be necessary to ascertain what additional functions they would have had to perform, if they had been in funds at the time. None whatever, but to pay as the expenses were incurred, instead of giving certificates for the amount. Col. Fremont had performed all his functions as commander, as fully as if the ample funds had been furnished, and none but those of the paymaster and commissary had any left unperformed. Now, I ask, is it the object of this bill, or the amendment reported by the committee, to enable them to perform their unexecuted functions? Is it proposed that either of these disbursing officers shall perform the function of paymaster or commissary, or that Col. Fremont should perform that of commander? There is not a provision to that effect. Their functions are to be entirely different. In the first place, instead of acting in their individual capacity and on their individual responsibility, as they would, if the duties attached to each had been performed at the time, they are to act as a board of commissioners to be governed by the votes of the majority, and be exempt from all responsibility. Their functions are as dissimilar as is their character. Instead of performing the duties of commander, paymaster, and commissary, they are to examine and allow the claims against the government without being subject to any restriction, either as to rule or evidence. Indeed, in not a single particular does the provisions of the bill or amendment, correspond with the object which the members of the committee allege was to be effected. But suppose they corresponded in every particular, would it get clear of the constitutional objection, which the allegation is intended to avoid? How can Congress vest by law, the functions to execute duties which appertained to these individuals in their official characters, now when they are no longer officers? That is the question. What are these functions? Do they partake of the character of office, or that of mere employment? The answer is to be found in the fact already stated, that they appertained to them in their official character, and could only be performed by them in that character; and we have just as much power to invest them with all their other functions as these—to appoint them to the full exercise of all, as of a part. The one would not be more clearly and directly usurp the rights of the Executive than the other.

But I regard the functions proposed to be conferred on these individuals, as not only very difficult, but of a far higher character than those which they had to perform, had they been furnished with funds. They partake of those belonging to the highest order of the fiscal officers of the government, to whom they would have had to account, had the expenses been paid when incurred.—To understand who those officers are, and to what extent those individuals would, in that case, have been held responsible, I will state the process to be gone through before their accounts would be allowed. They would, in the first place, have to present them to the proper bureaus of the War Department—the Commissary to the Commissary-General, and the Paymaster to the Paymaster-General. Then they would have undergone an administrative examination. What its nature is, can best be understood by giving the process. Take for instance the Commissary. He would have had to exhibit the orders under which he made his purchases. They would have to state the number or amount of articles, and where necessary their description. These orders would have to be presented to the Secretary of War for his approval, if there should be any doubt of their propriety, judged of in reference to the number of troops, or the nature of the service. He then would have to exhibit his vouchers to show that the prices of the articles were reasonable, and would have to furnish evidence to that effect. If, on examination, all were found correct, the Commissary-General would endorse his approval, and pass them over to the proper Auditor of the Treasury for his examination and audit. From him, they would pass to the Comptroller-General of the Treasury, who would review the whole; and then, if approved, the account would be allowed and the officer credited. Such is the careful and refined process prescribed by law, and regulation for the settlement of military accounts, and such the process through which those now in question would have had to pass, if the officers had been in funds, and had paid them at the time. By the provisions of this bill and amendment, the whole process is all laid aside. The very officers who would thus have been held responsible to account for the proper application of every cent placed in their hands, are authorized to examine and allow their own accounts; and their certificates allowing them, are made as conclusive of their justice and correctness, as would have been their allowance on the final settlement of the Comptroller. They, in a word, are invested in effect with all the functions of these high and responsible officers. Indeed, they are invested with far higher. The latter are bound by law and established rules, but they are bound by neither. They act under their own unlimited discretion, and are bound to establish no rules and keep no record; nor has the Paymaster, or whoever may hold the funds, any discretion as to payment. Their certificates are the only voucher necessary to the settlement of his account, so that there is no responsibility anywhere. I venture to assert that there is no example in all our legislation of an act of the kind; and to cap the climax, these individuals are to be appointed by an act of Congress to perform these high official functions, which otherwise would have to be performed by officers who hold stations among the highest under the government—and all this on the ground, that the functions they would have to discharge are mere employments, and not offices!

I do not oppose this monstrous measure on the ground of opposition to Col. Fremont, or either of his associates in this high commission. Of the latter, I know nothing; but I have a slight acquaintance with the Colonel, and am so favorably impressed as to him, that I would as readily trust him as any other individual. But a regard for the constitution and the great fundamental principle, that no man shall be a judge in his own case, which embraces this, that no man should settle his own account, compels me to oppose it. It has been attempted to bolster it up by precedents, but without success. Not one has been cited that is applicable, and if there were hundreds to the point, they could have no weight where the constitution and the fundamental principles of justice are so palpably violated. This I believe to be the first time that the question of our power in like cases has been formally discussed. It is of great importance that our discussion, in so leading a case, should be right.

But, Mr. President, I hold that if there be any doubt in this case—if it be not clearly right—there are reasons of a delicate character why the measure should not be adopted. It would be indelicate for me more fully to explain myself; but I will be understood, when I say, there are circumstances attending it which are calculated to induce the belief, should we adopt the measure, that we have been actuated more by the feeling of esprit du corps than we ought to be. We all know how liable we are to be influenced by those with whom we are associated in the discharge of our duties, and with whom we hold daily intercourse. We ought to allow for it, and guard against it, especially in a case like this, involving the constitution and a fundamental principle of justice.

Having said so much upon the amendment reported by the committee, I must say that I have objections even to the amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia, although as I prefer it to the amendment offered by the committee, I shall vote for it. My opinion is that the simple way of adjusting all these claims, is to appoint two or three able officers belonging to the army, upon whom such duties appropriately devolve, and send them there to settle these expenses as far as they can be legally settled.

Mr. RUSK.—Mr. President: The honorable Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] is, I think, mistaken when he supposes that the positions assumed by the chairman, and two of the members of the Military Committee are in opposition, or inconsistent with the grounds which the honorable Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN,] and myself have taken upon this bill. The chairman of the committee, sir, stated in his remarks, that this bill only required the persons named in it to do now, that which they had a right to do, and which it was their duty to have done when they were in office, and to this I can see no constitutional objection. Are not officers who have ceased to be such, constantly required to go on and settle, and adjust accounts which were made while in office? The honorable Senator from Kentucky and myself have not been driven in support of this bill to any untenable position. We took the ground, sir, that the act of the persons named in this bill, in certifying to the amount, and justice of the claims, should be made the evidence upon which the proper officers of the government are required to pay them. It pertains to the authority of Congress to pay the debts of the United States. They have the right to judge of their amount and justness. They may order payment without evidence. They may require the weakest or the strongest testimony. They may, if they choose, make the certificate of an officer, a court of justice, or a private individual, evidence of a debt against the United States upon which to base an order for its payment.

You have laws now, making the bare certificate of an officer evidence, upon which you require the proper officers to make payment. The proper department is now required by law to issue a bounty warrant to a disabled soldier, upon the certificate of the captain of the company, or a surgeon, that he is disabled. The honorable Senator, [Mr. CALHOUN,] starts two other objections to this bill: First, that it makes these officers judges in their own case, and authorizes them to certify to their own claims against the government. Now, sir, does anybody suppose this would be the effect of this bill? Certainly not. They could not, under its provisions, certify their own claims; nor would their own delicacy permit them if they could.

The other objection is, that it is conferring a high power without any responsibility. All will admit, that if this campaign had been conducted from the beginning under the authority of the government, Colonel Fremont could have made his requisitions to any amount. The quartermaster would have been bound to furnish the supplies; and the paymaster to have paid the money.

But, sir, this bill provides responsibility with which I am content. Past experience proves that an oath may be violated—a pecuniary bond disregarded. But, sir, when you have the guarantee of the character of a man, who has a due regard to character, and as high a reputation to lose as the honorable Senator, concedes to Colonel Fremont; then, sir, you have the strongest security which man can give for good conduct.

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY, APRIL 28, 1848.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading.

Mr. MASON, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Gad Humphreys, submitted a report accompanied by a bill for his relief.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

THE SUPREME COURT.

Mr. DAYTON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill to promote the despatch of business in the Supreme Court, and to repeal the second section of the act approved 17th of June, 1844, entitled "An act concerning the Supreme Court of the United States," reported it without amendment.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives by Mr. CAMPBELL, their clerk:

The said bills were severally read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

THE PUBLIC ARMORIES.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted yesterday by Mr. CLAYTON, and it was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, directed to report to Congress:

First.—How many public armories there are belonging to the United States in which [illegible] are manufactured, and where the same are located, and the date of commencing operations in each.

Second.—How much capital is and has been invested in such armories; and what proportion in each for sites, buildings, power, permanent machinery, etc.; specifying the amounts under separate heads to date of report.

Third.—How much money has been expended annually in each of said armories for the manufacture of arms, in salaries, wages, and materials, or in any of the elements entering into all the current expenses of manufacturing such arms, independently of fixed capital and the interest thereon.

Fourth.—How many small arms have been produced annually from each of the said armories, all the cost of construction, and how many of the various descriptions of arms, and of what descriptions, are now in serviceable condition.

TONNAGE DUTIES ON SPANISH VESSELS.

On motion by Mr. WESTCOTT, it was Ordered, That it be postponed to, and made the order of the day for, Monday, the 8th day of May next.

PAYMENT OF INTEREST TO ALABAMA.

Mr. PEARCE moved that the prior orders be postponed, for the purpose of resuming the consideration of the bill authorizing the payment of interest on the amount advanced by the State of Alabama to the general government, pending the Creek hostilities in 1836 and 1837.

Mr. CLAYTON hoped that the bill would not be taken up in the absence of the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTER,] who had been obliged to return to his home in consequence of sickness in his family.

Mr. PEARCE said that he had no intention to change or modify the bill, but only to add a general provision.

The bill was then taken up and the following amendment was offered by Mr. PEARCE:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department, be and they are hereby authorized and directed to liquidate and settle the claims of the several States, whose claims have not been heretofore fully liquidated and settled according to the principles of this act, against the United States, for interest upon loans or money borrowed, and actually expended, by them respectively, for the use and benefit of the United States, during the last war with Great Britain; as also interest upon money by said States respectively drawn from a fund upon which they were then receiving interest, and which was by them so expended as aforesaid, and upon money so borrowed and expended as aforesaid, which debt was discharged by said State by the transfer of a fund upon which the State was receiving interest.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That on ascertaining the amount of interest as aforesaid, due to the said States respectively, the following rules shall govern; to wit:

First. That interest shall not be computed on any sum expended which is not evidenced by the amount which has been or shall be refunded or repaid by the United States.

Second. No interest shall be paid on any sum for which the States did not either pay or lose interest as aforesaid.

Third. The rule prescribed by the Supreme Court of the United States at its January term 1839, [13 Peters, 371,] shall be the rule for adjusting these accounts, viz: interest shall be calculated up to the time when a payment has been or shall be made. To this interest the payment shall first be applied, and if it exceed the interest due the residue shall be applied to diminish the principal. If the payment fall short of the interest the balance of the interest shall not be added to the principal so as to produce interest.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the amount of interest, when ascertained as aforesaid, shall be paid out of any monies in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. PEARCE.—There is nothing new in the principle of the bill reported by the Committee on Finance. The principle has been recognized on more than one occasion in this body. Many years ago it was recognized in the case of the claims of Maryland arising out of advances made in the last war; and it was also recognized in the case of South Carolina in 1831. The case of South Carolina differed somewhat from that of Maryland. In that case the State had borrowed money and incurred a debt which was liquidated by the transfer of a fund from which she had derived interest. The State of Maryland borrowed money for the purpose of repelling the incursions of the enemy during the last war. She created a stock for that purpose and discharged the debt by the transfer of United States stock which she held. The principle applied to these cases by the committee was that when the State had lost interest it was entitled to it. I propose to make the principle general and apply it to all cases of State claims against the government for money advanced in the war of 1812 which have been recognized and admitted. I do not propose to settle any of the disputed claims, but only to meet those claims which have been admitted. That is the object and effect of the first section of the amendment. The second section goes a little farther, and is rendered necessary by the very extraordinary rule adopted by the accounting officers of the Treasury department in the calculation of interest. The rule has been that when the claim is made up of principal and interest, and payments are made by the United States, they are applied to the reduction of the principal. This is manifestly unjust, and is entirely contrary to the equitable rule observed in transactions between individuals. I have proposed, therefore, sundry rules intended to modify and correct the rule adopted by the accounting officers.

Mr. ATHERTON.—It seems to me that there ought to be some examination as to the results to which this amendment would lead if adopted. I concur entirely with my friend from Delaware as to the propriety of postponing this subject till the Senator from Virginia, who has had charge of the bill, who has examined the cases, and is familiar with all the facts, shall return. Aside from that, it seems to me that this amendment contains some principles proposed to be applied to the calculation of interest in the cases of claims against the government, which demand our attentive examination. I suggest, therefore, to the mover of the amendment, that it be printed in order that we may have an opportunity of examining it, and that in the meantime the subject be laid over informally.

Mr. PEARCE acquiesced in this suggestion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER.—Does the Senator name any particular day for the consideration of the subject.

Mr. PEARCE.—We propose to wait until the Senator from Virginia returns.

Mr. LEWIS.—I hope the Senator will feel bound as soon as the Senator from Virginia returns, to call up this bill.

Mr. PEARCE.—I shall do so.

Mr. BAGBY.—I wish to make a single remark. I think it is evident that the apprehensions which I expressed yesterday, are about to be confirmed, certainly not on account of any design on the part of the Senator from Maryland, but because as I said, the delay of this bill will be tantamount to its defeat at the present session. The bill contains but one single distinct proposition, and that is this, whether when a certain amount of money has been advanced by a state, and applied to the uses of the general government, the general government will, when it acknowledges and pays the amount of the principal, pay the interest upon it.

On motion by Mr. PEARCE, it was Ordered, That the further consideration of said bill be postponed until to-morrow; and that the amendment be printed.

FREE BRIDGE OVER THE EASTERN BRANCH.

The bill to provide a free communication across the eastern branch of the river Potomac in the District of Columbia, was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ATHERTON inquired if there was any report on this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER.—There are no papers accompanying the bill.

Mr. CAMERON remarked that the whole District was interested in the passage of the bill which had been unanimously reported by the Committee.

Mr. HALE moved to amend the bill by adding the following section:

"And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to purchase on the same terms the bridge over Piscataqua river, between Portsmouth, New Hampshire, and Kittery, in Maine."

Mr. HALE observed that he did not know of any authority in the general government to purchase bridges in this District, if they had not authority to purchase bridges elsewhere.

Mr. CAMERON could hardly suppose that the Senator from New Hampshire was serious in proposing his amendment. The cases were not at all parallel. It was to be recollected that the government owned seven millions of property in this District, for which no taxes were paid; and it was only a small act of justice to make the bridges free.

Mr. HALE did not know whether the Senator from Pennsylvania was in earnest or not. The bridge named in his amendment was similarly situated to the bridge in the bill. It was a bridge leading to property owned by the government—to the navy yard at Kittery, Maine.

The question was then taken upon agreeing to the amendment of Mr. HALE, and it was determined in the negative.

No other amendment being offered, the bill was reported to the Senate.

On the question, "Shall this bill be engrossed, and read the third time?" Mr. ALLEN demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and it was determined in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Badger, Benton, Cameron, Clarke, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, of Massachusetts, Davis, of Mississippi, Dayton, Foote, Greene, Hannegan, Houston, Johnson, of Maryland, Johnson, of Louisiana, Pearce, Phelps, Sprnance, Sturgeon, Underwood, Upham, Westcott, and Yulee.—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Atchison, Atherton, Bagby, Breese, Douglas, Felch, Hale, Johnson, of Georgia, Moor, Niles, and Turney.—12.

The said bill was read the third time, by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That it pass, and that the title thereof be as aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives in said bill.

SETTLERS UNDER THE ARMED OCCUPATION ACT

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill for the relief of the bona fide settlers under the acts for the armed occupation and settlement of a part of the territory of Florida; and

On motion by Mr. WESTCOTT, it was Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed to, and made the order of the day for, Thursday the 4th day of May next.

THE PRIVATE CALENDAR.

Mr. MASON, in accordance with the notice given yesterday, moved to proceed to the consideration of private bills upon the calendar.

Mr. BADGER suggested that it would be better to dispose of the California claims bill, which could be done to-day, and he would then join cheerfully in promoting the views of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. MASON acquiesced in the suggestion, and observed that he should move to proceed with the private calendar as soon as the California bill was disposed of.

THE CALIFORNIA CLAIMS.

The Senate then resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill for ascertaining and paying the California claims.

Mr. CLAYTON.—In rising yesterday to address the Senate on this bill, it was my design to suggest that some amendment was necessary. In my opinion it ought to be provided that the commissioners or persons who are to examine these claims, should be sworn or affirmed to discharge the duties with fidelity. I did not suppose, until the honorable Senator from South Carolina, who last addressed the Senate on this subject, mentioned it, that there was an idea entertained by any one that either of the persons to whom the bill proposed to entrust the examination of these claims, was to decide upon a claim in which he was personally interested. I do not suppose that any such thing was intended on the part of the gentlemen who advocated the bill; or that those high-minded men who were named in the bill, would decide on their own compensation. But, in order to preclude the possibility of that, I shall propose an amendment to prevent these commissioners from settling any claims in which they or either of them may be personally interested. It has been also said in the course of debate, that these claims were, or would be, the subject of extensive speculation. That objection may be easily obviated by an amendment, and before I proceed to the few remarks on the constitutional question which I intend to submit to the Senate, I give notice that I intend to offer an amendment which I will request the Secretary to read.

The SECRETARY then read the amendment, which is as follows:

Add the following section:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the persons hereby appointed to examine the said claims shall, before they enter upon the duties assigned to them, be first duly sworn or affirmed to faithfully perform the duties required of them by this act; and that in no case shall any one of said commissioners act on any claim in which he or any of them is personally interested. And no claim, whether any claim has been presented or not to the original board, for a greater sum than shall be allowed by the original board, the agent shall be allowed to more than receive for the claim, with lawful interest on the amount.

Mr. CLAYTON.—This amendment, I think, obviates all objections which have been fairly taken in debate—with the exception of the constitutional objection.

It is contended that the Congress of the United States has no power under the constitution to name the persons who shall ascertain the amount of claims which they are called upon to settle; but that all such persons are "officers" to be appointed only by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. I do not concur in that construction of the constitution. It is my opinion, after giving to this subject all the investigation that I am capable of bestowing upon it, that the Congress of the United States has the right necessarily incident to its general legislative power to appoint persons to take testimony for them; or to arbitrate claims between the government and any private individuals; or to settle and adjust the amount due from the government to these individuals. I hold that Congress possesses this power, as anecessary and indispensable part of its legislative power. The constitution confers upon Congress all the legislative power given by that instrument. Among the trust powers of Congress, expressly mentioned in the constitution, is the power to pay the debts of the United States, and to exercise all other powers necessary and proper, to carry that power into execution. The power to pay the claims due from the government to individuals, was a right devolved upon the legislative body when the constitution first went into operation; and Congress has exercised that power from the earliest period to the present day, in every case and form in which it thought proper to exercise it.

I shall not go through the statute book to show how often Congress has appointed an arbitrator to settle a private claim between an individual and the government. Some cases of that description are of recent occurrence, and it is true, as was remarked in the progress of debate, that an arbitrator in the case of the Island on which Fort Delaware stands, was named to settle the controversy, between the claimants in one State, against the general government, holding under the title of another State, by two bills which passed this body. I grant that two, three, or half a dozen precedents, will not settle a question of constitutional law. But if we can show that from the very origin of the government, down to this time, Congress has been in the habit of designating individuals, to settle and adjust claims between the government and claimants—and that such has been the practice of the government ab urbe condita down to this time—if the principle has been settled by the Supreme Court of the United States, and proclaimed judicially, then, we are justified in regarding this question as settled, if anything can be considered as settled and determined. Allow me to read from the judicial declaration of the chief justice of the Supreme Court, two passages for the purposes of explaining what, in my opinion, ought to be regarded as the principle binding upon us.

"A contemporary exposition of the constitution, practised and acquiesced under for a period of years, fixes the construction, and the court will not shake or control it."

"It will probably be found, when we look to the character of the constitution of the United States itself, the objects which it seeks to attain, the powers which it confers, the duties which it enjoins, and the rights which it secures, as well as to the known historical fact, that many of its provisions were matters of compromise of opposing interests, requiring that no uniform rule of interpretation can be applied, which may not allow, even if it does not positively demand, many modifications in its actual application to particular classes. Perhaps the safest rule of interpretation, after all, will be found to be, to look to the nature and objects of the particular powers, duties, and rights, with all the light and aids of contemporary history, and to give to the words of each, just such a construction and force, consistent with their legitimate meaning, as to fairly secure and attain the end proposed."

I think, then, it is clearly established, so far as precedents can settle it, that Congress has a right to name the individual who shall settle and adjust these claims. Honorable gentlemen have adverted to the precedent quoted by the Senator from North Carolina, on my right, where the judges of the Supreme Court sitting then as judges of the circuit court of the United States, exercised the power of determining upon the claims of the widows and orphans of those who had died in the revolutionary war. And I have not heard any satisfactory answer given to that decision, though I have been an attentive listener to the very able argument presented by the gentleman from Virginia and others, who have spoken on the subject. What did the chief justice with his associates decide? Why, that in cases of this description, where Congress devolved upon them the duty of deciding upon claims against the government, they had the right to do it; and they actually went on, and did adjudicate and settle the claim, which they could not possibly have done, if they had considered that the constitution of United States had been violated by Congress in the passage of the act, calling upon them to examine the claims of the widows and orphans, to the pension allowed the relatives of those who had fallen in the revolutionary war. Some of those learned and able judges, were among the men who formed the constitution; they all ranked among the fathers of the republic; and it is impossible that they could have proceeded to settle and adjudicate these claims under that law, if they had believed that there was not any constitutional power of Congress to pass this law. They say, after quoting the law:

"As, therefore, the business assigned to this court by the act is not judicial, nor directed to be performed judicially, the act can only be considered as appointing commissioners for the purposes mentioned in it by official instead of personal designations.

"That the judges of this court regard themselves as being the commissioners designated by this act, and therefore as being at liberty to accept or decline that office."

They then proceed to say that they will perform the duties assigned by the act, and they do perform them. I contend, then, that in so doing they have decided the whole question now pending before the Senate. They have determined—and it is impossible to construe the act in any other way—that the Congress of the United States has the right to appoint commissioners to settle claims against this government. What manner of answer is it to say that they do not act as judges? It is not by virtue of any judicial power that they proceed to act, but being designated as individuals to exercise a power not conferred upon them as judges at all, they proceed to settle these claims; and in doing so I contend that they have affirmed the power of Congress in the whole matter.

Mr. MASON.—Will the Senator allow me to ask him whether the law of which he is now speaking was not confined altogether to giving power to these judges to take evidence only, and that they were to report to Congress and not to adjudicate the claims?

Mr. CLAYTON.—They had power not only to take evidence but also to decide upon the claims. But the honorable gentleman must admit that if Congress had the right to appoint them to take evidence, the whole case is yielded.

Mr BUTLER.—As this precedent seems to be relied upon, I would ask my honorable friend from Delaware whether that power was not conferred by Congress upon the supposition that it was competent for Congress to add to the judicial functions of the judges by requiring them to perform this office; and whether it was not, therefore, simply conferring additional duties upon officers already in existence?

Mr. CLAYTON.—I think I can answer the Senator by referring him to the language of the judges. He will perceive from that, that it is not the addition of a new judicial power.

Mr. BUTLER.—I am aware that the judges assumed the performance of duties without salary, but my inquiry was whether Congress did not act upon the supposition that they were adding to the judicial duties of the judges. The point of the decision was, that Congress had attempted to devolve upon them duties which did not belong to them.

Mr. CLAYTON.—Will the Senator allow me to read again from the decision of the judges? [He then read the whole decision.]

The court then say that they were not appointed as judges. The term "judge," is merely descriptio personæ, and the effect and meaning which the court assign to the act, is nothing more than if Congress had said when passing the act, that John Jay, and his associate judges by name—without calling them judges—should perform this duty. That is precisely what the judges understood by it, as is apparent from their decision; and therefore I contend that this precedent covers the case and settles the whole question now before Congress.

The Chief Justice of the United States says—"the best light for construing the constitution is contemporaneous history," and I am one of those, like most of my profession, who have great reverence for well considered precedents. Congress has exercised this power, not only in this case, in which the judges of the Supreme Court solemnly affirmed the power, but in a great many other cases, in which no human being ever questioned the existence of the power. It is difficult to state how many cases there are of this description. I will take one case which occurred in my own recollection as a member of Congress. I refer to the act of Congress of the 14th of July, 1832, by which the third Auditor of the Treasury, the second comptroller, and Charles Gratiot were authorized to examine the claims of the legal representatives of Nimrod Farrow and Richard Harris. If it had not been for the fact that the name of Charles Gratiot was inserted in that bill as one of the commissioners, we should have been met by the answer given to other precedents by honorable gentlemen, that the new office or the new duty of commissioners was conferred upon an officer already existing—an objection which, by the by, I think has no force whatever. But in this case, the precedent is not liable to that objection. One of the commissioners was named, by his individual designation, and no person made any constitutional objection. Another precedent is furnished in a bill which I had the honor myself to report when Chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary. I alluded to the bill for the relief of Stockton and Stokes, authorizing the Solicitor of the Treasury to adjust and settle controversies between the Postmaster General and these individuals. I recollect very well the history of that bill. We heard counsel on the subject, and having, as we supposed, become possessed of all that could be urged on both sides, looking to the interest of the government, as well as justice to the individuals concerned, we came to the conclusion that it would be best to refer the whole matter to Virgil Maxey, who then happened to be Solicitor of the Treasury. We did not refer the subject to him, because as Solicitor of the Treasury, it was his duty to investigate it, but because he was a competent arbitrator, and we were all content that he should decide the controversy. This, then, is another instance like that of the Supreme Court, in which the officer selected to examine and decide claims against the government, was named by his official character as a designatio personæ, to indicate the individual who was to perform the duty. This matter also came before the Supreme Court, which incidentally decided the question. For if there had been any constitutional objection to the settlement of the matter by this officer, the question would have arisen on the trial, which is reported in 12th Peters' Reports. The language of the court in this case has been already quoted by the Senator from Texas, (Mr. RUSK.)

Here the court say expressly, that it was in the power of Congress, and in their discretion, to appoint any one to settle claims against the government, and thus we have an entire concurrence in the opinion given by the court in 1792, in the case of the adjudication of the claims of widows and orphans. So far, then, as the question has been presented before the Supreme Court, I maintain that that court never doubted the power of Congress, but on the contrary, has given opinions entirely irreconcilable with the idea, that Congress has not the right to appoint these commissioners.

The true question to be decided is this: Is the appointment of these persons necessary and proper, in order to enable us to legislate on the subject matter of these claims? Honorable gentlemen in the course of debate, have generally given it as their opinion, that the individuals named in this bill, are the very men that ought to decide upon these claims—the very men upon whose testimony they would wish the matter to be settled. They are not willing to entrust the adjudication of so important a matter in California to strangers, and persons who know nothing of it, or persons in whom they have not equal confidence with that which they repose in Mr. Freemont, and the gentlemen associated with him. They are not willing to pass the bill with the names of other persons in it or without an assurance that these men in whom they place confidence, will be appointed to adjudicate the claims. I ask, then, can any man in these circumstances, undertake to say that it is not indispensably necessary and proper to the due exercise of your legislative power, that you should have the right to name the man who shall settle these claims? It is in vain to say, that these very individuals may be appointed by the President, and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Before I vote for the bill, I desire to know not only what the President may do, but without any possibility of being deceived. I desire to be assured that these are to be the very men to do it. On that ground I vote. I am not willing to trust their settlement to other men. In this opinion many, may most members of the Senate concur. Have we not therefore right to say, that these men shall settle these claims—that they shall decide before the claimants receive seven hundred thousand dollars out of the public treasury? I never before heard until this discussion arose, that there was any doubt as to the constitutional power of Congress to arbitrate a claim of an individual against this government. It certainly is a new principle that Congress has no such power. I never heard it advanced before. I will not undertake to consume the time of the Senate by reviewing the many cases which have presented themselves bearing upon this question, but shall content myself with the general declaration, that I hold the power to ascertain the justice of claims against the government is a necessary incident to the legislative power; and carries with it the power to appoint the person or persons to decide upon the claims. Other cases might be relied upon on which I will not dwell. In one the governor of Florida was appointed to approve the claims before they could be paid. In many others the different auditors and secretaries have been selected for a similar duty, and Congress has been in the constant habit of imposing such duties on any officer or person it saw fit to select without reference to any other consideration than his fitness for the performance of it as an individual. I know very well that a legislative precedent is not considered entitled to much weight unless the subject has undergone discussion; but these cases are amongst the many which go to show that Congress has never heretofore doubted its right to appoint persons to settle claims against the government. On the other hand it is said that there are several instances in which the President has appointed commissioners to settle claims of individuals against the government, as in the cases in which the funds provided by a treaty with foreign governments have been distributed by commissioners appointed by the President, by and with the consent and advice of the Senate. These cases are referred to for the purpose of showing that Congress cannot appoint commissioners in this case. If, however, this argument proves anything, it proves the very reverse of that which is intended. If, in these cases, the President and Senate had the power without authority of Congress, why were the clauses authorizing this mode of appointment inserted in the acts of Congress? Surely, if the constitution gives the power and the authority of Congress was not wanting, these clauses conferring upon the President and Senate the power to appoint commissioners should have been left out. Why were they inserted? Their insertion is a clear proof that those who drew the laws thought that it was necessary, that Congress should authorize in this case the appointment of commissioners by the President and Senate. Instead, then, of being precedents against the right of Congress which I now advocate, they are against the right of others to appoint without the consent of Congress.

It is somewhat remarkable that now, and for years past, discussion on the powers of the different branches of the government should run more frequently upon and against the powers of Congress, than upon the powers of the Executive. In former days there was a great of jealousy of Executive power. But now the order is reversed. Power is stealing from the many to the few, and from the few to one. The order of the day is now to advocate the exclusive right of the President of the United States to interfere in cases, where, if Congress be denied the power to appoint commissioners, they cannot properly legislate! This is Executive encroachment with a vengeance! I have never been the advocate of Executive power, and I never shall be. I stand by the rights of Congress as I understand them, and as explained to me by the judges of the courts of the United States. I hold, that if this power be denied to us, it will be sometimes impossible for us to legislate as we think right. We shall in such cases have to pay claims as the President thinks right. If we have not the right to prescribe the rules of evidence which are to govern in the decision of these claims—if we have not the right to name the persons in whom we have confidence that are to settle and adjust them, it is impossible that we can get through the labor, either by committee otherwise, of examining them all, and consequently we never can to our own satisfaction discharge the duty which devolves upon us. I am, therefore, altogether opposed to the amendment of the honorable gentleman from Virginia.

There was one remark made yesterday by the Senator from South Carolina, to which I desire to advert. I understand him as objecting to the bill because we appointed a paymaster or disbursing officer without demanding and obtaining security. If the objection of the gentleman from South Carolina be worth any thing against the bill or amendment reported by the committee, does it not lie with all its force against the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Virginia? The amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, which proposes to take from Congress the right to name the commissioners and to give it to the President, contains the very same provisions in regard to the disbursing officer who is to pay these claims in California. If the disbursing officer is not to give security according to the bill, there is certainly the same insecurity in the amendment of the Senator from Virginia. But in my opinion there is no danger of insecurity in either case. A disbursing officer must necessarily give security. In this case we shall have the security which we have in all other cases; and we want no more. With regard to the other objections of the Senator from South Carolina—(I mean the objections independent of the constitutional objection)—the amendment which I had the honor to submit, and which I intend to offer at the proper time obviates all these objections. It precludes these gentlemen from deciding in any case in which they may be themselves interested. It cuts up by the roots all the objections which we have heard urged about the danger of speculating in these claims, and subjects these commissioners to the same responsibility—the same oaths which in all other cases are enjoined upon persons in their situation.

I have not thought it necessary in discussing this question to enter into the consideration of a matter which was very much debated here, whether these persons are not "officers" within the meaning of that clause of the constitution which gives the President the power of appointment. I do not care whether they are called officers or not. You may find half a dozen definitions of the constitution gives the legislative power to Congress, and another clause confers the power of appointment upon the President. The two clauses must be construed together, and the power of appointment given to the President of the United States, must not be so construed as to conflict with the legislative power of Congress. In every case in which the appointment or designation of the commissioner or officer is necessary to the due discharge of a legislative function, the great constitutional provisions that ordain Congress, and give it legislative power, confer the power to make this appointment. The general appointing power of the President of the United States, and the power incident to the discharge of legislative functions, which rests in Congress, are entirely reconcilable. If the argument of the gentleman on the other side were sound, it would deprive us of the power to appoint commissioners to take evidence. If good for anything, the argument is good for that extent; if not, it is good for nothing.

In my judgment, then, the amendment of the honorable gentlemen from Virginia, is liable to constitutional objections, and does not remove those which have been urged against the bill. I shall, therefore, vote against it, and when the bill comes up for consideration, I shall move the amendment which I have had the honor to send to the desk of the Secretary.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland.—When this bill came from the committee in the first instance and was first seen by me I regarded it as being most clearly objectionable upon the ground which I am now about to discuss—as trenching upon the constitutional power of the Executive. I was not here when the bill was discussed as it originally stood; but I suppose may infer that in the opinion of the majority of the Senate that discussion was fatal to the bill, and that the reference to the committee was made in order to get rid of the objections which were urged in that debate. Now, as preliminary to the remarks I propose to offer, I beg leave to recall the attention of the Senate to the provision in the original bill so far as it is material to the point at issue. It was this:

"And for the purpose of ascertaining the justice and amount of such part of said claims as have not been allowed or authenticated by either of said officers, the President be, and he is authorized, to appoint a board, consisting of John C Fremont, and two officers of said battalion while in service."

The decision of the board was to settle the whole controversy as between the government of the United States and the claimants; and the objection to the provision was that Lieut. Col. Fremont was one of the parties named by Congress to constitute the board. Since then the bill has been again before the committee; and, I suppose, with a view to obviate the objection which seemed to be apparent on the face of the bill to some, and, as I believe, to the majority of the Senate, or it would not have been recommitted, the present amendment has been proposed. In my opinion it does not obviate the objection. The original bill named Lieut. Col. Fremont, and limited the choice of the President in the selection of the others to two officers of the California battalion. The provision of the amendment is:

"And no unascertained claim shall be paid until first examined by the late commander of the California battalion, J. C. Fremont, and by the late commissary and the late paymaster of the battalion, Captain Hensley and Major Reading, and allowed by them or a majority of them; and payment of such claims so allowed and certified, shall be made to the claimants in California by some proper disbursing officer, duly appointed or designated for that purpose."

So far, perhaps, it was within the power of the Executive. But that did not answer the purpose. The purpose is not only to exclude claims which shall not have been examined and allowed by Lieut. Col. Fremont, but to provide for the payment of the claims which shall be so allowed; and with a view to that object the amendment goes on to say

"And all claims not presented and allowed within one month after the time of passing this bill shall be forever barred; and the compensation of the examining persons shall be according to that of their respective ranks in the late battalion, and shall be paid out of the appropriation contained in this bill, and shall make return of their proceedings to the War Department."

Now, with all due deference to the committee, if the original bill was liable to objection, the amendment is, if possible, still more objectionable. The objection to the original bill was, that we took from the Executive the appointment of one member of a board, to consist of three persons, limiting the Executive in the selection of the remaining members, and the object of the committee, in good faith of course, and, as they supposed perfectly legitimate, was to avoid that objection. Their amendment provides for the appointment by Congress of all the members of the board. It is quite immaterial whether the word "appoint" be found in the law or not. It depends upon the character of the duty to be performed. The original bill says that the judgment of the board is to be final and conclusive on the subject of all the claims—final against the government where the claims are allowed—final against the claimants where disallowed.

Without attempting to show that the provisions in both cases are precisely alike, or that if there be any difference it is rather against the amendment, I now proceed to enquire, what is the character of the duty to be performed? I suppose there can be no doubt that that duty is no more nor less than judicial in its character—strictly judicial; that this board constitutes an inferior court to decide between the United States and suitors to the United States, whether anything, and if anything, what is due to them by us? Is it not judicial? Why, if these claims are all known and admitted by the United States, pay them at once. If the claimants are known, and the amount due to each is known, let it be paid at once. It is because the claims of these individuals are not admitted, or, because, if there be any admitted to exist, the amount is not admitted, that it has become important to appoint a board to ascertain the facts, and to decide upon the facts, and the law which is to settle the existence of the claims as well as the amount to be paid. The duty of the board then is a judicial duty. If I have read aright the opinion given by the Supreme Court upon the act relating to the pensions, widows and orphans, so much relied upon by my friends from North Carolina and Delaware, [Messrs. BADGER and CLAYTON,] so far from being an authority to support the proposition which they advocate, it is, I think, directly the other way. First, it has been introduced as a legislative construction; and, secondly, as a judicial interpretation. A word on both. To what weight is it entitled as an instance of legislative construction? The very judicial interpretation relied upon by my learned friends on the other side shows, that in the opinion of the judiciary it was not entitled to any weight in that aspect. I have got the law before me, and no man can read it without perceiving that the question asked by the honorable Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER,] can be answered only in the affirmative. What did Congress think when they passed that act? That they had authority to exact of the judges the performance of the duties imposed. Why, clearly, they thought that they had the authority to impose upon the judges the duty of carrying out the provisions of that act. Whether it was in the contemplation of Congress that the duties were judicial or extrajudicial is quite immaterial. So far as the act proves any thing of the opinion of Congress upon the question of constitutional power, it demonstrates that they thought they had a right to exact of the judges the performance of these duties. Had they any such authority? Let us go to the opinion relied upon for a different purpose, and we will find that the judges unanimously decided that if the functions which they were called upon to discharge by that act, were not judicial, Congress had no right to impose them upon them. Why, then, did they undertake to exercise those functions? They go on to say, that the duties devolved upon them by the act did not partake at all of the judicial character—that they look to other employments and other functions, and, therefore, Congress had no power to impose those duties upon them. But still they proceeded to execute the provisions of the act—and why? Because they considered themselves merely as commissioners, although named by their official designation—that they were called upon to perform a mere ministerial duty, in the discharge of which they were willing to accede to the request of Congress. How did they come to that conclusion? Upon two grounds, that what they were to do in the act was not final, and that the whole was to be returned to the Secretary of War. This is their language:

"That neither the legislature nor the executive branch can constitutionally assign to the judicial any duties but such as are properly judicial, and to be performed in a judicial manner.

"That the duties assigned to the circuit courts by this act are not of that description, and that the duties shall does not appear to us to comprise them as such, inasmuch as it subjects the decisions of these courts made pursuant to those duties, first to the consideration and suspension of the Secretary of War, and then to the revision of the Legislature; whereas, by the constitution, neither the Secretary of War, nor any other executive officer, nor even the Legislature, are authorized to sit as a court of errors on the judicial acts or opinions of this court.

The provision of the law to which they referred was this.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of War, upon receipt of the proofs, certificate, and opinion aforesaid, shall cause the same to be duly filed in his office, and place the name of such applicant on the pension list of the United States in conformity thereto: Provided always, That in any case where the said Secretary shall have cause to suspect imposition or mistake, he shall have power to withhold the name of such applicant from the pension list, and make report of the same to Congress at their next session.

As a legislative construction it is entitled to no weight. If it proves any thing, it proves that Congress thought they had a right to impose the duty on the judges; the judges decided otherwise. As a judicial construction it proves nothing but this: if you are disposed and I am willing to admit that you may draw that inference, that the judges would have taken into consideration the constitutionality of the act. What is this bill? Why it makes the persons named the judges to examine the facts and decide upon them. It appropriates the money just as this board shall think that the money ought to be appropriated. It distributes the money just as the board thinks proper. Now I know that there is a difficulty not only in relation to the particular question which is before the Senate, but in relation to many other questions as to the respective powers of the various departments of the government. It is not in every instance easy to draw a distinct line, but that does not prove that there does not exist a line of demarcation between their separate powers. It has been proposed frequently for many years past, to constitute a board to decide upon all claims existing now or hereafter against the government. Now I put it to Senators whether it is in the power of the legislature to appoint that board. What says the constitution?

"He shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law: but the Congress may by law, vest the appointment of such inferior officers, as they think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of departments.

Can any body doubt that the three individuals named in this act will be officers of the United States, called upon to discharge these particular functions. What are they, if they be not? Are they the officers of the Congress of the United States, contra-distinguished from officers of the United States? Is there such a thing known in the constitution, as an officer of the legislative power as contra-distinguished from an officer of the United States, except when in the words of the constitution the legislative bodies are authorized to appoint their own officers? No. The moment these commissioners come into existence by this act they at once become officers of the United States. The only question remaining is, are their functions such that they would be considered as having been appointed merely for the purpose of discharging some duty not falling within the range of those duties contemplated by some law of the United States The honorable Senator from Delaware [Mr. CLAYTON] tells us that he will not stop to inquire whether these gentlemen will not, if this law should pass, be officers of the United States within the meaning of these terms as used in the constitution. He has found out a new power in Congress, and what is that? It is in the terms "necessary and proper." How did he make it out? Several Senators who have spoken on this subject, and perhaps all have agreed that there are no three men in the United States so well qualified to decide upon these claims, as the gentlemen named in the act, and thereupon the Senator from Delaware gravely concludes that as we have authority to pay the debts of the United States, and to pass all laws necessary to carry into execution these laws, we must have the authority to appoint these men.

Mr. CLAYTON.—I said that it was a necessary incident to our legislative powers.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Just so. Let us examine that position. Why we have sometimes thought on this side of the chamber, that there was a great deal of misconduct in some of the Executive departments. In the opinion of some of us the Secretary of the Treasury has not faithfully discharged his duty. The Secretary of War has also been occasionally denounced for neglecting his duty, or for mal-administration of his office. Well now we have the authority to lay and collect taxes, to raise and support armies. These are legislative powers. Will the Senator contend that in order to carry out these powers with efficiency and fidelity, we must have some authority to appoint the officers, who are to collect the taxes, and conduct the operations of the army. It is a legislative power under the constitution to raise and support armies. There are certain men in the United States, in the opinion of Senators, who alone are able to march the army to the field and conduct it to victory. Have we then the power to appoint these officers? To make the declaration of war effectual—to effect our object in raising an army, it may be in our opinion obsolutely necessary—and I mention the name in no invidious sense—to place at the head of the army General Winfield Scott. Have we a right then to place him by law at the head of the army? Again, we have a right to levy duties and lay taxes, to pay the public debt, and provide for the general welfare of United States. It is a very material matter to be considered, in carrying out that power, to whom shall be entrusted the duty of collecting taxes. I trust one man, and distrust another. Because we are clothed with legislative power to lay duties on imposts, and are invested with authority to pass all laws necessary and proper to carry into execution all our legislative power, we will name the collectors!—I defy the ingenuity of man—I speak now of the argument of the Senator from Delaware—to avoid the conclusion, that the reasoning of the honorable Senator, if pushed to its legitimate result, must take from the Executive powers which have never been questioned. The honorable Senator has remarked, and perhaps with a good deal of truth, that the tendency of the times is to curtail the legislative and enlarge Executive power. It gives me no alarm and never has at any period. I believe now, as I have ever believed, that the power conferred upon the Executive by the constitution in two of the particulars most censured, and, in the opinion of some, the most practically mischievous, is indeed the most wholesome grant of power to be found in the instrument. I mean the power of the veto and the power of appointment to office. I believe, as firmly as I do in my own existence, that this noble government could not have lasted to the present day, if the power of the veto had not formed a part of the Executive power, not that it has not been abused, and in some cases improperly exercised, but because its existence has prevented such mischievous, ruinous, and tyrannical legislation as would have caused the Union to fall into fragments. It is this power that secures to the smaller States all their rights. What do we often see? Popular passion, excited and inflamed, finding its way into the halls of legislation, and the rights of the minority trampled upon in violation of all the guarantees in the constitution. And what more than anything else, prevents the successful assaults of popular passion upon the guaranties of the constitution, except the knowledge that there exists in the government one man who can stop it until the question is submitted to the sober good sense, better thought, and matured consideration of the people? As to the power of appointment to office, if I were called upon to take a part in the formation of the constitution to-morrow, I should give the power to the Executive. No man feels higher respect for the Senate of the United States, or Congress, than I do; but there is no one, at all familiar with the constitution of legislative bodies, who could, I think, consent that either house of Congress should exercise such a power. I admit that there have been abuses of this power, for where power is great in human hands, it will be abused. But to talk of the abuse of this power in the hands of the Executive, and that a remedy is to be found in taking it upon ourselves, is the extreme of folly. Were the power of appointment to office vested in Congress, the most mischievous, ruinous results would follow. The number of the "Federalist," upon the subject, is entitled to great consideration, and addresses itself most favorably to the understanding of the American people, written by Alexander Hamilton, who ever wrote with a pen which illumined every page on which it was employed. He shows that it was not only better to place the power in the hands of the President, but that it was necessary to do so. But what right has my friend from Delaware to suppose that the President of the United States, finding the three persons named in the bill to be the best qualified men in the country, will not appoint them to discharge this duty? I have a right to infer, if he is an honest man, and I am not here to say he is not—if he is an intelligent man, and I am not here to deny it, that the same evidence that satisfies the Senate that these men ought to be appointed, will satisfy and ought to satisfy the President. But, again: how does the Senator know that the judgment of the Senate, which he imagines to exist—and I believe it does, so far as I know with respect to these individuals—will be the judgment of the House? They are to go through an ordeal of two hundred and thirty members of the other house. I do not speak of the present instance, but party considerations may come to interfere with the selection of individuals to perform the duties devolved upon them by acts of Congress, if the power of appointment is to be lodged in the hands of these legislative bodies. Suppose the House does not decide that these are the best men to be selected, and that they insert instead of this provision, such a one as has been proposed by the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. MASON,] would my friend from Delaware, then reject the bill? Why, certainly, he could not say that he would not pass the bill, because unless these men were appointed, our legislative power will not be properly exercised. I am very far from saying a word in disparagement of either of the gentlemen named in the bill. I think they are qualified for this office, but what I mean to say is, and I say it with all the confidence which we can have in such a case as this, that it will be a great deal better to appropriate the seven hundred thousand dollars at once, and pay the money into the hands of Lieut. Colonel Fremont forthwith, and let him go to California and pay the claims, than strike, as I conceive we shall do in the passage of this bill in its present form, a blow at the constitution.

A word on another topic, and I have done. My friend from Texas, [Mr. RUSK,] yesterday, and on a former occasion in which he addressed the Senate upon this bill, stated that the judgment of these arbitrators, or whatever you may term them, would be nothing more than evidence of the existence of these claims. It is not so. I fully admit, that we can by a committee of our own body, have testimony taken upon which the Senate is to act. I admit that we may authorize testimony to be taken before any tribunal existing, or we may create for the purpose a tribunal to take it and report it to us, and on which we are to act in our legislative capacity, and order to enable us to act in that capacity. But this is not the character of this bill. What these commissioners are authorized to do, is not to collect the evidence, but to decide the case. They are to make no report to us, upon which we are afterwards to decide, but they are of themselves and by themselves, in the exercise of their own judgment, to settle forever the question, whether there are any California claims, and if any, what they are, and how much is due. It is as strictly judicial, as absolutely final upon the whole matter in dispute, between the claimants and the United States, as would be the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, if it could get there, and a decision of that tribunal be pronounced upon the case.

Mr. BADGER.—Before I proceed with the remarks which I design to offer, it is proper that I should make a preliminary statement, because it is just to others, and because I ought to apologize for having so often trespassed on the attention of the Senate. The particular provision of this bill, which has excited so long, and so earnest a discussion, was a provision suggested and insisted upon in the committee by myself. It originated with me, and with no one else. So far as I know, until I suggested it, it was thought of by no else; and I suggested it, of course, under the impression that we had a right to adopt the provision, which I still entertain, notwithstanding the observations of my friend from Maryland; and because I chose in devolving the power to dispose of this amount of public money, in the peculiar circumstances of these claims, to know the persons on whose decision and award the money was to be disposed of. Without entering into any inquiry, which I must say was unnecessarily brought forward by my friend from Maryland, as to what, or what would not be the action of the President of the United States, if the selection was left to him, I, for one, did not choose to commit the selection as a general and indefinite subject of choice to the discretion of the President or any body else. But in making provision for the ascertaining and payment of claims against the United States, arising in the peculiar circumstances which characterize these California claims; to be investigated and decided upon in a foreign country, I, for one, was not willing that this duty should be devolved upon any but the persons selected by ourselves.

After this statement, I beg the attention of the Senate to some observations in reply to the remarks which fell from my friend from Maryland. In the first place I wish to notice an observation made by the Senator from Virginia, (Mr. MASON.) He said, if I understood him aright, that I knew that in courts of law, nothing was considered as authority, except the decision or adjudication of an appellate tribunal.

Mr. MASON.—If the Senator will allow me, I will state what I said. I remarked that the Senator from North Carolina well knew that in a court of law, no decision was taken as authority but that which had been made directly, upon the point under consideration. I mean by that, that in a subordinate court the decision of an appellate court is the law of the court.

Mr. BADGER.—So I understood the Senator. Before I proceed to examine the nature and character of the precedents relied upon here, allow me in reference to that point to say, that so far from understanding it to be as the Senator from Virginia supposes I understood that the authority which guides a court of law embraces not only the case of an express adjudication made upon the point and made in a higher tribunal, but that in the sense in which we use the term "authority," courts of law consider themselves bound by their own adjudication even when they do not constitute the appellate tribunal. They feel themselves bound by the course and practice of their own court. They feel themselves bound by the judicial course of proceeding of their predecessors in office. But what do we mean by this being bound? Why, of course, not bound in the sense in which an inferior tribunal is bound to execute the decision of the superior court. The inferior tribunal is bound to obey, and can be compelled to obey. But by authority I mean those judicial measures which morally coerce the determination of the judge, whether they satisfy his understanding as a lawyer or not. There can be of course no physical coercion—the judge is not liable as he would be for his contempt of the mandate of a superior tribunal; but he is judicially coerced to take that ground because it has been so decided. I beg to refer to what has been said by two or three distinguished judges on this subject. [The honorable Senator quoted from Coke, Kenyon, and others.] These, then, are the great principles upon which courts of justice recognize not only adjudicated cases, but the constant practice of the courts as being authority to direct them in the decision to which they came; and though upon examination it appears that "wisdom willeth to the contrary," they cannot for that reason disregard it. They must understand that if there had been just foundation for objection, it would have been taken by some of the counsel or judges, and that the point would not have been permitted to pass sub silentio. It is a necessary, inevitable rule. Notwithstanding what may be said by gentlemen in theory, and said with great sincerity, as it was said by the Senator from Virginia, and I know that what he speaks here and elsewhere, he speaks sincerely, yet, in point of fact, we cannot get along with the administration of this government without habitual reference to the precedents established by those who have gone before us.

I now beg the attention of the Senate to what was said by my friend from Maryland, in order to escape the force of the decision of the judges in 1792; and let me say that what was ruled by them is of paramount importance, both on account of the person who wrote it and the time when it was written. That eminent person, Chief Justice Jay, who presided in the circuit court which came to this conclusion was not only entitled to all confidence and respect on account of the most pure and unsullied integrity—integrity never surpassed by that possessed by any human being—not only on account of his eminent legal learning and high mental powers, but because it so happened that besides being contemporaneous with the adoption of the constitution and the discussions upon him, he furnishes us with almost an authentic interpretation of that instrument. He had studied it in all its parts, and the time when this decision was made was immediately after the constitution was put into operation. There was no party excitement—no heats to distract the judgment or mislead the proper exercise of the understanding—no distrust of the great and good man then at the head of this nation, as he stood prominently before the world at large. It was a question decided simply upon its intrinsic merits. Well, now let us see what was decided. My friend from Maryland and myself do not agree as to the decision. He contends that the judges decided that the duties devolved upon them were judicial. Why? Because the judges were to do nothing but simply to collect testimony, and, in the next place, they were not to decide judicially, but to report to the head of the department. I think my friend is entirely mistaken as to what the enactment is. The judges were not merely to collect testimony, for the second section of the act provides:

[The honorable Senator read the section which has been already given.]

Well, now, did the judges understand that they were merely to get together and collect testimony? No. The act confines them to no such duty, but requires their decision to be made, their opinion to be written, and transmitted to the head of the department. The decision of the court was both according to the act as it plainly reads, and what is more important on the present occasion, as the judges understood it. They understood it to be an act under which they were to take testimony, form an opinion, and certify a decision. The honorable Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) shakes his head. He will have an opportunity when I have concluded, to show that I am in error. The words of the act I have read, and they sustain me in the view which I have taken.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I shook my head because the practice of the Office is quite the contrary.

Mr. BADGER.—What Office?

Mr. CALHOUN.—The Pension Office—under the direction of the War Department. The practice is entirely different.

Mr. BADGER.—I have not said one word about the practice of the Pension Office. It may be anything or nothing.

Mr. CALHOUN.—The Senator spoke of the decision of the judges as being final in the pension cases.

Mr. BADGER.—I stated, as a pertinent answer to the Senator from Maryland, that the judges of the circuit court of the United States did not consider that they were discharging a mere ministerial function in collecting testimony, but that they were to come to an opinion and certify their decision; and one of their objections to the act was that their decision was to be reconsidered, and did not operate by its own power. The judges say that they decline to execute the duties imposed upon them. The duties imposed upon them were not judicial, and the Legislature did not contemplate them to be judicial. What then did the judges do? This is the real point of the matter. This is an act of Congress, which says that the judges of the circuit courts shall exercise certain functions. The judges say, that as judges of the circuit court, Congress has no right either to compel us to exercise these functions, or to confer them upon us. So far as the act was an attempt to confer anything upon the judges, as judges, it was, so far as the opinion went, annulled. What do the judges say next? That they will understand the act as appointing them commissioners by official instead of personal description. For instance, the judges say that they will understand this act to mean, that in the State of New York, John Jay, and the other two judges named, shall be commissioners. Then the judges assume that Congress could by the act have appointed three commissioners by name, for the ground upon which they act is, that Congress have appointed three individuals, not as officers, describing them by their official instead of personal description. They say it is a tender of an office to them; for they say "as therefore the business assigned this court by the act is not judicial, nor directed to be performed judicially, the act can only be considered as appointing commissioners for the purposes mentioned in it by official instead of personal descriptions." The judges regard themselves as the commissioners designated by this act; and, therefore, being at liberty to accept or decline that office; and what did they do? Why, they proceed to accept the office and discharge the duties of it; and with an extreme solicitude to show that they had not assumed these duties as judges, they adjourned the court from day to day as usual, and in the intervals heard this evidence, and formed the opinion which the law required. How is it possible, if this case is to be respected, that the ingenuity of man can get over it? What is the case now before the Senate? It is to appoint certain persons to discharge certain functions, which the gentlemen on the other side say, constitute an office. Well, in a certain sense of the word "office," I shall not deny it. But it said, that we have no power to designate those as the individuals who are to perform these duties. But precisely the same thing was done in the act of '92, and the judges declared that Congress had the undoubted power to name these commissioners, and that they had the right either to accept or decline the office of commissioners, on which they proceed to accept and discharge the duties.

My friend from Maryland has discovered a very ingenious mode of getting rid of the weight of this. He says that the judges in that case determined that the duties were not judicial; and that, therefore, there is no precedent here, and why? He says that the duties conferred upon the persons named in the amendment to the bill are strictly judicial duties. His whole argument is based upon that, and yet, if I understand it, he has no objection to the amendment offered by the honorable Senator from Virginia. Let us look into this for a moment. He has asked, very triumphantly, if under the constitution there are any officers known except officers of the United States? I reply by another interrogatory—is there any judicial power known under this constitution, but the judicial power of the United States? I presume the answer must be in the negative. Well, then, is my friend willing to vote for the provision proposed by the Senator from Virginia? The provision of the constitution is clear and express, that the whole judicial power of the United States—there is no exception—shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior tribunals as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish; and that the judges of all these courts shall hold their office during good behaviour. Now, if my friend be sincere—and no doubt he is, there is no man more sincere than he, as there is no man more generally correct, but on this occasion he is, I think, singularly mistaken—if he be correct in maintaining that the powers to be exercised by these commissioners are judicial powers, must he not admit that they cannot be conferred except upon a court of the United States? This is clear. The constitution is imperative. No human ingenuity can make a difficulty about it. Well, now, he must take one side or the other. If the power be judicial, he cannot confer it upon the commissioners; he must confer it upon a court. If it be not a judicial power within the constitution of the United States, the argument of the Senator falls to the ground. He may take either horn of the dilemma. It is impossible that he can escape from it, with all his learning, and acuteness, and long experience in the courts, that it is a judicial power or it is not. He affirms it to be judicial. Then it can be vested only in a court of the United States. If not judicial, his argument falls, for it is based upon that assumption.

I do not understand the Senator as denying that Congress may appoint an arbitrator. So far as I know, that has not been denied by any gentleman who has spoken on the subject. Are not the functions of arbitrators judicial? How are they described in the ordinary language of the books? An arbitrator instead of being a judge appointed by public authority to decide, is a private judge nominated by the parties in the controversy. Can any thing be clearer? What was the question about the Pea Patch Island?

Mr. BUTLER. (in his seat.)—Did the Senator ever hear of an ex parte arbitrator?

Mr. BADGER.—I shall notice that before I have done. The Senator is something like my honorable friend from Maryland, he did not survey the whole ground, before he ventured his position! It is conceded that we can appoint an arbitrator. It is beyond dispute that the functions of an arbitrator are judicial. It is, therefore, manifest, whatever other difficulty may exist, that so far as the argument of my friend from Maryland which he brought forward with a considerable air of triumph and announced as conclusive, if conclusive against any thing it is against the bill in neither of the forms contemplated; and makes it necessary that we should establish a court and make judges for good behaviour. But I was about to remark that this unusual mode of interpretation would place us in this extraordinary position. He says that to audit and settle accounts against the United States is a judicial power within the constitution of the United States, and that the judicial power cannot by law be treated otherwise than as a judicial power. And yet he admits that we may authorize any of our committees, if we please, to examine into these claims, to produce the evidence and to furnish it to us, and that then we can decide the claims, and that when we have come to an conclusion, we can act upon it and pay the money. Well, then, if to examine into claims be a judicial power, where did Congress get that power? Where can it be devolved according to the plain letter of the constitution, but in the courts of the United States? What is the result? We cannot adopt such an interpretation of the constitution. It would not only make the constitution mischievous, but impracticable. It would make it not only inoperative as beneficially as it might operate, but would prevent it from moving at all. If this rule be true, the business of government cannot be carried on a day. Are not claims settled, audited, determined upon, and paid by your committee of accounts in this chamber, and when so settled, are paid by disbursing officers of this body from the contingent fund, placed at their disposal? As was said by my friend from Kentucky the other day, is it not clear, and such must be the effect, that to a certain extent there are powers of an Executive character which we exercise, of a legislative character, that the judges exercise, and of a judicial, that we exercise? How are we to ascertain the true boundaries upon this subject? I humbly apprehend by no other possible rule than that of plain common sense, unless we intend to embarrass ourselves at every step by technical difficulties. We are to interpret the constitution according to the sense in which it was formed by the plain men who were its authors, and put it into execution. We are to continue to carry it out as it has been executed heretofore, without a doubt expressed from any quarter sufficiently eminent to have it handed down to us. As was well said, by my friend from Delaware, Congress is charged with this special duty, of paying the debts of the United States, and is it not a strange and extraordinary interpretation to say, that Congress may not ascertain and pay the debts of the United States, without calling in the action of the Executive branch of government to assist them? That is the necessary result of his argument, when pushed to its extreme. We cannot even pay the charges against our contingent fund, without an appeal to the Executive—if the argument of the gentleman from Maryland be sound. The whole government becomes impracticable, if such be the true interpretation of the constitution.

The case put by the Senator from Maryland, about appointing a general to take charge of the army, so far from interfering with my argument, strongly confirms it. We propose to ascertain and pay a debt. That is the exercise of a function conferred upon us by the constitution. With regard to this case also, the honorable Senator entirely overlooks the fact, that although Congress has the power to declare war, and therefore as I conceive—though some gentlemen do not even admit that as an incident to the power of declaring war—the right to declare the purpose for which the war is to be waged, yet it is conceded by all, that as the President of the United States is, by the constitution of the United States, commander-in-chief of the army of the United States, the actual direction of the army must be in his hands. Therefore, if we were to undertake by law to appoint officers in his army, it would be obviously a violation of the constitution. My friend also lays down that where the power in question is purely legislative, it follows that Congress has a right to adopt just exactly the agents for its execution, that they deem most proper. Where the power is of an Executive character, the officer must be appointed by the President.

My friend from Maryland conceives that the amendment is more exceptionable than the original provision of the bill, because the latter named only one of the persons, whereas the former names all three. Now, I say on the contrary to him, that for that very reason I consider the amendment a great deal better than the bill; for what is the objection with respect to the constitutional power? Beyond all doubt, if we name one of the gentlemen, we can name the three; and, therefore, the amendment remains on the same footing as if one only were named. I had supposed that it was generally understood that the amendment would be satisfactory; not, as the Senator from Maryland supposes, that the recommitment was made because a majority of the Senate was opposed to the bill, but because some Senators were of opinion that debate and difficulty would ensue. Some debate had sprung up, and it was thought advisable to avoid the delay which discussion would occasion, and that therefore it was advisable to present an amendment which would obviate the objections that had been urged.—What does the bill propose? He says that it devolves judicial powers. What are they? Why there are certain claims, the amounts of which and the persons to whom due, are not ascertained. This bill appoints three persons, with authority to examine into these claims, and provides that upon their certificate the claims shall be paid. Now, the Senator admits that Congress has the right to prescribe rules of evidence, and this bill only provides that the certificates of these commissioners shall be evidence of the justice of these claims. He admits that there is no objection, provided they all shall undergo the supervision of Congress or heads of departments. But if Congress has the right to prescribe what shall be prima facie evidence, where is there a constitutional prohibition against their prescribing what shall be conclusive evidence? What is the course of all legisiative bodies? Some evidence they make presumptive, some prima facie, some absolutely conclusive, beyond which none of the parties can go. The very recital in the preamble of a general statute of the existence of a certain state of facts is not only high evidence, but as I conceive conclusive evidence in every court. In England, even the statement of certain facts in a proclamation issued by the sovereign, and published in the state gazette, is prima facie evidence in all courts of the existence of such facts. All governments exercise this power, and the business of no government can go on without it. What are these men to do? I am not disputing about terms, but about the substance of things. No matter whether they certify to the existence of claims upon their own knowledge, or by the knowledge of others communicated to them, their certificate is nothing but an authority to the proper paymaster or disbursing officer to pay the amount which is ascertained to be due. I have said that I do consider it highly expedient to appoint these commissioners. An unbroken course of action on the part of this government, and, if I am capable of understanding it, the solemn decision of a high tribunal shows that Congress have the power to confer upon these persons the power to discharge the duties prescnted by the bill before the Senate.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I rise, before the question is put, to make a very few remarks on the amendment of the Senator from Delaware to the amendment reported by the committee, which will, I suppose, in point of order, be put first. That amendment provides that these officers, commissioners, or whatever they may be called, shall be sworn to perform their duties faithfully; secondly, that they shall not decide upon any claims in which any of them may be interested; and thirdly, that in cases where any claim has been transferred, the assignee shall receive no further compensation than the amount which they paid for the claim with legal interest. This amendment deserves a good deal of consideration. I am struck with the use of the word "appoint" in it. It says "the persons appointed to perform these duties." If you look to the amendment reported by the committee, you will find that the use of the word "appoint" is most carefully eschewed. You cannot find that word, nor any one of tantamount meaning, in the amendment, from beginning to end. I will not say that this avoidance of the use of that term was designed, but, certainly great care seems to have been taken to avoid the use of this word. Now, without going into verbal criticism, let me ask what is the force of the word "appoint?" You do not "appoint" to an employment; that was never heard of. You "appoint" to office. It is the specific word which is always used in that connection, and, therefore, I have been struck at the occurrence of this word in the amendment of the Senator from Delaware. The human mind is a curious organ; and the force of habit will often lead to the use of terms of which the person may not be conscious. I take this to be a case of that description. The term "appoint" is legitimate in this connection, and has crept into the amendment, though carefully avoided in the original bill and amendment of the committee. Again, the amendment acknowledges that the exercise of the powers conferred upon these commissioners is liable to be very greatly abused. Without this amendment the bill would allow the commissioners to decide upon claims in which they are personally interested. It is well to guard against that. Not that I suppose that these officers would abuse the power, but there is a liability to abuse. The amendment indicates another great abuse to which there is a liability under the original bill. These claims in the wilds of California are in the hands of persons who know nothing of their value—who are conversant only with Mexican faith, which is no faith at all; and as they put very little value upon Mexican paper, they may estimate all other paper equally low, and may have passed off these claims for a bagatelle. Here is an obvious source of great abuse against which the original bill and the amendment of the committee do not make the slightest provision. But while attempting to guard against this abuse, the Senator ought to have guarded against all other abuses, and from stem to stern the whole of it is subject to abuse. What is the whole amount of this thing? You withdraw from the regular settlement to which all such claims in all other cases are subject, claims against this government to the amount of seven hundred thousand dollars, and transfer their settlement to the three individuals named in this amendment.

There is not a particle of responsibility in the whole matter.—There is nothing comes before the government but the certificate of these gentlemen. The importance of the routine of examination before all the regularly constituted officers, can only be appreciated by those who have had some practice in it. I claim the honor of instituting this process of examination, and it has saved to the government many thousands of dollars annually. When I became Secretary of War, I found all the accounts were sent up to the Treasury without passing through the War Department at all. I found there were great abuses. An act was passed, drawn up by myself, in which I inserted the provision, that all accounts should pass through the several bureaus, and if all was found to be right after examination, they should be endorsed by the heads of the bureaus, before presentation at the Treasury for payment. What was the effect of this? I found the medical department costing the government a hundred thousand dollars a year. I brought his expenditure down to twenty-five thousand. Other expenditures were subjected to the same process. The clothing accounts were reduced two-thirds—the quarter-masters' accounts one-half. The expenditures of the department were brought down from four millions to two millions one hundred thousand.

From the heads of bureaus the acounts were sent to the Auditor, an officer whose name indicates his duty; and then to the Comptroller, the highest officer of the Treasury, before they were finally paid. And you give to these gentlemen the same power that is confided to all those officers. Can this be right? None of these officers have equitable jurisdiction, yet these gentlemen are clothed by this bill with unlimited powers. All this may be very safe in the present case. That is not the question I make at all; but is it safe as a precedent? I put it solemnly to gentlemen opposite.

Mr. RUSK.—I simply wish to ask this question. If this expedition had been under the authority of the United States, and Colonel Fremont had been commanding on detached service, would it not have been competent for him to have made the requisitions, and for the quartermaster to have supplied them on the spot, and for the paymaster to have paid the amount there without going through these forms which the honorable Senator from South Carolina has been describing?

Mr. CALHOUN.—No question at all about that; but each officer would have acted, in that case, upon his individual responsibility.

Now, I put this important question: If you appoint this board of officers, where is the responsibilty? What duty is to be performed by the officer who is to pay the claims allowed by this board? No other than that which the Secretary of the Treasury would have to do in regard to accounts which had regularly passed through all the forms of examination. The certificate of the board is his warrant for paying the money, and he is relieved from all responsibility. We have had precedent after precedent quoted which are not at all analogous. A very brief view will enable us to determine as to whether the duties assigned to these men are official duties or not; whether their functions are those of officers or not; certainly they are official duties of the highest character. Is the commissary general not an officer? They perform his duty, or ought to do it. Is the Auditor not an officer? They must perform all his duties, or ought to do it. Is the Comptroller of the Treasury not an officer? They are to perform all his duties, or ought to do it. And yet performing all these duties, it is solemnly argued here, day after day, that they are not to discharge official duties, that they are not officers. If they are not, in the name of Heaven what are they? Extend this case. It is not only in California that military operations have been carried on; we have had some in New Mexico, and some further south under General Taylor; others on a larger scale under General Scott. Are you willing to adopt the same process in these cases? Who would dream of such a thing? Who would be bold enough to come here and propose that General Scott and his paymaster, and his commissary should constitute a board to adjust all the accounts, and draw, and pay away the money. Who would say that this would be a safe depository of power? Who would say, if they were authorized thus to act, that they would not be officers to all intents and purposes, such as I have described. Can any one doubt it? There may be greater reason for deviating from the ordinary process in settling these claims, but the cases are in every respect analogous, and there are a thousand cases where the difficulty would be as great as in California. Why, the whole country would be startled, amazed, at the adoption of such a course of proceeding as this.

Mr. CLAYTON.—I will briefly reply to the objections that have been raised by the Senator from South Carolina to the amendment which I have offered. His first objection is, that I have used the word "appointed" in reference to these gentlemen who are to settle these claims in California. I am entirely willing to modify the phrase, and substitute the word "designate," or "name," but the word appoint is in itself a word of the same import. I have a dictionary here of the highest authority, and I find that the first definitions of the word "appoint" are to "allot," "assign," or "designate," and as an illustration the following is given: "Aaron and his sons shall appoint every one his service." So much for that. Now for the second objection of the honorable Senator.

The Senator commenting on the report of the committee says, that under such a provision Colonel Fremont, and those associated with him, will be authorized to settle their own claims. I offered my amendment, not because I supposed that it was contemplated by the committee, that they should settle their own claims, but because the objection was raised yesterday, and it was to exclude any such inference. The committee said nothing about whether they were to settle their own claims or not, nor have I ever heard it suggested as being necessary, when a man is appointed as a judge, or to decide upon claims, that there should be an express provision accompanying the appointment, that he should decide no case of his own. Such a thing is unnecessary. Yet, I introduced this into the amendment for the purpose of excluding any possible inference that they might do so. As to the other point, it merely provides, that if any any persons speculate in these claims, they shall not speculate to the disadvantage of the government. But the gentleman leaves the amendment, and goes into a discussion of the general subject. His objection is to the payment of the claims in this way. He says they should be subjected to the ordinary forms of examination, and the number of offices through which they would necessarily pass will furnish a salutary check. It was for the very purpose of preventing the monstrous injustice that would be done to the individuals who have these claims, that the measure was introduced. Who are these claimants? They are men residing several thousand miles away—men destitute of means—and to say that they shall come here and pursue their claims is to say, that they shall never receive a dollar. The object of the measure is to afford a competent tribunal where they may be heard, and their claims adjusted. The gentleman objects, because the usual formalities will not be observed. How is it in all cases where commissioners have been appointed? Take the treaty of Paris, or the treaty respecting the Spanish claims. The certificates of the commissioners in those and all similar cases, were by law made conclusive evidence of the claims, and when presented at the department they were immediately paid. The certificates of the board of commissioners in this case will be precisely similar to those of the commissioners in the cases to which I have referred. We desire to prevent these poor men from being subjected to the necessity of travelling to Washington, or of losing their claims altogether, by paying them upon the spot where they arose.

Mr. CASS.—I desire to say one or two words in answer to the honorable Senator from South Carolina. He has foreseen a great many difficulties which are to be encountered if this measure be adopted. It will be recollected there are two principal and substantial reasons for adopting it: one is, that the claims exist in a region exceedingly remote, and it is utterly impossible for these persons to come here and settle their accounts. If you require them to do so, it amounts to a refusal of justice. To compel them to go through the ordinary course of application and the usual form of authentication of their claims, you defeat the very object you have in view. The second reason is, as the honorable Senator from North Carolina has said, you take upon yourselves the advantages of the conquest, and you are morally bound under such circumstances to pay the claims. If we had pursued the ordinary course, we should have done what? We should have sent disbursing officers to California, with funds to meet the requisitions of the quartermaster in obedience to the orders of the commanding officer. Let me say to the Senator from South Carolina that these accounts will go through the departments, and there will be precisely the checks which he desires. What testimony is required in the case of the disbursements made for the army under General Scott? Nothing but the requisitions of the commanding general and the receipts of the parties. The honorable Senator wishes to have an investigation as to the justice or proper rate of charges. I believe that is a thing unheard of. The money is paid on the requisition of the commanding officer. If fraud appears to have been practised—if any thing appear which excites suspicion, the necessary information is required to be produced before the accounts are permitted to be paid. But if you require the administrative officers to judge of the propriety of the expenses authorized by Gen. Scott, how are you to get your money back again? All the guaranty you have is the character and position of your officers, and that you have got here; and, as I said, if you pursued the ordinary course you would have the certificate of the commanding general, and you will have more than that in this case, you have the guarantee of the three gentlemen who compose the board. Now, I do not know what the gentleman means when he talks about being interested. Have you any law making it felony or a crime at all to be interested. I do not know why fraud is to be presumed in such a case as this more than in any other. Fraud may be practised in California, and it may be practised in Mexico, and, if it appear, the matter will be investigated, and the payment checked.

The honorable Senator alluded to the fact, that the certificates might get into other hands. So they may. Every man knows that on the frontier when a quartermaster gives a certificate, and it goes out into the neighborhood, it is generally circulated at a depreciation; indeed, I have known them sacrificed at one quarter their value. It is not peculiar to these claims, but incident to all, when the government is not ready to make payment. I repeat, sir, if you subject these claimants to the necessity of coming here to recover their claims, you put it altogether out of their power to receive payment.

Mr. CALHOUN.—No one supposes that these claimants are to come here to recover their claims. The question is first, by whom will you allow them to be investigated and paid, by persons appointed by yourselves, and wholly irresponsible, or by persons appointed in conformity with the requisitions of the constitution? The next question is, will you have them settled by the very men who incurred the expenses? There being a necessity for knowledge in regard to the claims, I should think it very desirable to appoint some officer who served in California to be a member of the board. My opinion is, that the true way is to send a quartermaster and commissary there, and if necessary, to add a third person. Take any officer. I have no objection that it should be Colonel Fremont. He gave the orders, and very properly. I have no doubt; those orders must be presented to the commissary, and be fortified by his endorsement.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi.—In the progress of this discussion allusions which I consider equally unjust as unkind, have been made in relation to the conduct of the committee by whom this bill and amendment were reported. It was within the knowledge of the committee that indeterminate claims against our government for supplies furnished to the battalion of Colonel Fremont, existed in California, and that the failure to make payment in these cases had produced a dissatisfaction which could not be otherwise than dangerous to whatever interests we may have in that remote country. To silence complaint, to appease discontent, and to secure our government against fraud, and the future annoyance of manufactured claims, the plan which the committee have adopted was presented to the Senate. It approximates as nearly as the present state of the case will allow the established usage, and the bill as amended seemed to us beyond the reach of constitutional objection. It has been said that the word "appoint" was carefully avoided. Sir, the purpose of appointing officers was not entertained; and it, therefore, required little care to avoid the use of any word which would convey such an idea. Claims which could not be settled by the accounting officers of our government were presented to our consideration. We believed them to constitute a just demand against us, and a bill was introduced to legalize them. The first and controlling question is, will Congress declare them to be valid, if this be decided in the affirmative. Payment must be ordered as a consequence. and there remains but the minor consideration, the manner of discharging the admitted obligation. A portion of the debt is established by regular vouchers, which it is ordered shall be paid as ascertained claims. If Congress receive the testimony to these cases as sufficient, and order payment thereon, have we not the same right to specify how the validity shall be determined of those which are denominated unascertained claims? Surely the decision can be made by us as to what testimony shall be deemed sufficient to establish whether a claim be a debt of this government or not. Otherwise it would be idle for us to entertain any proposition to examine a claim presented to our consideration.

The Senator from South Carolina treats this as an ordinary case of army disbursement, and seems to me to confound the rights of those who furnish supplies to our troops with the accounts of the disbursing officers of the army. It is the latter which are adjusted, as he states, in the auditing offices here. The payment for the supplies furnished to our army is ordinarily made in the field by the appropriate officers, and first heard of here through the accounts of those by whom the disbursements were made. If the commissary and quartermaster, and paymaster, to this battalion in California had been supplied with funds these claims would have been paid as they arose. The whole case was an irregular one, and if deemed worthy, requires an unusual course in relation to it. Hence the proposition for special legislation. The officers named in the bill were those under whose orders, or by whom the debts were contracted; they have ceased to be officers, and it is proposed to revive their functions so far as may be necessary to complete their vouchers, and to determine how far by their former official acts, they have rendered their government responsible. It is not only true that they are best qualified to do justice between the parties, but is further true that they alone can give to these claims the form which will admit of their being finally audited by the United States Treasury.

The commanding and purchasing officers of the California battalion, and they only can reduce these claims to the established forms, and give to them their appropriate character. But those who held such positions in this case, are no longer in the service, to give force to their acts, it is necessary by law to revive the functions of their expired offices. This it is proposed to do to the extent required, for the purpose declared, and no further. Those who deny the justice of these claims, those who refuse to acknowledge the responsibility of our government for the debts contracted by the persons named in the bill, when they were officers of the California battalion, may properly object to the extension of these ex-officers, to the end that they may perfect their accounts; but such as admit our obligation to pay for the purchases they made for the use of that battalion, are, I think, constrained to grant to them such powers as will enable the government justly to discharge its obligation to its creditors. The connexion of the persons named in the bill with the transactions out of which the claims arose, instead of being an objection, as has been assumed, constitutes the only sufficient reason for having named them. Such is the connexion which all commanding and disbursing officers necessarily have to army expenditures and purchases. Had the campaign been regularly ordered and supplied, these persons would, in their official character, have made purchases and payments upon just such accounts as it is now proposed to authorize them to prepare. That payment may be made by an officer of the government, who is to be provided with funds for that purpose. The supposition that the check imposed by the auditors in other cases is to be here dispensed with, is entirely erroneous. A power is given to the persons named in the bill, which will enable them to perfect their accounts, but as they have ceased to be officers, it is not proposed to entrust them with funds for payment. If the President shall choose to avail himself of the means provided in this bill, he will give his instructions, and it is fair to suppose that they will require all accounts to be as fully vouched as they would have been had payment been made by these persons when they were officers. The disbursing officer who may be sent out will, of course, only make payment upon fully authenticated vouchers, and his accounts will be subject to the same revision here, as would have been made had the claims been paid originally. The amount, though certainly important, is small, compared to the disbursements which have, in the progress of this war, been made by individual Quartermasters. The paying officer in this case, will give to the government the same assurance of integrity and accuracy which is possessed in other cases, where officers are entrusted with sums vastly disproportionate to their bond. The good faith which has heretofore been kept in our army disbursements does not warrant apprehension upon the present occasion.

To maintain the credit of the government so as to exclude distrust from entering into the calculations of those who sell to our officers, is an obligation which it requires no argument to enforce, but more than usual care is demanded, when, as in this instance, our dealing has been with those who have the best means to know our intentions, and who may be supposed most ready to suspect our integrity. Nor should time be allowed to accumulate, and the value of the claims to depreciate, in the hands of original holders, or be transferred to others who seek to speculate on the fears or necessities of those who have become creditors of the government. At the present session of Congress the committees of both houses have reported upon a case of deferred payment of a claim growing out of supplies furnished to our troops in Florida, that a decision which placed the rights of the claimant under the rules applicable to a disbursing officer was not reputable to our government. Disreputable, and truly unfortunate will it be, sir, when those who supply our army with food, or clothing, or transportation, shall be required to wait until the purchasing officer shall have submitted his accounts to the scrutiny of the auditing officers of his government, with hopes and fears dependent upon the decision, but with the certainty, if it be adverse, that his property is gone, and that no redress is left to him.

The question which contains all others is, will you legalize the "California claims?" If so, then the direct and just mode is to send those in whose official action these claims originated, to collect the vouchers, and perfect their accounts, to the end that prompt payment may be made.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—The amendment of the Senator from Delaware asserts a rule which I should be sorry to see carried into effect in relation to any claim whatever. I have heard a great deal about speculations, and no doubt there is a great deal of speculation carried on, but it appears to me that the mode proposed to suppress speculating is a most shocking one to be adopted by the government. What is it? A B has a claim—C D buys it—and the government puts the profits of the transaction when they pay C D into their own pockets. I can well understand that there must be great depreciation in the value of claims. Already a year or two have elapsed since the claims accrued, and there is no certainty now that this bill will pass. Who, then, supposes that a purchaser would give the full amount? And if he do not, are we to punish him as if he had committed a crime? There would be some more justice in this if the motion I am about to make should prevail. It is to strike out that part of the amendment of the Senator from Delaware which relates to the purchasers of claims, or else to add to it these words: "but the residue shall be paid to the original claimant." I do not see any right on the part of this government to set itself up as a legal tribunal to try the rights of the original claimant and his assignee. I do not see any propriety in the government meddling in these accounts. If the government owes a hundred dollars, let them pay it honestly, and if there is any difficulty between the claimants, let them settle it between themselves. I have no idea of the government mixing itself up in such matters. I will ask for a division of the subject; for I cannot vote for this bill if it contain such a provision as this. I have seen the principle attempted to be carried out arbitrarily by the accounting officers of the government in former times, who set themselves to decide questions between the assignees and the original holders of claims.

Mr. CLAYTON.—The object of that part of the amendment was to prevent imposition upon the government by speculators, and I consider it desirable that some such provision should exist. With regard to the suggestion made by the Senator from Florida, that the amount of discount from the claim which the speculator has possessed, shall be paid to the original holders, I have not the slightest objection to it. I am quite willing that the government shall be held responsible for the whole amount, but I do not wish that the speculator should receive that for which he has not paid value.

Mr. FOOTE.—There is a matter which requires our attention in Executive session, and as I see no probability of taking the vote upon this bill to night, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Executive business.

Mr. CAMERON.—I hope the honorable Senator will withdraw that motion, and allow the question to be taken upon the bill. I shall be compelled to leave the city in the morning, and I am anxious to give my vote upon the bill.

Mr. FOOTE.—With the understanding that the vote be taken, will withdraw the motion for the present.

Mr. MANGUM.—I move that the Senate adjourn.

SEVERAL SENATORS.—Oh, no, proceed with the bill.

Mr. MANGUM.—I withdraw the motion.

Mr. FOOTE.—I hope my motion for an Executive session will now be entertained, and for that purpose I move that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. MASON.—Let the vote be taken on that motion as a test, whether we will vote upon the bill.

The question being taken on the postponement, it was not agreed to.

Mr. CLAYTON modified his amendment by adding the words suggested by the Senator from Florida.

The question being about to put on agreeing to the amendment offered by Mr. CLAYTON, the amendment was read.

Mr. UNDERWOOD.—I voted to lay this bill over until to-morrow, hoping that the Senate would reflect upon the subject. What right have we to interfere with contracts between individuals? It is a subject of legitimate contract.

Mr. RUSK.—They are not legal obligations, consequently they are not the subject matter of bargain and sale. We make them legal by this bill, and in legalizing them we have a right to control them.

Mr. UNDERWOOD.—Equitable claims are the subjects of sale.

Mr. CLAYTON.—The claim is good for nothing in the hands of the speculator, until we make it good for something. We by this bill, make it good to the full amount paid by the speculator, and I am willing to go no further in his favor, but I am willing to give to the original holder the whole. Thus the government will make nothing out of it, but the original claimant will be protected.

Mr. UNDERWOOD.—I desire to make another remark or two, because I look upon this matter as one of some consequence. The suggestion I made, is attempted to be obviated by the Senator from Delaware, by saying that there is claim legal or equitable.

Mr. CLAYTON.—I do not say they are not equitable.

Mr. UNDERWOOD.—If equitable, then they are the subject of contract between man and man; and if they be the subject of contract, there may be contracts already made, and this government is attempting to annul them, and set aside those contracts. That is the effect of it. If that be no claim at all either of a legal or equitable character, then there is no utility in your enactment. I deny that you have a right to do any thing of the kind. In any point of view, what position do you occupy? You say that valuable services have been rendered to the country; that the people of California have rendered services of which you are deriving the benefit, and while you acknowledge this, you say there is no right legal or equitable, which can be the subject of contract.

But how will this operate in another point of view? Suppose I have one of these claims and sell it for one half of its amount, according to this amendment, one-half will come to me, when the final settlement is made by the government. If the purchaser then comes to me and says, I purchased this claim of you, and paid your price for it, what would I, as an honest man be bound to do under these circumstances? Why, most undoubtedly, to hand him the whole of the money. It was a fair legal transaction, the money was advanced by the purchaser, and received by me. I should be only fulfilling an obligation, which honor and conscience would render imperative, by paying over to him the money. This is what would be done by those who are honest, whilst the dishonest, considering themselves absolved by the act of Congress from the obligation to refund the money, would refuse to do so. Now I am not willing by the adoption of this amendment to sanction any of those principles, and I hope the bill will be postponed, and that the Senate will reflect more maturely upon the matter.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, called for a division of the amendment.

The question was then taken upon the first clause of Mr. CLAYTON's amendment, (as modified,) to the amendment reported from the Committee on Military Affairs; and it was agreed to. It is as follows:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the persons hereby designated to examine the said claims, shall, before they enter on the duties assigned to them, be first duly sworn or affirmed to faithfully perform the duties devolved on them by this act; and that either one of them, or either of them, examine or allow any claim or which he or one of them is personally to receive any part.

The question was then taken upon the remaining clause of Mr. CLAYTON's amendment, as modified, which is as follows:

And in all cases where any claim has been assigned or transferred by the original claimant, the assignee shall be allowed no more than he paid for the claim and the residue of the claim shall be paid to the original claimant.

And it was determined in the negative.

The question was then taken on the amendment of Mr. MASON, and it was determined in the negative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bagby, Butler, Calhoun, Foote, Johnson, of Maryland, Johnson of Georgia, Mangum, Mason, Moor, Niles, Turney, Underwood and Yulee —13.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Atchison, Badger, Benton, Breese, Bright, Cameron, Cass, Clarke, Clayton, Davis, of Mississippi, Douglas, Felch, Hannegan, Houston, Johnson, of Lousiana, Rusk, Sprunce, Sturgeon, and Westcott.—30.

The amendment reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, as amended, was then agreed to.

No further amendment being made, the bill was reported to the Senate, and the amendment concurred in.

Ordered, That it be engrossed and read a third time.

The said bill was then read a third time, by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That this bill pass, and that the title thereof be as aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives in this bill.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. FOOTE, the Senate procedeed to the consideration of Executive business, and after a short time spent therein,

The Senate adjourned

SATURDAY, APRIL 29, 1848.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The following message was received from the President of the United States by Mr. WALKER, his Secretary:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States.

I submit for the consideration of Congress a communication received at the Department of State, from Mr. Justo Sierra, containing copies of two letters, and also a communication from the Governor of that State, representing the condition of the extreme suffering to which that country has been reduced by the insurrection of the Indians within its limits, and soliciting the aid of the United States.

These communications present a case of intense suffering and misery which cannot fail to excite the sympathies of the human heart. From these and other sources of information, it appears that the Indians of Yucatan are waging a war of extermination against the white race. In the early part, thousands in cold blood, age and sex, but not to death, no circumstances, all who fell within their power. The inhabitants, gone stricken and destitute of arms, are flying across the extensive peninsula towards the coast; and their expulsion from their country, or their extermination, would seem to be inevitable, unless they can obtain some immediate assistance.

In this condition they have, through their constituted authorities, implored the aid of the government to save their lives from destruction, offering, as one that should be granted, to transfer "the dominion and sovereignty of the Peninsula" to the United States. Similar appeals for aid and protection have been made to the "Spanish and the English governments."

Whilst it is not my purpose to recommend the adoption of any measure with a view to the acquisition of the "dominion and sovereignty" over Yucatan, yet, according to our established policy, we could not consent to a transfer of this "dominion and sovereignty," either to Spain, Great Britain, or any other European power. In the language of President Monroe, in his message of December, 1823, "we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety." In my annual message of December, 1845, I declared that "near a quarter of a century ago, the principle was distinctly announced to the world, in the annual message of one of my predecessors, that the American continents, by the free and independent condition which they have assumed and maintained, are henceforth not to be considered as subjects for future colonization by any European power." This principle will apply with greatly increased force, should any European power attempt to establish any new colony in North America. In the existing circumstances of the world, the present is deemed a proper occasion to reiterate and reaffirm the principle avowed by Mr. Monroe, and to state my cordial concurrence in its wisdom and sound policy. The reassertion of this principle, especially in reference to North America, is at this day but the promulgation of a policy which no European power should cherish the disposition to resist. Existing rights of every European nation should be respected, but at the same time our safety and our interests, that the efficient protection of our laws should be extended over our whole territorial limits, and that it should be distinctly announced to the world as our settled policy, that no future European colony or dominion shall, with our consent, be planted or established on any part of the North American continent.

Our own security requires that the established policy thus announced should guide our conduct, and this applies with great force to the peninsula of Yucatan. It is situate in the Gulf of Mexico, on the North American continent; and from its vicinity to Cuba, to the Capes of Florida, to New Orleans, and indeed to our whole southwestern coast, it would be dangerous to our peace and security if it should become a colony of any European nation.

We have now authentic information that, if the aid from the United States be not granted, such aid will probably be obtained from some European power, which may hereafter assert a claim to "dominion and sovereignty" over Yucatan.

Our existing relations with Yucatan are of a peculiar character, as will be perceived from the note of the Secretary of State to their commissioner, dated on the 24th of December last; a copy of which is herewith transmitted. Yucatan has never declared her independence, and we treated her as a State of the Mexican republic. For this reason, we have never officially received her commissioner, although this is the case, we have, to a considerable extent, recognized her as a neutral in our war with Mexico. Whilst still considering Yucatan as a portion of Mexico, if we had troops to spare for this purpose, I would deem it proper, during the existing war with Mexico, to occupy and hold military possession of her territory, and to defend the white inhabitants against the incursions of the Indians, in the same way that we have employed our troops in other States of the Mexican republic in our possession, in repelling the attacks of savages upon the inhabitants who have maintained their neutrality in the war.

But, unfortunately, we cannot at the present, without serious danger, withdraw our forces from other portions of the Mexican territory now in our occupation, and send them to Yucatan. All that can be done, under existing circumstances, is to employ our naval forces in the Gulf, not required at other points, for their relief. But it is not to be expected that any adequate protection can thus be afforded, as the operations of such naval forces must, of necessity, be confined to the coast.

I have considered it proper to communicate the information contained in the accompanying correspondence, and I submit to the wisdom of Congress to adopt such measures as, in their judgment, may be expedient to prevent Yucatan from becoming a colony of any European power, which in no event could be permitted by the United States; and at the same time to preserve her white race from extermination or expulsion from their country.

JAMES K. POLK.

Washington, April 29, 1848.

The message having been read,

Mr. HANNEGAN moved that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and be printed.

Mr. CALHOUN.—Before that question is put, I rise to express my regret that the President should place this recommendation on any other ground than that of humanity. If I heard the message aright, he asserts the principle as deduced from Mr. Monroe's declaration, that when the people of any portion of this continent is placed in the condition in which Yucatan is, and either party should be compelled to apply to us for protection, we should interpose and protect them, to prevent the interference of England, or some other foreign power. A broad and dangerous principle, truly! It goes far beyond Mr. Monroe's declaration. It is difficult to say what limits can be fixed to it, or to what it would carry us, if reduced to practice. I take this early opportunity—for experience has brought me to strike at once on the introduction of an objectionable measure—to express my surprise and regret, that the President should seize such an occasion as this to recommend the occupation of Yucatan by our army, or a portion of it, if it could be spared, from Mexico. It is startling. Who can tell to what it would lead; and where it would end? How strange to recommend it at such a time, on the ground, if we did not occupy it some other power might! In the present condition of Europe, there is no more probability that England, or any other power there, would seize on Yucatan, than that I, as an individual, would. Who can suppose, engroped as she is, and all other powers in that quarter of the globe are, with questions connected with their existence, that they could, for a moment, entertain an idea of the kind? England has enough to attend to at home. Who can tell what may be her condition? The supposition of the possibility of such a step on her part, seems to me strange and unaccountable. I did hope that the experience of the Mexican war—that precipitate and rash measure, which has cost the country so dearly in blood and treasure, would have taught the administration moderation and caution, and induced them to shun any course of policy calculated to plunge the country in a similar cost and sacrifices. Who can form an estimate of the expenditure, the sacrifice of life, and the difficulties, to which the adoption of the President's recommendation in this case would lead? The condition of Europe ought to admonish us against taking it.

What are the causes which have lead to its present upheaving, and the reeling to and fro of all her governments? What are those which are assigned for the overthrow of the French monarchy, and the danger that threatens the British with the same fate? Among the prominent is the heavy burden imposed on the people, which has crushed them to the earth, and which has been continually increasing. It is charged, that the onerous burden imposed on the people of France by the mighty wars of Napoleon, instead of being diminished, were actually increased, under the government of its late monarch, and that those imposed on the people of England to resist his gigantic power, are as great as they were at the end of the mighty contest between the two powers, allowance being made for the depreciation of the currency. Are we not fairly liable to the same charge? Has their been any alleviation of the burden imposed on our people by the payment of the debts of the revolution, or the war of 1812? Are our expenses less than they were in the war of 1812, allowing for the depreciation of the currency during that conflict? Those who have not attended to the subject would be surprised, on comparing the expenses of the government now, with what it was during Mr. Monroe's administration. It terminated in 1825, twenty-three years ago. The average expenditure of this administration did not exceed $10,000,000 annually, deducting the payment of the principal and interest of the public debt. It is difficult to say what it is now; it will probably be not less than $30,000,000. It is true, our population has increased, but it has probably not more than doubled, while our expenses has increased three-fold. And yet, heedless of consequences, it is proposed to adopt a course of policy before we have extricated ourselves from the burden and losses of the Mexican war, which may lead to expenses and sacrifices of which no one can form even a conjecture. I am willing, on the score of humanity, to go as far as we can with safety and propriety, in this case. How far that is, I am not prepared to say; but I cannot possibly support the course of policy recommended by the President, as I understand the message. I am not certain as to what he intends, but be it such as I suppose, or not, I cannot but regret that he should mix up what ought to be an appeal purely to our humanity, with the considerations he has. The case of Yucatan is indeed an awful one. In the midst of our sympathy we may derive instructions from it. The people of Yucatan, after they threw off the Spanish yoke, acting on the idea that all men are qualified to enjoy the blessing of liberty, and ought of right possess it, liberated the large mass of their population, consisting of aborigines in a state of ignorance and subjection, and raised them to a level with themselves, by making them citizens. The result is such as we this day witness. They were too ignorant to appreciate liberty, or exercise the rights it conferred; and instead of gratitude, they have turned round and murdered those who conferred it on them, and laid waste and devastated the country. Such are the fruits of a misguarded, misjudging philanthropy, combined with erroneous political notions, which is so prevalent at the present time, in more enlightened and civilized countries, but which whenever reduced to practice must lead to disastrous consequences.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—I cannot but think that the honorable Senator from South Carolina has misconceived to a very great extent the reasons assigned by the President for making the recommendation which he has made. I am inclined to think the Senator must have mistaken the nature of the message, and I would now proceed to set him right upon the subject, but for a reason which I suppose is known to every Senator, on account of which I intend to move an adjournment. It is out of respect to a member of this body, who is at this moment in the agonies of death. I dislike that the discussion should be proceeded with at such a time; and I, therefore, move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. FOOTE.—I hope the honorable Senator will withdraw his motion for a moment, in order that I may make a suggestion in reference to what has been said by the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—If the debate be allowed to proceed, it will occupy the whole day.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts.—Will the gentleman allow the question to be taken on a motion to print, before he moves an adjournment?

Mr. HANNEGAN.—Certainly.

Mr. FOOTE.—I rise for the purpose of urging on the honorable Senator from Indiana, whose official station as chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, seems to indicate the peculiar propriety of a suitable response to what has fallen from the honorable Senator from South Carolina, being offered by him. The unhappy condition of one our most worthy associates in this body, so pathetically alluded to by the Senator from Indiana, might well prevent a long debate at the present moment. But yielding to none in sympathy for my suffering friend, and his distressed family, I feel bound to insist that at least a few remarks should be made by some Senator in defence of the Executive message so pointedly and as I think, unjustly assailed, by the Senator from South Carolina. The speech of the Senator from South Carolina going out without any reply is well calculated to engender prejudice and diffuse error, as I am sure, in relation to a great question, involving most deeply the honor and welfare of the republic, and which, in several of its bearings, is one of peculiar delicacy in the present condition of our country and the civilized world. I hope the honorable Senator from Indiana will consent to say something at once in defence of the message; if he will not, as he seems unwilling to do, I feel bound to say, before I yield the floor, what I am convinced will be justified by the reading of the document in question, when it shall have been examined, that it has been most surprisingly misunderstood by the Senator from South Carolina, who, "taking the question at the first pop," as he styles it, has entirely failed to interpret the language of the message with even an approximation to his usual accuracy in such matters. I have read the message, at the clerk's table, and feel authorized to insist that had the distinguished Senator from South Carolina done himself and the country the justice to examine it before he indulged the harsh strictures to which we have listened, he never would have uttered two-thirds of what we have heard from him on the present occasion. I solemnly invoke a complete suspension of the public judgment in regard to the message until it shall have been printed and dispassionately examined.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—I feel as much anxiety to reply to what has fallen to the Senator from South Carolina, as the Senator from Mississippi can do, but from the fact I have stated, I feel a disinclination to do so at present.

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, MAY 1, 1848.

DEATH OF MR. ASHLEY.

The journal having been read, Mr. BORLAND rose and said:

Mr. President: My official introduction into this chamber has been marked with calamity, and overcast with gloom. The first of its public duties that has devolved upon me is of deep solemnity, and its performance is undertaken with feelings of oppressive sadness.

Just one week ago, a venerable form—in the fullness of life, and the seeming vigor of perfect health—rose in his place, and, in a voice well known and respected here, announced my position in this assembly. That form will not rise again in this presence: for it now lies lifeless and cold as a clod of the valley. That voice will be heard no more within these walls; for it is hushed in death. In return for the kind courtesy of presenting me, as his colleague, to this company of honorable Senators, I pay but the poor and painful tribute of making known his final separation. The last act of his public life was my introduction: the first of mine must be his obituary.

CHESTER ASHLEY, a Senator from the State of Arkansas, is no more. He breathed his last, at his lodgings in this city, on Saturday last, the 29th of April, at fifteen minutes before 2 o'clock, in the afternoon. On Sunday of last week, he felicitated himself upon the perfection of his health. Soon after breakfast, the next morning, he complained of slight indisposition; but so slight as hardly to command a second thought. At the usual hour he proceeded to his place in this chamber. When the journal had been read, he did me the favor to present my credentials, as his colleague. A few minutes after his indisposition increased; he had the sensation of chilliness, and leaving the capitol, returned to his lodgings. That evening I found him deeply jaundiced, and in the delirium of fever. This latter symptom had usually marked even his slightest indisposition—as is very common with individuals of large brain and sanguine temperament. His family, however, thought him not seriously ill—certainly not in danger. But on Thursday morning he had grown evidently worse, and a distinguished physician of the city was called to see him. His condition was found to be such, even then, as to afford little hope of his recovery. Another eminent practitioner was consulted, and the same opinion given.

On Friday morning I was invited to make a third party in the professional consultation. But there was no ground for hope. An intense and extensive inflammation had seized upon the bowels, and, in my opinion, upon the liver also; and was of that type, occasionally encountered, which, setting at naught the highest science and the best directed efforts of human skill, run, almost from the very outset, steadily and rapidly into a fatal termination. I had seen similar cases before; and I am particularly reminded by it of that of the late Senator Fulton, who was, alike in station, in disease, and in death, the predecessor of him whose loss we now deplore.

Colonel ASHLEY was a native of New England. He was born at Westfield, in Massachusetts, on the 1st day of June, 1790; and, consequently, at the time of his death, was in the fifty-eighth year of his age. When an infant of only three months, he was carried by his parents, who removed thither to the town of Hudson, in New York. He grew up, engaged in the practice of the law, and resided there about twenty-seven years; then migrated to Illinois, where he remained about two years; and subsequently visiting the territory, of what is now the State of Arkansas, in 1819, determined to make his residence at Little Rock. Here he soon fastened on the southern bank, some three hundred miles above the mouth of the Arkansas river. Soon afterwards he married in Missouri, and removed, with his young family, to his home in the wilderness.

At that period, a settlement in what was truly "the far west," was no trivial undertaking. It required a high degree of enterprise to encounter the privations, hardships, and perils of frontier life—now so much talked about, but then actually endured. An uncommon share of mental forecast would alone suffice to ascertain a point so wide a range, which must become the centre of important operations, from which settlement and civilization must radiate, and then throw back an accumulated interest. A firmness, fixedness, singleness of purpose, true to its object as the needle to the pole, was alone capable of abiding the full development of the little cloud of improvement, then no bigger than a man's hand, which was, within a quarter of a century, to cover with its golden drapery the whole horizon. Yet many a New England boy—many a stripping, from anywhere this side the mountains, impelled by the irrepressible spirit of progress, guided by a judgment so clear in its perceptions, and so rapid in its combinations, as to seem intuitive, and sustained by a will as potent as as the lever of Archimedes, has exhibited all the high qualities I have mentioned; and that, too, in the construction of imperishable monuments—not monuments like the towering pyramids of Egypt, barren of utility as the wastes of sand they overlook—nor like the huge walls of the Roman colliseum, within which human beings were wont to be degraded to the cruel level of wild beasts; but of monuments of a purer order, of a loftier structure, of more comprehensive proportions—dedicated to the higher sentiments of the human heart, and adapted to the true wants of human society—monuments made up of the wilderness reclaimed and converted into cultivated fields; of the towns, with their bristling spires, which crowd our thoroughfares; of the teeming commerce of our "inland seas;" and, above all, of the millions of freemen who sleep securely under their own roof trees, and stand in conscious sovereignty upon the fertile soil of their own broad acres. In a word—the noble aggregate of these monuments is before the world, in the peerless prosperity of "the great west." I have selected the New England boy, the cis-montane stripling, as the type of a class. And of that class, it would be difficult to find a more characteristic representative than the individual of whom I am here to speak, whether we regard the vigor, the perseverance, or the success of his exertions.

At the age of 29 years, without patrimony, without resources of any kind, except those he possessed in his acute and comprehensive intellect, his high purpose, and indomitable will, but recently married to a woman of congenial spirit, he landed at Little Rock, and entered upon the practice of the law, which was necessarily restricted then, and for several years afterwards, almost exclusively to cases before the territorial courts involving the titles to land, and personal violence among a border population. In attending to these cases, of which, on account of his high intelligence and untiring industry, he soon obtained a large proportion, he was frequently required to traverse, as his circuit, the whole country which now forms the State of Arkansas, and portions of that included in Missouri. Even for one who participated in them, it would be difficult to depict the scenes incident to professional life, in times and under circumstances when the law was administered almost without books—the courts often held in the open air—the leathern thong serving the place of prison walls, and the ready ride that of the jolly sheriff. Then the land had no roads—the streams no bridges—the country, for many miles between certain points of settlement, was unmarked by human habitations. Through all this, the course of the young lawyer was onward and upward—undismayed, unchecked by difficulties, which seemed, indeed, but to excite to still greater activity the strong energies of his nature. Storing his mind from books whenever the means were within his reach, he was ever improving his powers by those exercises among men, and in the practical affairs of life, which qualify the man of business to be useful to his fellows, while giving due attention to his own interests. But it is not necessary that I should follow up in detail the steps of him I would represent. It is of results, and not the particular means of their accomplishment, I have to speak. And if the results attained by my deceased colleague may be the measure of his worth, then in the successful his exertions, he has established a reputation for wisdom and sagacity which might satisfy the ambition of any man. Devoting himself assiduously to the business of his profession, he suffered not the contagious example of political aspiring to lure him from the high and holy purpose of making provision for the wants and comforts of the interesting family he was gathering around him. Until the frosts of more than fifty winters had bleached his locks, we find him in the walks of private life, with unflagging industry and unabating vigor raising upon the foundations he had already laid the superstructure of affluence for his children. He was at length successful; and as if Providence—ever propitious to those who are laborious in useful pursuits—had been watching his career, so soon as he had completed the provision for his own household, a station of high public trust—the station he held in this chamber—was presented to his acceptance. Although he had long enjoyed a high character for ability, and ever felt a deep interest in the public welfare, it was not until the month of April, 1844, that he entered actively into the political movements of the country. At that time a warm party contest was commencing, and his talents were called into the service upon the democratic electoral ticket of Arkansas. Well and nobly did he justify the confidence and fulfil the expectations which had induced his selection. With an activity rarely witnessed in one of his years, he traversed the whole State, through the heats and rains of summer; with zeal and power he advocated the principles, and urged upon the people the measures of his political faith; and while all confessed his fidelity and efficiency in the cause he espoused, even those who most suffered from the blows he dealt so fast and forcibly, were the last to be offended at the manner of their infliction. He accomplished one achievement in that canvass, which stands unparalleled, I apprehend, in the annals of political controversy. He actually converted from the "error of his ways" one of the electors on the opposing party ticket—caused him to withdraw from the contest—and enjoyed the satisfaction of knowing that, in the autumn election, he voted for the democratic electors. From this, some idea may be formed of the character of his services. Ex pede Herculem! In the month of August of that year, the excellent, the estimable Fulton died. Almost all eyes were at once turned to the accomplished elector as his successor. So, when the General Assembly of the State convened in November, the popular expectation was realized, and Col. ASHLEY was elected to a seat in this body to fill the unexpired term, without any regular opposition, and by an almost unanimous vote. In 1836 he was re-elected to the same high station for six years from the 4th day of last March. From these demonstrations, an estimate may be formed of the place he occupied in the hearts of his people—of the standing he had at home—in the territory of which he had been among the earliest pioneers—in the State he had helped to found, and with whose growth he had grown, and with whose strength he had strengthened. Of his standing and his reputation here, I am not competent to speak from personal observation. To those whom I address, he was better known. But if I may judge from the distinguished position you assigned him, even as a new member in the business of this body, it is certain that he fully sustained the reputation for ability with which he came here. And from those indications which never deceive, for they are of the heart, so abundantly furnished by the anxious throng of his brother Senators about his death-bed—by the quivering lips and tearful eyes of hosts of friends—by the touching solemnity of this chamber—I gather testimonials to his heart's goodness; laurels for the crown of his private worth, of far more real value than those which may be commanded by the brightest corruscations of mere intellect—far more enduring than "the bubble reputation" snatched from the cannon's mouth.

If to be great, a man must perform with ability his public trusts; so, to be good, he must sustain worthily his private relations. In my opinion, no man can be wholly unhappy who is surrounded with an amiable family; nor can he be otherwise than good, if he devote himself with fidelity to the happiness of that family. I am aware, sir, that I am approaching a sacred subject—fitter for discussion in narrower and less public walls than these. But I merely allude to it in illustration of the finest feature in the human character—I mean domestic affection—a feature strikingly predominant in the otherwise strongly marked character of my deceased colleague. Many who now hear me have noticed and admired, as all must respect, this endearing characteristic. It distinguished him at home, wherever he was known. But if he loved his family, he was loved by them in return. If his investment of the heart's best treasures in this noblest of institutions, sanctioned of Heaven and known among men, was munificent, he was not without reward—well and punctually was he repaid with usury. Even had business disappointed, or ambition failed him, he had this rich and efficient wresource, which no power on earth could destroy. The tide of domestic affection and happiness at home, like the fabled Pactolus, rolled its golden sands, in attractive beauty and unfailing abundance, along his pathway of life.

But, sir, if the strong cords of pious sympathy, which bind the members of a family together, confer the truest happiness upon those within the charmed circle—the severance, and, above all, the sudden and unexpected severance of those cords, is productive of the hardest agony the heart can know. That this is so, I have but to refer to that scene which I have but recently left. But who shall describe that? Surely I shall not attempt it. Sir, though I am, comparatively, but a young man, my pursuits in life, and my own sad experience, have made me familiar with scenes of suffering—too often of death. As a duty, I have trained myself to look upon the sufferings, even the dissolution of my own sex, not with coldness of heart, I trust, but with some degree of composure. But the sight of a woman's sorrows—and of sorrows such as I have had to witness within the last few days—has, I confess, unmanned me—has made me a very child in feeling; and in those manifestations I have seen the strong man, full of life, and hope, suddenly cut down—not afraid to die, but unwilling to leave those he loved so tenderly. His agony was touching. I bowed my heart in humility before that Power who has created, and who may destroy all things, while I confess the emptiness of earth and the fleeting vanity of all human pursuits. But, sir, it was the heart-breaking of that noble and devoted wife, who, for more than a quarter of a century, had spread the balm of her affection about his heart, and smiled away his cares, while she leaned upon him for that support and protection which was never withheld—it was the utter prostration of that lovely daughter, who, like an angel of grace, hung about his pillow, endeavoring to repay his early and never failing care, with those offices of affection which the heart of woman alone knows when to offer, as her hand alone can apply:—it was these things, sir, which overeame me—under these my heart has sunk. From the scene of these occurrences, I have come here to speak of their subject. No wonder, then, I am unable to do him justice; no wonder that language fails to do the bidding of my own full heart, and falls far short of your desires.

But, sir, gloomy as the picture we contemplate undoubtedly is, it is not entirely without relief. Deep as its shades confessedly are, the light is not wholly excluded. Our friend has died, and his loss has brought agony to the hearts of survivors; but, as he lived not without usefulness, so he has died not without hope. He gave abundant and heart-cheering evidence, in that hour when deception is never practised, and self delusion rarely indulged—on his death-bed, and when he knew he must die—in that solemn and soul-trying hour he gave abundant and heart-cheering evidence that he was a patriot and a Christian. It has been my fortune to stand by many beds of death, in the retirement of domestic privacy, surrounded by all the endearing associations of home and friends. I have seen brave men die upon the field of battle, when nerved by all the appliances of enthusiasm—the clash of arms and the shouts of victory. But I can say with perfect truth, that never have I seen any man meet death (although unwillingly) with more calm courage or pious resignation. Among his last words, addressed to his family, with great self-possession, and in tones of emphatic sincerity, were these—and they are worthy of remembrance: "Pray for the welfare of our country, and prepare to meet me in Heaven."

Mr. President, my relations toward all of the three Senators from Arkansas have been peculiar. Though not yet five years a resident of that State, it has been my fortune to succeed one of them upon this floor—to have attended, as a friend and medical adviser, in the dying hours of the other two; and, in reference to the last, to pronounce his eulogy. Sad have been these latter relations; and strange are the mutations which they mark upon the calendar of human affairs! May Heaven grant me strength to sustain the responsible duties to which I have succeeded.

The honorable Senator then offered the following resolutions:

Mr. BREESE.—Mr. President: In rising to second the motion of the honorable Senator, who has just made the solemn announcement of the death of one of our honored associates—an event alike startling and sudden—I may be permitted, I hope, without intrusion, to add a few words to the beautiful eulogium he has so feelingly pronounced. I fear, in so doing, I shall disturb the harmony of its language, whilst it is yet vibrating on the ear, and interrupt that generous flow of feeling it has so universally inspired. Yet, sir, there are circumstances in the life of the deceased, and of him who now addresses you, to which it may not be improper, on this mournful occasion, to advert, and which prompt me to offer a slight tribute to his memory. It is, sir, thirty years since we met for the first time in the then far-off wilderness of the west, he my senior by many years, then a practising lawyer, I a student, preparing for that honorable profession, both buoyant with hope, with bright and promising world before us, and both entering it with an ardor and a determination to win a name. Professional business in the winter of 1819–'20, called the deceased temporarily, as he then thought, to Arkansas, from which he did not return. Common report, which reached the friends he had left in Illinois, told them of the high standing he had acquired at the bar of that State; and that he had, by proper exercise of his talents, amassed a large fortune. I never saw him again, however, until I met him to associate in this chamber, at the second session of the twenty eighth Congress. Our acquaintance was at once renewed, and we had much to speak of the varied yet similar fortunes a quarter of a century had achieved for us. In the next Congress, we were associated on two of the most important committees of this body; we lived together at the same house, and an intimacy was established mutually cordial and sincere. Knowing him as I did, Mr. President, I may be permitted to say that to every task to which he was called, he brought to its accomplishment untiring industry, great research, and an unflagging zeal seldom surpassed. His talents were of no common order, and he was never found unprepared upon any subject committed to his charge; and with six years' service still before him, who knows to what high honors he might have attained? The character of his mind was investigating; and, aided by a pleasing manner, always courteous and often energetic, he was enabled to make his views well understood by the Senate, and to produce a marked effect upon its deliberations. As a public man, sir, he was valuable, and gave certain promise of great usefulness and distinction.

In his disposition, the deceased was eminently social: his suavity of manner—his unruffled temper—his freedom from irritation by all those little annoyances that disturb the pathway of our lives, was a subject of common remark to those who were intimately associated with him. But it was in the family circle he shone most conspicuous as an [illegible] connected with those delicate relations of life in which humanity is exhibited in its most captivating form. In all of these, sir, he was a model and an example, lavishing all the tenderness of his nature upon those dear objects of his love, who returned it with the most sincere and devoted affection, and to whom it was permitted to receive his last sigh at that dread moment which must come upon us all. How terrible is this blow to them, who, but a few days ago, were all joy and gladness, now sobbing in anguish over his inanimate remains, conscious—painfully conscious—they are never more to feel the pulsations of that heart which beat alone in love for them; and as they take their lonely way back to their home, how agonizing will be the thought that they have parted forever with the idol of their hearts—their protector—their father—their dearest friend—and that his place at their once happy board is to be vacant forever!

How quick, Mr. President, is the passage from the Senate to the grave! How fleeting and transitory the hopes and promises of this life! And how full of warning should be this sad event, so sudden and so startling, prompting us to recur often to the injunction, "Be ye also ready," for no one of us can tell at what moment that awful summons may break upon our ear! No one can tell when the dread messenger may appear.

"Leaves have their time to fall,
And flowers to wither at the north wind's breath,
And stars to set; but all,
Thou hast all seasons for thine own, O Death!"

The resolutions were then adopted; and,

On motion,

The Senate then adjourned.

THE LATE SENATOR ASHLEY.

Mr. HANNEGAN submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Assistant Doorkeeper of the Senate be directed, when requested by the widow of the deceased, to convey the remains of the Hon. CHESTER ASHLEY, late Senator of the United States from the State of Arkansas, from the metropolis of the United States to the residence of the family of the deceased, in that State; that the expenses attending the same be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate; and that the Secretary of the Senate pay the widow of the deceased, from the contingent fund, whatever sum may become due for per diem compensation and mileage.

THE YUCATAN MESSAGE.

On motion by Mr. HANNEGAN, it was Ordered, That the message of the President of the United States, of the 29th April, relative to affording aid to the people of Yucatan, be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bills from the House of Representatives for the relief of Hervey Jones; for the relief of Richard Reynolds; for the relief of Seth Morton; for the relief of H. Carrington, executor of Paulina Le Grand, deceased; and for the relief of Joseph Johnson, reported them without amendment.

Ordered, That the report of the Committee on Invalid Pensions of the House of Representatives, relating to the bill for the relief of Joseph Johnson, be printed.

ADVERSE REPORT.

Mr. PHELPS, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the petition of John W. Leuchs, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

UNITED STATES COURTS IN ILLINOIS.

Mr. WESTCOTT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Represedtatives authorizing a term of the United States' circuit and district courts at Chicago, Illinois, reported it without amendment.

On motion by Mr. WESTCOTT, the Senate proceeded to consider said bill, as in Committee of the Whole, and no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it pass to a third reading.

The said bill was read a third time.

Resolved, That this bill pass.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives accordingly.

THE WIDOW OF COMMODORE BARNEY.

On motion by Mr. CRITTENDEN, the prior orders were postponed, and the Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of Mrs. Harriet Barney.

Mr. NILES remarked that he thought there was a law providing for all such cases as that presented in the bill.

Mr. CRITTENDEN expressed regret that the chairman of the Committee was not present for the purpose of explaining the circumstances which renderred the passage of the bill necessary. But he supposed that it would be sufficient to state that the lady for whose relief the bill had been reported, had not been included in the general law to which the honorable Senator referred, in consequence of her pension not having expired till a few days after its passage.

Mr. CALHOUN asked for a reading of the report, which was then read, setting forth the fact just stated by the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. YULEE observed that it was the intention of the Naval Committee to report a general bill, which would cover this case. He perceived that this bill came from the Committee on Pensions; but the subject had been before the Naval Committee, and as he had remarked, it had ordered a general bill to be reported which would meet this case.

Mr. CRITTENDEN replied that he greatly preferred the bill before the Senate to any bill before the Naval Committee, of which he knew nothing. The case of this lady came clearly within the spirit of the general law which had been passed, but for the circumstance which he had mentioned, she had failed to obtain the benefit of that law.

No amendment being made, the bill was reported to the Senate

Ordered, That it pass to a third reading.

The said bill was read a third time.

Resolved, That this bill pass.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives accordingly.

Mr. BADGER.—Has the report been printed?

Mr. WESTCOTT.—No, sir.

Mr. BUTLER.—I will take the liberty of reading the report.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—I think it will be better to print it, as it will be very imperfectly understood from the mere reading of it.

Mr. BUTLER then read the report, having briefly stated the circumstances in which it originated, and the general objects of the bill accompanying it.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading.

The report accompanying the report having been read—

On motion by Mr. ATCHISON, it was Ordered, That it be printed, and that ten thousand additional copies be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. BUTLER, from the same Committee, to whom was referred the memorial of citizens of western Pennsylvania, praying the repeal of the law imposing a fine for harboring a slave, submitted an adverse report thereon.

PRIVATE BILL.

Mr. UNDERWOOD, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of Charles Reeder, Walter R. Johnson, and the legal representatives of Thomas P. Jones, reported it with an amendment; and submitted a report on the subject, which was ordered to be printed.

VACANCIES IN COMMITTEES.

On motion by Mr. WESTCOTT, it was Ordered, That Mr. BUTLER, of South Carolina, be appointed chairman of the Judiciary Committee, in the place of Mr. ASHLEY, deceased, and that the Vice President appoint a member of said committee to fill the vacancy occasioned thereby.

Mr. MOOR was appointed.

On motion by Mr. BREESE, it was Ordered, That a member be appointed by the Vice President to fill the vacancy in the Committee on Public Lands occasioned by the decease of the Hon. Mr. ASHLEY.

Mr. BORLAND was appointed.

On motion by Mr. WESTCOTT, it was Ordered, That a member be appointed by the Vice President to fill the vacancy in the Committee on Printing, occasioned by the decease of the Hon. Mr. ASHLEY.

Mr. BORLAND was appointed.

THE PUBLIC LANDS.

On motion by Mr. BREESE, it was Ordered, That fifteen hundred copies of the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, in answer to a resolution of the Senate, respecting the guaranties of public lands sold from time to time, and the quantity remaining unsold, be printed for the use of the Senate.

MESSAGES FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their Clerk:

Mr. President: The House of Representatives have passed the bill of the Senate for the relief of John Black, late consul of the United States at the city of Mexico.

They have also passed a bill to attach a portion of the southwestern land district, Louisiana, to the district of Red river, Louisiana; a joint resolution in reference to evidence in applications for pension; and sundry private bills, in all of which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

NOTICES.

Mr. WESTCOTT gave notice that on to-morrow or some future day, he will ask leave to introduce the following bills: An act respecting the public archives in the State of Florida, and an act to grant the Everglades and certain lands contiguous thereto, in the State of Florida, to said State upon certain conditions.

Mr. BELL gave notice that on to-morrow, or some future day, he will ask leave to introduce a bill to authorize the district court of the United States, for the district of Tennessee, to hold special terms.

Mr. BORLAND gave notice that on Monday next, he will ask leave to introduce a bill to grant to the State of Arkansas, the public lands lying within that State; remaining unsold on account of overflow by the water courses, for purposes of internal improvement, and other purposes, in the discretion of the State, to be executed by authority of the State government.

Mr. MANGUM gave notice that on to-morrow, or some future day, he will ask leave to introduce a bill, the title of which he named.

Mr. CASS gave notice that on to-morrow, at one o'clock, he will move to proceed to the consideration of the volunteer bill.

Mr. ATHERTON gave notice that on to-morrow, he will move to proceed to the consideration of the West Point appropriation bill.

GRANT OF LAND TO ILLINOIS.

Mr. DOUGLAS moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill granting to the State of Illinois, the right of way and a donation of public lands for making a railroad connecting the upper and lower Mississippi with the chain of northern lakes at Chicago; which had been made the special order for this day.

Mr. HALE.—I would inquire whether my motion for leave to introduce a bill does not come up as unfinished business?

The PRESIDING OFFICER.—That will come up as a matter of course, if the motion of the Senator from Illinois does not prevail.

Mr. HALE.—I only ask that the Senate will give leave or refuse it.

Mr. DOUGLAS.—My bill is the special order of the day.

Mr. HALE.—Mine is the special order of the morning.

Mr. DOUGLAS.—The morning hour has passed.

The motion of Mr. DOUGLAS was then agreed to, and the Senate resumed the consideration of said bill as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CLARKE then remarked that one of the Senators from Indiana who desired to offer an amendment to the bill was not present, and in his absence he hoped that the consideration of the bill would not be pressed.

Mr. DOUGLAS hoped that the bill would not be laid over.—He would gladly insert the amendment to which allusion had been made. He would now move as an amendment, that a clause be inserted in the second section of the bill, including the Northern Cross railroad, extending from the Mississippi via Springfield to the Indiana line in the direction of Covington.

Mr. CLARKE reiterated the expression of his desire that the consideration of the bill should be postponed in consequence of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. DOUGLAS remarked that if the Senator from Indiana was not satisfied with the amendment, he should pledge himself to move a reconsideration of that vote.

Mr. NILES.—I would inquire of the honorable Senator who has charge of the bill, what is the quantity of land which the bill proposes to grant?

Mr. DOUGLAS.—I have not made the calculation. The grant of land is for alternate sections—six miles on each side.

Mr. NILES.—For the whole length of the road—what is the length of the road?

Mr. DOUGLAS.—Four hundred miles.

Mr. NILES.—Four hundred!

Mr. DOUGLAS.—The lands have been for sale for a period of twenty-two years, at a dollar and a quarter an acre, and have not found purchasers, for the reason that they are situated in large prairies, distant from a market, and without timber. If by constructing a railroad, the means of transporting timber be provided, there can be no doubt the alternate sections will be readily sold for two and a half dollars per acre.

Mr. NILES.—The gentleman gives a very fair explanation!.

Mr. DOUGLAS.—I am happy to hear it!

Mr. NILES.—I have another inquiry to make. Does the bill absolutely vest the lands in the State, whether the railroad be made or not?

Mr. DOUGLAS.—No. There is a provision that if the road be not completed within fifteen years, the lands revert to the United States; and if any portion should be sold, the purchase money is to be refunded. There is also a provision securing the free use of the road to the United States government, for the transportation of its troops, army and navy supplies, and all their public property of every description.

Mr. NILES.—Is there any provision for carrying the mail?

Mr. DOUGLAS.—There is not. But if the distinguished chairman of the Committee on the Post Office offer a reasonable and liberal provision to that effect, I shall have great pleasure in accepting it.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland—(in his seat.)—There ought to be such a provision.

Mr. DOUGLAS.—I shall cheerfully insert such a provision, and add a clause to the effect, that in case of disagreement between the Department and the State, the district court shall decide.

A SENATOR—(in his seat.)—The mails ought to be carried free.

Mr. DOUGLAS.—Oh, no! That could hardly be asked. But I am willing to accede to any reasonable provision.

Mr. NILES.—Well, if the United States give the means of making the road, I do not think it would be unreasonable to ask that the mail should be carried without charge. I understand that it is proposed to grant a portion of the public domain equal to six miles in width for a distance of four hundred miles. That is almost as ample a proposition as we have before us for the construction of a railroad to the Pacific. The projector of that road asks for a little larger breadth of land, and proposes to make the whole road out of the land granted to him, making it free to the United States. This road is for the benefit of the State of Illinois, to be under the management of that State and to be owned by that State. This bill is designed to put into the treasury of the State the value of this large amount of public lands, in order to enable it to construct this road. What that value may be I will not undertake to say. It is undoubtedly very considerable—equal to the minimum price of the land, and perhaps considerably more. I cannot vote for this bill. I cannot even make the proposition suggested by the honorable Senator to secure what might perhaps inure to the convenience and benefit of the United States in relation to mail service, because I believe the whole thing is wrong—wrong in view of the constitution—wrong in view of any sound principles of policy and justice in relation to the whole of the States of this Union. I admit no power in this government to make a railroad in this or any other form. Our attention was directed the other day to a very great inconvenience and evil under which the whole country labors in relation to a railroad across the State of New Jersey; and in that case I almost wish we had such a power as is claimed by those who advocate this bill; but I have never been able to satisfy myself that such a power does exist.—To say that we can get round the constitution by granting the public lands, instead of taking the money directly out of the treasury, is certainly trifling with the judgment of this body. It means the same thing. The whole thing is wrong, and cannot, in my judgment, be sustained at all, without a violation or latitude of construction of the constitution entirely unjustifiable. I hold that this system is entirely incompatible with any rational construction of the constitution, or any just interpretation of that instrument—What is this principle? Why it is this: that you may exercise this power where the government of the United States have a certain description of property, and no where else; that you may take the public land and make railroads or other public improvements, in the States where the public lands happen to be, from the funds thus obtained. I am utterly at a loss to know how the existence of public lands in a particular state, gives any additional claim on these grants from the general government, so far as the policy and constitutional justice of these grants are concerned. I know it is contended that benefit accrues to the general interest of the United States, and it has even been claimed, that this consideration sets aside the constitutional difficulty. I never could see the force of that reasoning; and in this case it is particularly difficult to perceive its force, when we recollect that according to the provisions of the bill, the land to be selected is not confined to the immediate vicinity of the road. This is a simple proposition to grant the proprietorship of these lands for the benefit of a work of internal improvement, which is to be owned by a particular State. Now I believe it is founded upon the most manifest injustice. If we are to make appropriations for the benefit of works of this kind, they should be made on some general principle—some system which will inure in some degree to the common benefit of all the States of this Union.

I do not propose, however, to go into a general discussion of the question. I know it will be of no avail. I have seen all this before, and I know the result. I suppose this bill will pass. I think it is proper that some provision for the conveyance of the mail should be inserted, but recollecting that I once offered such a proposition, and that it was voted down, I do not feel disposed to offer any amendment on the present occasion. I shall content myself with asking for the yeas and nays,

Mr. DOUGLAS.—I have drawn up an amendment in relation to the transportation of the mails, which I think will be satisfactory.

Mr. DOUGLAS read his amendment, as follows:

Add the following: Section — And be it further enacted, That the United States mails shall be carried over such roads under the regulation of the Post Office Department at a reasonable price, as for other railroads, and in case of disagreement between the State and the proper agents to the above, the matter in dispute shall be referred to the United States district judge for said State.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—My only purpose was to suggest to the honorable Senator to offer such an amendment as he has done, with which all my objection to the bill is removed. Such a provision is necessary in order to prevent exorbitant exactions for carrying the mail; there being no mode of conveyance that could compete with the railroad in point of speed, the company would have a complete monopoly, and be enabled to impose their own terms. It is necessary, therefore, that they should be laid under some restriction as to price. Sir, I rejoice to see a portion of the public domain of the country applied to such a purpose as this, for I do not know a more natural or more wise purpose to which it could be applied, than to improve and settle the lands themselves. That will be the effect of this appropriation. The intercourse that will be facilitated also by this measure, the in establishment of this road is very important, connecting as it will the waters of our western rivers with the waters of the lakes. I hope the bill will receive the sanction of the Senate. And in regard to the constitutional question, it is a certain and undeniable fact, that there has not been a President of the United States—there has not been an administration since the formation of the government, by whom an appropriation similar to this has not been sanctioned—not one administration from Washington down to this day, that has not given its sanction to such a grant. Old Colonel Zane had a grant made to him for marking out the first footpath in Ohio, and preparing the way for settlement. If anything can be settled by precedent, this has been; but I am told by some gentlemen, that constitutional questions cannot be so settled, but must be left open; that the wisdom and experience of our predecessors must be disregarded, and that such matters must be made the subject of endless and everlasting experiment. If anything can be settled by precedent, if anything can be fixed as fundamental law by the unanimous approval of the wisest men—such men as Washington himself, and such Congresses as have existed since the formation of our constitution—this is such a question. I have no doubt myself, either as to the constitutional right of Congress to make the grant, or of the wisdom and sound policy of such a measure.

Mr. BAGBY.—Mr. President: Several years of observations upon the current and the tendency of sentiment, and of action in this body in regard to this subject of internal improvement, has satisfied me that there is but little hope or prospect of resisting it successfully. Nevertheless, there are some few of us, who with due respect for the views and opinions of those who differ from us, considering ourselves as somewhat faithful among the faithless, consider it our duty to resist it to the last, no matter what form it may assume, or by what arguments it may be sustained, or by what means it may be attempted, to accomplish it. In addition to the question with respect to the constitutional power of Congress, exercised either directly or indirectly, to engage in works of internal improvement in the States, and which the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN,] seems to think has been settled by the hoary practice of unbroken years under preceding administrations, but which can have no decisive influence with me in construing the constitution; there is another feature in this bill connected with the public policy of the country, from the correctness of which I entirely dissent. In order to be distinctly understood, I place my opposition to this bill upon two grounds, its unconstitutionality and inexpediency. For a period of time, at least of long, perhaps longer, than this proposition to grant rights of way and alternate sections of public land to make railroads in the States where the public lands are situated has existed; there has also been a proposition to graduate and reduce the price of the public land.

Contemporaneously and pari passu with this proposition to reduce and graduate the price of the public land, a proposition is brought forward, the direct and inevitable tendency, and the avowed object of which is, to increase the price of the public land throughout the whole extent traversed by this railroad, which is said to be four hundred miles, from one dollar and twenty-five cents to two dollars and fifty cents per acre. Indeed this is the argument mainly relied upon by the advocates of the bill to relieve it from its unconstitutionality, and to sustain its expediency—that is to say, the advocates of the bill contend that, although it may be true that Congress would have no right to appropriate any portion of the public land for the purpose of making railroads or other improvements in the States; if that proposition stood by itself and unconnected with any other, yet that inasmuch as the government is the proprietor of all the public lands, it is entirely competent for Congress to give way one-half of the public land, provided such giving away will double the value of the remainder. Now, to make the most of this proposition, it only leaves the government in statu quo. For if you give away half the land it is necessary to double the price of the remaining quantity in order to break even. But the idea of increasing the receipts into the Treasury by the enhanced value of the land in consequence of granting a right to run a railroad through it, is a complete delusion. I will tell what will be the effect of these unconstitutional grants to make roads and canals. In the first place, you will compel those who purchase these lands to pay double what they would have to pay the government for them; and, in the next place, you will cheat the government out of the additional dollar and a quarter which you put upon the land under the pretext of making remuneration for the alternate sections. For it may be safely affirmed, that when the price of the lands come to be graduated and reduced, that those lying in the States to which these enormous grants have been made, will stand precisely upon the same footing with those lying in the States to which no grants have been made. But by far the most serious aspect in which this question can be viewed, is the constitutional one. My own opinion is, that Congress has no power to touch a drop of water or blade of grass or a grain of sand in any one of the States of this Union, except for the purposes enumerated in the constitution; that is, for forts, arsenals, and dock-yards. If they have let it be shown. It is said, however, that they have power to dispose of the public land. No doubt about that. But they have no power to dispose of it for unconstitutional purposes, unless the constitution was intended to be destructive of itself. It is not the disposal of the land that violates the constitution. It is the object to which it is to be applied that forms the test of constitutionality. I do not question the power of Congress to give away the public land, but insist it shall not be used to break down the constitution. But the Senator from Kentucky relies upon precedent to sustain the principle involved in this bill. Unfortunately, Mr. President, in the progress of our history as a nation we have furnished precedents for almost every thing. For a period of forty years embraced in that history we we have had a bank of the United States, and under the administration of one of the patriots of the revolution, and who, in the language of his great cotemporary and illustrious rival, who set the ball of the revolution in motion, the alien and sedition laws were passed. And yet, I apprehend, if the proposition before the Senate was to revive the alien and sedition laws, or to re-charter a bank of the United States, the honorable Senator would receive but a very small reinforcement from this side of the chamber, however powerfully and cogently he might sustain it by precedent. Divest and strip this measure of the extraneous considerations that have been thrown around it in the course of the discussion, and what does it amount to?

It is admitted the road cannot be made without a donation of these valueless lands. It is admitted that the road is to be constructed out of the proceeds of the sale of the land; and that making the road is the consideration upon which the grant of the land is founded. Disguise it as you may, it is nothing more nor less than this—Congress is informed of the great importance of a rail road from Chicago to Cairo, in the State of Illinois, but is informed that Illinois cannot make the road for want of means, and therefore, Congress is asked to appropriate the land embraced in this bill, and does it upon the express condition that the land thus appropriated shall be applied to that object. Is not this the true state of the case? The government of the United States by this bill appropriates, in the State of Illinois, a quantity of land amounting at one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, to nearly two millions of dollars to make a railroad from Chicago to Cairo. The government appropriates the land, from the proceeds of the sale of which the road is to be made, and without which it cannot be done; and making the road is the consideration for appropriating the land; the appropriation is to be void and of no effect, unless the road is made in the time named in the bill, and yet it is gravely contended that the finger of the government is not seen or its hand employed in the transaction at all! Sir, it seems to me there can be no understanding so shallow as to be imposed upon by such reasoning as this. Whoever furnishes the means to do a thing causes the thing to be done. It is the main-spring that sets the machine in motion. that imparts action and vitality to it. But, sir, the evil does not stop here. In many, perhaps in most of the States in this Union, there is no public land; and if you grant to the States in which there is public land, a sufficient quantity to make a railroad four hundred miles long in each, thereby withholding from, and keeping forever out of the treasury the amount for which the land would sell, with what justice, what equity, what show of plausibility even can you refuse to the States in which there is no public land an equal amount of money? How could you refuse old Massachusetts or Virginia, where the fires of liberty were first kindled, and the cradle of freedom was first rocked? Is there any difference in principle or effect between withholding from the Treasury that which, without your action would flow into it, and taking an equal amount from the Treasury after it had been actually paid in? I defy human ingenuity to point out a valid distinction between the two cases. Sir, this is a monstrous system. I will not go now into the influence, the pernicious influence it must exert upon the legislation of the country. Already there are before Congress propositions of various kinds for works of internal improvements amounting to twenty millions of dollars, at a time when we are staggering under a load of debt. Fasten this system upon the country, and all the great measures that illustrate the glory and efficiency of this administration will be labor lost. The revenue tariff, the independent Treasury, all the anticipated benefits and advantages of free trade; all these proud triumphs of party conflicts, and of sound policy, will wither and perish under its influence. You are not only, as I believe, inflicting a serious wound upon the constitution, but you are opening a mighty gulf that will swallow up your treasury, and exhaust your resources, and render a system of exhorbitant taxation certain, inevitable.

The Senator from Kentucky misunderstood me, if he supposed I contended, that as many Presidents had sanctioned the constitutionality of a bank of the United States, as he says, have approved of the principles contained in this bill. What I said was, that a bank had existed for forty years in the history of the government, and had been finally overturned by the concurrent action of the President, and a large majority in both houses of Congress, and by the approving voice of the people. I cited this to show that political precedents could not, and ought not to be relied upon with too much confidence, because the opinions, like the fashions of the world, pass away. The Senator from Kentucky puts it on the ground, that nearly all the Presidents, down to the present time, had sanctioned the principle contained in this bill. Some, doubtless, have. I trust I am not deficient in veneration, and respect, and gratitude for the great and good men who have gone before us on the stage of public life, many of whom have disappeared from it forever. But under the full and continuing influence of all these emotions I, like the Senator from Kentucky, am sometimes a little jealous of executive power, and cannot always yield full credence and entire acquiescence to the correctness of presidential interpretations of the constitution. And with the permission of the Senator, I will go one step further, and say, that there is another class of great respectability, talents, and patriotism, not altogether unknown in this our day and generation, with the correctness and orthodoxy of whose interpretations of the constitution I cannot fully concur—I mean those who aspire to be Presidents. Indeed, sir, as an humble citizen of the republic, I have been troubled in this respect, and at times have almost despaired of ever being able to arrive at the true construction of the constitution, or of keeping pace with those who, at stated periods, once in about four years take that venerable instrument into their own hands. Nothing seems to sharpen the powers of interpretation so keenly, to give such scope and expansion to the views and the understanding, and to inspire so lofty, enlarged, and disinterested a patriotism as a prospective view aided by the hope of occupation of a celebrated mansion at the other end of the avenue, familiarly known as the White House. It is wonderful to see how it vivifies and invigorates the understanding, and brings all the latent powers and energies of interpretation into play. Under its powerful and almost superhuman influence, pushed forward by feelings of the most elevated patriotism, gentlemen are willing literally to go about doing good. It enables them to find a remedy for the most extreme cases—to find a measure for any pattern and almost every fashion of legislation. And in nothing does this improved, almost sublimated faculty of interpretation, exhibit itself with such wonderful facility as it does in regard to this subject of internal improvement. If it is desired to construct in one of the States a railroad four or five hundred miles long, costing a couple of millions or thereabout, all that is necessary is to represent the government as a great land holder, fully authorized to give away one half of the land in order to enhance the value of the remainder, and compel the people, purely for their own good, to pay double price for it; and if any should be so sceptical or wavering as to manifest a want of faith in the efficacy or the soundness of this doctrine, their doubts are removed, or they are strengthened and confirmed by a body of well arranged and approved precedents. "This land service," however, like all terrestrial means, is rather adapted to things upon a limited scale, and cannot be conveniently applied to more than one State. In fact, I believe there is still an hiatus in the system, and that no precise and appropriate remedy has yet been discovered for a case in which two States are interested. This system being adapted to obtuse intellects and plain thinkers, like my friend from Connecticut and myself, somewhat an odd one, seems to be best adapted in its application to odd numbers; but if a case can be made out in which more than two States are interested, it assumes the aquatic form and the three States principle. In the correct application of this principle, however, you are not only compelled to take water, but what is worse, you have to stick to it. For, although, in the proper execution and fulfilment of this principle you may, under the power "to regulate commerce," spend a hundred millions to remove an obstructive river, you cannot spend a sixpence to get around the obstruction, although it would be just as beneficial in every possible or conceivable respect.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—I have but a single word to say upon this subject. I know from a long acquaintance with my friend from Alabama, how strict and how strenuous he is in his construction of the constitution. As far as precedent is concerned, there have been a great many more in favor of the exercise of this power than there have been in the favor of the exercise of the power to which he has alluded. There have been I believe fifty to one. It is not one precedent alone that can establish and settle a particular point, but a succession of opinions and of experiments. A concurrence of opinion among men heretofore, certainly must be allowed to have some influence in our determination. Whether the precedents for a bank of the United States are, in number or force, sufficient to establish its constitutionality, is a matter to be left open for future determination. I can only say, that Mr. Madison considered that precedents had established the question, and he acted upon that opinion by giving his sanction to a law establishing a bank of the United States. And Mr. Madison was a wise and good man. But as to this power of granting the public lands it has been exercised—I believe I do not speak in exaggeration when I say—a hundred times! There has not been a President of the United States who lived through his term of service who did not give his sanction to such a measure. There is an instance in regard to the Senator's own State. How many acres did we give to make a canal around the Muscle Shoals?

Mr. BAGBY.—Four hundred thousand.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—Yes. Four hundred thousand acres

Mr. BAGBY.—And all thrown away.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—That has nothing to do with the question of power. I have myself no hesitation or doubt on the subject, but I do not expect to be able to change the opinions of the gentleman. This proposition asks only about three times as much land as has been thrown away in an ineffectual attempt to make a canal in Alabama. We have made grants of public lands for the establishment of institutions in certain States. This proposition is free from the objection which might be made in those cases.

Here it is upon our own land that the improvements are to be made, and they will contribute to enhance the value of these lands. This certainly affords us an object and motive for interesting ourselves. We make the grant of a portion precisely upon the consideration of an improvement of the rest. We may be deceived in this expectation, but it is a reasonable one; and I have no doubt myself it will be realized if the work should be accomplished.

Mr. NILES.—The Senator from Kentucky says that grants of this character have been made under every administration. I believe the Senator is entirely mistaken; no such bill was ever introduced into either house until recently. According to the best of my recollection neither Jackson nor Van Buren gave any sanction to propositions of this kind. President Jackson attempted to limit and restrain these schemes for internal improvement, and for a time he succeeded in the attempt. What is a proposition for a grant of public land, for the construction of a railway, but an attempt to use the funds of this government, in co-operation with the state authorities, in matters of internal improvement? Is it anything different from this in principle? Not at all. President Jackson limited this power to the improvement of water courses, and not to the erection of original modes of communication; and President Van Buren, I am well assured, acted upon the same principle. The Senator says he has no doubt as to the constitutional question. I do not propose to argue that question now. If I were to do so, I should not expect to raise a doubt in the mind of that honorable Senator. I believe he is so fortunate as not often to be troubled with constitutional doubts, but I acknowledge I am often troubled with them, and they are very annoying. Some gentlemen, of whom the Senator from Kentucky is one, are generally free from any of these constitutional scruples, which I feel the force of almost every day. They, I have no doubt, take a more liberal view of the constitution. They look not to the letter of the constitution but to results, and whatever tends to the improvement of the country, according to their doctrine, comes within the constitution somewhere. I confess that I have a more limited rule, and I have felt it to be a point of duty to take care that the constitution is not infringed, in regard to these grants of power. We are mixing up our authority, with state authority, to accomplish what? To accomplish a work in which the States are immediately interested, and it being exclusively a State object, there cannot, constitutionally, be any joint action, or cooperation. We cannot interfere with it in any way. If it be a federal object, then let us execute it. But I rose merely to remind the Senator from Kentucky, that he is mistaken when he asserts that all the administrations have sanctioned propositions of this description. I know there have been numerous grants of public lands to the States, and perhaps some of them were limited to objects of internal improvement. But the limitation amounted to nothing. The States were left at liberty to exercise their own discretion. That is a very different exercise of power. Here is a specific object for public improvement in which we cooperate, to which we contribute our agency, to which we contribute funds. This is a very different case from a simple grant of land. In the act of 1842, providing for a general system of distribution of the public lands among the States, half a million of dollars is given for such objects. But that act did not pass during the administration of any of those Presidents, who have been at all inclined to adhere to what is called a strict construction of the constitution. It arose under different auspices. I merely rose to set the Senator right, in regard to his statement, that all the administrations had sanctioned propositions of this kind.

Mr. BENTON.—I have no intention to consume the time of the Senate on this question. I have been long enough here to have voted for the original grant to the State of Illinois, for the purpose of connecting Lake Michigan to the Illinois river, by means of a canal. When I gave that vote, I did not expect to remain in these councils until the object intended to be accomplished, should be attained. I did not expect the good fortune of seeing the United States made into an island, by a canal connecting the waters of the Lake Michigan, with those of the Mississippi, in my life time. But it has been done, by the aid of a grant of land to the State of Illinois; and I presume without that aid, the work would hardly have been undertaken, much less been accomplished. Now, however, the work has been completed, and the United States is to-day, an Island! Leaving the Gulf of Mexico at New Orleans, or the Atlantic at New York, you may go as you choose, around the United States without touching land. The result, then, of a grant of land to the State of Illinois, by Congress, has been prodigious, and even if there were no other advantageous result, than the vast facilities afforded to our internal navigation, it well compensates us for parting with some acres of land, over which this government then wielded a barren sceptre. I have no reason to regret that vote. I rejoice in it. I have not the same degree of reason to rejoice in the vote which I also gave in favor of appropriating nearly half a million to the State of Alabama, for the purpose of making a canal around the Muscle Shoals. But I do not consider that that appropriation was lost. Though the contemplated work has not been executed, yet there have been great advantages gained by the conveyance of the land out of the hands of those who make little use of it, into the hands of those who use it beneficially. The land has passed from the possession of the United States to that of individual citizens of the country, who cultivate it, and render it subservient to the wealth and prosperity of the State in which it is, and also of the United States and the benefit of our treasury. I do not, therefore, consider any of those grants as unprofitable; but, on the contrary, I fully concur in the opinion, that a great public object is gained in the transfer of these lands from those by whom they are not cultivated, to those by whom they are made productive.

I shall, with great pleasure, vote for the bill before the Senate; and hope that the construction of the contemplated railroad will produce similar beneficial results to those effected by the canal. The length of the road makes no difference to me. If it be a long road it is still within the limits of the State. It might be six miles longer, and not pass beyond those limits. The State of Illinois is one of the first in the Union in point of territorial extent. It must contain nearly forty millions of acres.

Mr. BREESE.—(in his seat.)—Thirty-five millions.

Mr. BENTON.—Of which a great proportion consists of public lands.

Mr. BREESE.—(in his seat.)—Fifteen millions of acres.

Mr. BENTON.—Fifteen millions of acres! It is appalling to think of it, that the people of a young State are to purchase, with money, the whole extent of the soil! That is not the way in which any country in the world can be settled. The old States were not so settled. The young States would feel themselves greatly exhausted—greatly thrown back in their career of prosperity and usefulness, if obliged to pay for the whole of these lands. It is, therefore, a great public object gained to convey these lands from the possession of the federal government to the individual citizens of the States. With regard, then, to the constitutional question, I think that by the same power by which we made the grant to Alabama for the construction of a canal, we may make this grant to Illinois. I see no sort of difficulty in extending this kind of aid to the States, in order to effect great public objects, universally beneficial when accomplished. I shall therefore vote for the bill with a great deal of pleasure.

Mr. BUTLER.—I do not know how far this subject is connected with a general system of internal improvement to which I have radical, abiding, and constitutional objections. I shall take some proper opportunity to express my opinion upon that question. I do not know that this is the proper occasion, but I am afraid there is too much truth in the remark made by the honorable Senator from Missouri, that there is a gap in the constitution through which our money has been flowing. And there is little prospect of restraining the current. There is no such thing as recovering what we have lost. I might say in regard to it nulla vestigia retrorsum. All has been running one way—westward. The Nile was considered a god, and worshipped by the Egyptians. The Mississippi has also become a god. Under the pretence of assisting the States we are giving—not money, but the equivalent of money, on the ground that we have a right under the constitution to bestow our bounties where, when, and for what purpose we please. Is it a matter depending entirely upon legislative determination? There appears to be no limitation by which the tendency of these measures can be controlled; they are all tending one way. If it were proposed to give five millions of dollars in money, there would probably be objection raised on the ground of want of constitutional power; but it is proposed to give up four hundred miles of land, extending from Chicago to Cairo, a tract four hundred miles in length, and six in breadth. This you are to give to the State of Illinois to enable her to accomplish her enterprize of constructing a railroad, on the ground, that as she has already received land for a like purpose, she must also receive this additional grant. I do not say, that under the articles of the constitution this government has not the right to dispose of the public lands; but I never will give my consent to such disposal, except it be by some system of equal justice to all the States—some system having in view the benefit of all parts of the Union. I have no idea of throwing out the bounties of this government to this place, or to that, merely because they happen to be asked for by those particular sections of the country. I shall take an opportunity when the matter comes up in a more tangible form to express my opinion more fully in regard to the evil which is likely to grow out of this course of proceeding on the part of the general government, for I see it is becoming utterly without limitation.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—There was one remark made by the honorable Senator that is so utterly new to me, that I cannot pass it by without notice. He says that the bounties of the government have been tending westward. We, of the West, have been constantly arguing, that all the means of this government are expended upon the Atlantic frontier. There cannot be a greater mistake than to suppose that this government is pouring out its wealth upon the West. The prosperity of the West is not the result of the expenditures of the general government there. Where are all your ship-yards, and your custom-houses? They are not in the West. If Kentucky constitutes any portion of the West, I think the honorable Senator will hardly be able to show that much of the treasure of this government has been expended there.

Mr. BUTLER.—I do not think that the State of South Carolina has received a dollar from this government.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—More public money I will venture to say has been expended in the city of Charleston, first and last, than has been expended in the whole State of Kentucky. And this remark will apply generally in regard to all the western States. It must be so naturally. Your fortresses are scattered along the Atlantic border. Your ship-yards and custom-houses are there; and there the public money is expended. More public money has been laid out in the building of one custom-house in New York than has ever been expended in the whole State of Kentucky. The Senator is entirely mistaken. I do not wish the West to be supposed to be monopolizing the bounties of this government, to be drawing all the wealth in that direction. The lion's track is entirely the other way. The wealth comes from there.

Mr. CASS.—As I intend to vote for this bill, I wish to say a very few words in regard to it. The subject has been often before the Senate, and the Senator from Connecticut has as often reiterated his scruples, taking the same ground that he has taken to-day, and carefully avoiding the grounds upon which the bill rests. This bill does not touch the question of internal improvement at all. It asserts no right on the part of this government to lay out a road or to regulate the construction of a road. The federal government is a great landholder; it possesses an extensive public domain, and we have the power, under the constitution, to dispose of that domain; and a very unlimited power it is. The simple question is, what disposition we may make of the public lands. No one will contend for the doctrine that we cannot give them away to a State. As the Senator from Kentucky has said, every President has signed bills asserting the principle that these lands may be disposed of by the general government, without restriction as to the purpose of such disposition. We may bestow them for school purposes, or we may bestow a portion for the purpose of improving the value of the rest. What right have you to sit still and see your lands growing in value through the instrumentality of individuals without rendering any aid in furtherance of that object? It is the settlement of the lands that makes them valuable. It is the settler who converts the howling wilderness into fruitful fields. It is the labor and the enterprise of the settler that has given you in the West a magnificent empire, and one which has arisen within so brief a period that it is almost incomprehensible. When I told the story in Europe that I had crossed the Ohio when there were scarcely twenty thousand people in that country, and that it now contained five millions, they did not laugh in my face to be sure, but they did not believe what I said. There is no parallel in the history of man; no such splendid tribute to human industry and enterprise since the first man went out of the garden of Eden. It is not twenty-five years ago that I sat all night in a canoe at the head of the pond at Chicago, there being no other habitation in which we could obtain shelter from the mouth of the Illinois to the mouth of the Chicago river; and now it is one of the great highways of travel between the northern lakes and the ocean. Sir, I hope the gentleman will put this upon its true ground, leaving out the constitutional question and taking alone into consideration what is your duty as landholders in a new country; a country, too, which must derive its improvement from the industry and enterprise of your own population; where every stroke of the woodman's axe redounds to your advantage. The man who sits down with his family in the wilderness to make for himself a home evinces more moral courage than the man who goes into battle. No man who has not experienced the difficulties and dangers he has to encounter can estimate them. I appeal to the Senator from Connecticut to look at it in this point of view. He is from an old country where such improvements have been ready made to his hands by his great, great grandfather. Roads have been made, and bridges built for his accommodation; but he must recollect that his cotemporaries, his friends around him, his children perhaps, are going into this new country and enduring privations to make that valuable which was not so before.

Mr. NILES.—No doubt my honorable friend's construction of the constitution satisfies his own mind, but he will excuse me for saying, that I cannot permit him to construe the constitution for me. I admit there is no question of jurisdiction as to the right to dispose of the lands, but the question recurs, is the object here proposed such an one as the federal government can take under its jurisdiction. I hold that the power of the government as to the disposal of the public lands is limited, if not in express terms, it is so by other grants of power; and those who believe with me that this power is not an unlimited power, must feel the force of the difficulty I have suggested. I am not going to argue the question; but I must be permitted to set myself right on this point. Although this government has unrestricted power to dispose of the public domain, yet if they attempt to apply it to an object with which the constitution does not authorize them to interfere, then they are exceeding the bounds of their authority, and their act is unconstitutional. I am not disposed to question the importance of this work, but I say it is one with which we have nothing to do. The Senator from Kentucky is certainly somewhat in error in regard to the money for the sale of the public lands being drawn from the west. A very small portion of it is drawn from the State where the lands lie. How can it be so, unless the citizens of that State buy the lands on speculation. Sir, the public lands are bought by my constituents and yours; by people from the old States; by emigrants from Europe; and the very inducements that we hold out to settlers, by offering them the very best lands for cultivation at nominal prices, instead of being a source of gain to the United States, is an expense which we incur for the purpose of bringing in population and wealth. My constituents have invested their money and bought up the lands in the honorable Senator's State, and, I believe most of them have taken with them a little change over and above what was necessary for the purchase of their farms. I consider there is no more hardship imposed upon one State more than another; and in regard to works of internal improvement, I can refer the Senator to some quite as important perhaps as any that he speaks of, that have been constructed in the middle and eastern States without making a call upon the national treasury at all. I might refer him to the Erie canal, a considerable work, made by the State through which it runs. I might refer him to the extensive railroads through all the eastern States. We are glad to see our brethren of the west endeavoring to compete with us. I will not complain even if they excel us. But I think there should be something like justice in the administration of the funds of this government, and if the public domain is to be looked to for objects of this kind, then I say with the Senator from South Carolina, that we should have some system of equality. I can see no reason why one of the old States, whose people fought for this land, and who, at least, incurred the perils and hazards common to us all in the revolution, by which this immense western domain was acquired, should not be permitted to share in some degree—if this property is to be appropriated for these purposes. But it is my opinion that the wisest and best thing we can do with it, is to hold on to it as a permanent source of revenue. I see no hardship in this. The Senator from Missouri talks about the advantage of getting it out of our possession. Can he suppose that by parting with it to State corporations, its settlement is accelerated? No, sir. It can only be settled as the wants of the people—the cultivators of the soil—require it. And I think the best disposition that could be made of it, is to retain it in possession of this government until it is wanted for actual settlement. It is taken up fast, and the faster the better for the resources of the country; but you cannot force settlement by any legislation, in any judgment, not even by graduation.

Mr. BUTLER.—One word to my honorable friend from Michigan. If he supposes that I entertain any feelings of sectional bigotry, he is mistaken. I have a high admiration for the West, and always rejoice as much as any one, at its prosperity and advancement. For the old Atlantic States to make war upon the West, would be like the mother chiding the child. I am more disposed to consult and promote the interests of the West, than to retard them, but it strikes me as singular, that the West while it was young, asked no aid from the government, but now that it has become strong, it seeks assistance. I have no objection to the expenditure of the funds of the government for the advantage of the States, provided there be uniformity. When the property of the government has been expended in the Eastern States, an equivalent has been given. I ask the gentleman to point out an instance in which the money of the government has been expended in improvement in the State which I represent. But I have a high regard for the West. It is destined, I have no doubt, to fulfil the ardent anticipations that have been formed for it. My remark was, that I was indisposed to give money or land without an examination of the object for which it was to be given, and without having regard to some system that would operate with justice and equality. I shall not hesitate to vote an appropriation for any constitutional purpose; but I must be permitted to examine for myself. These are matters that admit of no compromise. They are matters that must be decided according to our constitution; because if we permit an array of precedents—measures heretofore insidiously brought in under one pretext or other—to govern our decisions, we shall find such precedents accumulating upon us, constitutional barriers will be broken down, and we shall find ourselves weaker and weaker every day, and less able to resist the tide of encroachment, until we have no other constitutional guide save that which is prescribed by our legislation.

Mr. CALHOUN.—The question in this case is a very simple one. We are authorized by the constitution to dispose of the public lands. Here is a public improvement, projected either by the State or by individuals in the State through which it will pass; and by which the value of the public lands will be enhanced. If then, it will add to the value of our lands, ought we not to contribute to it? Would we not, as individuals, thus act? This is not a novel principle. It has been acted upon for more than twenty years. The case of the canal connecting the Illinois river with Lake Michigan is a striking one. There, alternate sections were given to make a canal, and I suppose I can appeal with confidence to the Senators from that State, whether the lands reserved to the United States were not disposed of afterwards readily?

Mr. BREESE, (in his seat.)—Thousands of acres were disposed of which would otherwise never have been sold.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I have seldom given a vote the result of which gratified me more, than the vote which I gave on that occasion. I then presided in that chair which you now occupy, and gave the casting vote. I take to myself, therefore, some share in the credit of that magnificent improvement. Indeed, I do not think that there is a principle more perfectly clear from doubt than this one is. It does not belong to the category of internal improvements at all. It is not a power claimed by the government as a government. It belongs to the government as a landed proprietor. And I will add, that it is not only a right but a duty, and an important duty. Now, what has been considered an equitable arrangement between the government and the State which may undertake an improvement passing through the public lands? Long since it was agreed that the grant of ultimate sections was a fair contribution on the part of the United States considered as a proprietor; and from which the United States would be a very great gainer. It appears to me to be an equitable arrangement, and I doubt whether, in any case, either of a canal or a railroad passing through the public lands, the United States will not be a gainer. To that extent I am prepared to go, be the road long or short; if it be long, you gain the more; if it be short, you gain the less; and you contribute in proportion to your gain.

But while I approve of this principle, it seems to me upon a hasty examination of the bill, that it goes beyond the principle; and to that extent I cannot approve of it. for I put my views in this and in all similar cases upon principle, and not upon the ground of internal improvement at all, nor the power of the government to engage in such works. I observe that the bill provides that the State may locate the lands elsewhere in cases where lands adjacent to the line of the proposed road have been herctofore sold or otherwise disposed of. Now, it appears to me that that is going beyond the power of a proprietor. I think that the principle had better be adhered to strictly. I do not think six miles too great a breadth; but it appears to me to be ample—to be a very fair contribution on the part of the United States. There is also another difficulty which may be removed. I see that a period of fifteen years is allowed for the completion of the road. This is a very long period; but I do not object so much to it as to the absence of any restriction which will prohibit the State of Illinois from selling it out in the meantime. It is true the bill provides that if the road be not finished in fifteen years, the State shall refund the amount. Now, I object to the reestablishment of the relation of debtor and creditor, between the general government and the State; therefore, there ought to be a provision, that the sales should be proportioned, I do not say exactly proportioned—to the progress of the work. That can be easily managed. If the Senator who has charge of the bill, will upon due reflection accord to these suggestions, I shall most cheerfully vote for the bill, otherwise, I shall find great difficulty in doing so.

Mr. DOUGLAS.—I hope the honorable Senator will allow the bill to pass, as it stands. We do not propose to sell the lands until the work be completed, when of course their value will be greatly enhanced. We design to adopt the same plan which was followed in the construction of the canal.

Mr. CALHOUN.—Of course I do not wish to embarrass the bill. Let me suggest to the honorable Senator from Illinois, that if confidence be created in the successful completion of the work within a reasonable time, the attention of capitalists will be invited, and money may be borrowed on the lands.

Mr. DOUGLAS.—I would remind the honorable Senator that the work undertaken by Alabama, failed in consequence of its being left to capitalists.

Mr. BREESE.—I will state that the provisions contained in this bill are precisely the same as those of the bill making an appropriation for the Illinois canal. The only security we have, that the work will be done, is by keeping the lands in our possession until it is completed.

Mr. BAGBY.—Before the exception was taken by the Senator from South Carolina, I had brought it to the notice of the Senator from Connecticut. But my objections lie deeper. I understand the Senators from Illinois and Michigan to put this measure, which is clearly one of internal improvement, upon the ground of the proprietorship of the public domain being in the United States. Let us see how far this doctrine will carry us. If it is good for anything, it is good for everything. Do I understand the Senator from Michigan correctly?

Mr. CASS.—I will answer the Senator. The general government has no power to make any railroad or canal through any State; but the disposal of a portion of the public domain to raise the value of the rest is clearly within the power of this government.

Mr. BAGBY.—The honorable Senator from Michigan is still more latitudinous in the interpretation of the constitutional powers of Congress over this subject, than the Senator from South Carolina. The Senator indulged in strains of fervid eloquence upon the effects of this system in carrying the gladsome lights of civilization, education, intelligence, and refinement into the wilderness, thereby causing it to bud and blossom as the rose. Every school house, every church you erect, says the honorable Senator, is directly conducive to this great end. I say so, too. But who is to erect them? Has Congress power to erect school houses and churches in the States? The answer must be, no. And yet they have the same power to do that, that they have to build railroads; and I do not believe the exercise of it would be half so dangerous. The powers claimed for this government by the Senator from Michigan are appalling to all who retain even a faint and lingering sense of the importance of a strict construction of the constitution and the rights of the States—they are unlimited and illimitable. I was also unable to discover the force of the analogy which the Senator from Michigan attempted to draw between the principle involved in the bill now before the Senate, and the pre-emption system. The great object of the pre-euption is, to secure to the settler upon the public land the benefit of his labor upon it, and a home for his family, in exclusion of all others, at a dollar and a quarter an acre. This is, in my opinion, a most laudable and highly commendable policy, well worthy of the attention and most favorable consideration of Congress—a policy which, in my judgment, ought long since to have been carried much further. But the effect of this bill is, instead of securing a small tract of land to settlers at a dollar and twenty-five cents an acre, to compel them to pay two dollars and fifty cents an acre for it.

There was another view of the new States submitted by the Senator from Michigan to the country, of which I cannot at all subscribe. I do not consider it necessary to engage in these schemes of unconstitutional internal improvement in order to induce the natives and enterprizing people of tho United States to emigrate to them. They are not mere places of refuge, vast bowling wildernesses, where it is necessary for the government to carry the torch of civilization and improvement in advance. Not at all. It is true, they have their hardships and privations, difficulties and dangers; but they present glorious fields for the display of enterprize, energy, fortitude, genius, and talent; and where these qualities are certain to meet with an adequate reward, of which the Senator from Michigan, if he will allow me to say, is at once an example and illustration. I, sir, emigrated to the State of Alabama at as early an age, though without having conferred upon others half the benefits, or secured for myself half the distinction which he enjoys, and as well deserves, as did the Senator of Michigan. But, sir, I have never repented, never regretted it, and never shall. I look back through the lapse of years that are passed, to the scenes of privation, of hopes and expectations and excitement in the early settlement of Alabama, without any other regret than that they can never more return. The new States and territories are the appropriate spheres for new hands, new heads, new hearts: and if the young men of the rising generation would, instead of lingering around the scenes and the graves of their ancestors, dear as they are to their reverence and to their affections, to the associations of youth and the recollections of childhood, fly to the uncultivated wilds of the new States and territories, carrying with them the sound principles of religion, morality, and patriotism, inculcated by parental counsel, solicitude, and affection, it would tend more to increase the true glory, and secure the permanent prosperity of this country than all the railroads, steam engines, and trading machines, which the enterprize of individuals and the unconstitutional prodigality of the government combined, will be able to construct or invent in a century to come.

Mr. CASS.—The Senator has entirely misunderstood the purport of my remarks. I never alluded to increasing the price of the public lands. To that I am totally opposed. I hope the price will be brought down. What I said was this: Whatever price you fix, the land is perfectly valueless until people begin to go there. Your land must remain unsold until improvements are made.

Mr. BAGBY.—I would ask if the object of granting land to construct this road be not to enhance the price of the lands adjoining?

Mr. CASS.—I thought I answered that question before. Without the advantages afforded by the improved state of communication, your lands will not be entered, settlers will not go there.

Mr. BAGBY.—I understand; they ask for this amount of land to make the road, with the assurance that it will have the effect of carrying up the minimum price of the remaining lands to two dollars and fifty cents per acre.

Mr. CALHOUN.—If the effect of the construction of the road be only to bring the lands more readily into market so as to sell for one dollar and twenty-five cents, it is, in point of fact, an increase of value. But, I believe that the remaining sections, after alternate sections have been sold, will sell more readily for two dollars and fifty cents an acre than for one dollar and twenty-five cents at present. It is for this reason that I am in favor of the measure. And yet the gentleman can see nothing in all this but impure motives, disguises of expression, as if every one who differed from him must be actuated by sinister and improper views. Sir, I wish to do justice to every one. No doubt the gentleman is influenced by honest views; and he has no right to doubt the honesty of mine. We are told that our system of improvement applied to inland seas is going to absorb all the means of the general government. This is a subject to which I have given some attention, and I lay it down as my deliberate opinion that two hundred thousand dollars annually supplied for the Mississippi and its great navigable branches will keep them in the most complete navigable order; whilst the losses which occur annually in the present condition of these rivers cannot be less than two millions of dollars. And yet gentlemen are willing that they should remain in their present condition. As far as the valley of the Mississippi is concerned, I will say that that portion of the country has received a smaller portion of the public money than any other section of the country. It will require a larger sum annually to keep up the light-house system on the coast, with the buoys and beacons, than it would to keep the Mississippi and its branches in a proper navigable condition. These are great inland seas. I hold it to be perfectly clear that Congress has a right under the constitution, to dispose of the public lands to the best advantage. And I shall cheerfully give my vote for any measure, by which they may be so disposed of as that the greatest pecuniary benefit will accrue to the treasury.

Mr. FOOTE.—I will state that as far as I am concerned, my own mind was perfectly satisfied on this subject last winter, by the arguments of the Senator from South Carolina, and others. I have thought ever since that period, as I did before, that there were certain questions on which the brethren of the democratic party, so to speak, might well differ. I did not believe then—and up to this period I could not expect it; that any member of the democratic party would feel himself authorized to use to other members the strong language which the Senator from Alabama has used. More especially as it might be deleterious to the interests of the State which he represents, in reference to measures of public improvement. What does he say? He quotes from Milton, comparing himself with the angel, the only faithful among the faithless. The Senator from Alabama is to be recognized as the Abdiel, the only faithful among the faithless, and we are the devils to be thrust forth over the battlements of the Senate! This language is rather strong. We have investigated the question as well as the Senator from Alabama, with the best lights that we could obtain. We have examined it, and having, consentaneously made up our minds, it does seem to me, he might have acknowledged that we were not quite so bad as the devils, and that he was somewha inferior to the angel to whom he modestly compared himself. He has thought proper to allude to certain members of this body as aspirants for the Presidency, and I certainly think his allusions were most unkind. Let, me, for a moment, show the Senator that if there is any virtue in the old adage, "that it is a bad rule that will not work both ways," he is in an unfortunate position; for if all of us concur with the Senators from Michigan and South Carolina, Illinois, and with others who have spoke in reference to the constitutionality of the measure—if it is true that there are aspirants for high political distinction, it follows that the Senator from Alabama, the only faithful among the faithless, is alone in such an attitude before the country, that he is forbidden, henceforward and forever, to cherish the idea of advancement. I regret much to hear it; for he is one of those gentlemen, whose abilities and the soundness of whose principles. I have long admired, and I shall have much pleasure in assigning him a higher political station than the one he now occupies.

Mr. BAGBY.—I am not conscious, after all that has been said, of having impugned the motives of any man. Indeed, I think those who have taken the trouble to attend to my course, during the seven years I have had the honor of a seat in this body, will do me the justice to say, that I have never been so forgetful of myself, or unmindful of the respect due to others, as to violate any order of the Senate, or any rule of decorous debate. And yet, the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] rises with imposing gravity, and charges me with having assailed his motives; and the Senator from Mississippi, with his accustomed chivalry, and who always has a speech on hand to relieve a friend, charges me before the Senate, with having been guilty of unkindness and discourtesy towards the Senator from South Carolina, and the Senator from Michigan, and of having arraigned the whole list of Presidential candidates. Under what rule the Senators from South Carolina and Michigan appear by attorney, in the person of the Senator from Mississippi, it is not my province to inquire. That is a question to which I am not a party. To be convinced, Mr. President, that in any thing or in any way, I had manifested a want of kindness, would indeed give me real pain. To that charge of the Senator from Mississippi, made in behalf of the Senators from Michigan and South Carolina, who, all things considered, ought to be considered as able to take care of themselves, I must plead not guilty. With respect to the other count, a want of courtesy, I assert entire innocency, so far as intention is involved. And although deeply impressed with a sense of my imperfections, as far as polished manner and high parliamentary decorum are concerned, and even somewhat impressed with the necessity of improvement and instruction upon that subject, I must still much lower than I stand in my own estimation, in these particulars, and judging of the capacity he has heretofore exhibited in this respect in this body, before I can be induced to avail myself of the services of the Senator from Mississippi as an instructor. I am almost as clear and decided in this, as I am in regard to the constitutional principle involved in this bill. And it will require stronger symptoms of improvement in capacity to become my preceptor, than I have yet witnessed in the Senator from Mississippi, to induce me to change it. The Senator says that so far from a disposition to do me injustice, he had even thought of me for higher distinctions than those I now enjoy. This, sir, may be evidence of the Senator's partiality for me, and certainly is of the activity of his intellect, or of his imagination; for I assure him in all sincerity, that he has indulged thoughts of my promotion and advancement, that never entered into my head. And whilst I thank him, as I do, most sincerely, I trust he will pardon me for saying that I think he has on hand already nearly as much weight as he can conveniently carry, without burdening or encumbering himself with any concern about me, or my promotion. When I spoke of Presidential candidates, and their peculiar aptness and readiness at felicitous interpretations of the constitution, I was replying to my friend from Kentucky, who was in my eye, and who, with his accustomed modesty did not think it worthy of a passing reply, and near enough to have been in my hand, and had no idea or expectation of bringing down upon myself, the grave rebuke of the Senator from South Carolina, or the spirited, and as I think, gratuitous attack of the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. CALHOUN.—The Senator will permit me to say that I did not make the remark in any such connection.

Mr. BAGBY.—The connection existed, however, in my remarks to which the Senator referred, and it is inseparable as sin and death. Without intending to arraign or impugn the motives of any one, I was glancing rapidly, and with serious apprehension, I admit, at this system of indirect internal improvement by the general government in all its bearings and ramifications in different sections of the Union, and contemplating the fearful extent to which it would probably be carried. And having got to the end of the Illinois railroad, my mind not being altogether as well disciplined as that of the Senator from South Carolina, I did venture a short aquatic excursion in order to test the correctness of the three State's principle. But if I cannot express my views in regard to the constitutionality of measures without being charged with arraigning the motives of Senators, I shall, indeed, consider myself most unfortunate. I participated in the views so eloquently expressed by the Senator from Missouri, who always takes an enlarged and comprehensive view, when he represented the United States as an Island under the influence of this great system of internal improvement. No one, I trust, rejoices more sincerely than I do, at the growth and prosperity of the country. I must, in justice to myself, however, as well as to others, and above all to what I consider the true construction of the federal constitution deny myself any merit in the construction of railroads, cutting canals and prodigal expenditures to improve inland seas.

Mr. FOOTE.—Will the Senator allow me to make a single remark?

Mr. BAGBY.—Certainly.

Mr. FOOTE.—I believe it will tend to adjust the difficulty. The subject of discussion being the inland seas, the Senator from Missouri claims the authorship of the project of their improvement, reaching as far back as twenty-five years ago. I presume, therefore, he must be the Senator to whom the remarks of the Senator from Alabama were applicable.

Mr. BAGBY.—Here again it is my misfortune to differ with the Senator from Mississippi. Unlike that Senator, my views in regard to the improvement of these inland seas do not depend upon circumstances. They depend upon my own views in relation to the constitutional power of Congress over the subject, and whether the idea of inland seas originated with my friend from Missouri, or the Senator from South Carolina, is wholly immaterial to the question at issue. I would as soon take the doctrine of the Senator from South Carolina, in relation to this subject, with all its imperfections on its head, as that of the Senator from Missouri, who has never took me to task for an honest difference of opinion with him. With all my respect for him—and no one can have more than I—I have on various questions ventured to differ from him frankly, boldly, openly, without being charged with discourtesy, and without incurring the danger of a breach of that friendship which it is among my highest pleasures to enjoy. I know the magnanimity of the Senator from Missouri too well for that. The Senator from Mississippi was mistaken in another respect. I did not say that I alone was faithful among the faithless. And if my future elevation, or promotion, or advancement, in the estimation of the Senator depends upon that, I shall at least stand in statu quo. I said distinctly that there were some few of us—and I am sorry to know and to feel that there are not more—who, with perfect respect for the opinions of others, considered ourselves as somewhat faithful among the faithless; and I should, indeed, have been unkind, if not discourteous, to the Senator from Connecticut, (as well as others,) who has uniformly resisted with great ability the principle which he and I believed to be involved in this bill, and whose voice I trust, will long be heard in this chamber in opposition to it.

Mr. FOOTE.—I understood him as quoting the language of Milton precisely, that is, in the singular number.

Mr. BAGBY.—Here again the Senator from Mississippi misunderstood me, as he will always misunderstand me when he supposes I quote poetry in the discussion of constitutional questions I never quote poetry to aid my interpretation of the constitution—never! Upon all such occasions, I leave that delightful region to the full and uninterrupted possession of the Senator from Mississippi, than whom no one could fill it better.

Mr. FOOTE.—If the Senator from Alabama stands in need of no teaching, he stands in need of no modesty. I merely suggested, and did it kindly, that the Senator was guilty of some degree of discourtesy. But the Senator has thought proper to resent my remarks, which were intended in all courtesy and kindness. One other observation. The Senator says he did not intend to single out himself. He intended to include the Senator from Connecticut. He intended to have two angels. He quotes the language of poetry, but wishes to be understood as not quoting it much. When he quotes, I hope he will quote truly, or he will do injustice to one of the most classic writers that England ever produced. And I will take occasion to say, that whether he meant to stand alone, or to be associated with the Senator from Connecticut, it only suggests this, that he either stands alone in separating from his party, or he stands in a woful minority.

Mr. CALHOUN.—The Senator from Alabama, when speaking of the enhanced price of land, certainly alluded, though without intending any direct application probably, to disguised motives.

Mr. BAGBY.—I used this expression, "disguise the question as you may." This is all I intended by the expression I used.

The question being upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time, the yeas and nays were ordered, and it was determined in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Atchison, Badger, Bell, Benton, Bodisel, Breese, Bright, Cass, Clarke, Crittenden, Davis of Massachusetts, Dougla[illegible], Felch, Foote, Greene, Hannegan, Houston, Johnson, of Louisiana, Mangum, Spruance, Underwood, and Westcott—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Atherton, Bagby, Butler, Calhoun, Hale, Johnson, of Georgia, Lewis, Niles, Sturgeon, Turney, and Yulee—11.

So it was Ordered, That the bill, as amended, be engrossed and read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time, by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That this bill pass, and that the title thereof be as aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives in this bill.

Mr. CLAYTON remarked that the memorialists alluded to the fact that the statements made in their memorials had been contradicted on the floor of the Senate, and expressed their willingness to be examined touching the same before any Committee of the Senate.

Mr. HALE presented a petition of citizens of Boston, Massachusetts, praying that the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus may be extended to every inhabitant of the United States, and that it be made a penal offence to hold in restraint, or to inflict punishment on any such inhabitant without due process of law; the motion to receive which was laid upon the table.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing in the State of Louisiana, the following mail routes, to wit: A mail route from Natchitoches to Shreveport, along the bank of Red river; a mail route from Natchitoches to Vernon, the county seat of the parish of Jackson passing by Harper's and Drake's store in the parish of Natchitoches; thence by the most convenient route to Vernon; a cross route from Minden, by the way of Bossier Point and Belleview, to Shreveport, and to be extended to Vernon, so as to pass through the Indian village, and to Simpson's store on the Claiborne road in Ouachita parish; a mail route from Harrisburg in the parish of Catahoula, passing through or through what is generally known as the Punches and Rizor settlements in said parish, thence on the most public route to the town of Vernon in the parish of Jackson, thence on the most direct route to Dugdemona in the said parish, thence to the town of Athens in the parish of Claiborne.

Mr. CALHOUN submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate all the correspondence between the Secretary of State and Don Justo Sierra, the representative of the government of Yucatan, if not inconsistent with the public interest.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their Clerk:

Mr. President: The President of the United States approved and signed, the 3d instant, the enrolled bill entitled "An act to change the name of Photius Kavanaks to Photius Fisk."

PUBLIC ARCHIVES OF FLORIDA.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. WESTCOTT asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill respecting the public archives in Florida; which was read the first and second times by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. BADGER, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of F. Montmolin, praying an amendment to the bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of David Myerle, submitted a verbal report asking that the Committee be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial, and recommending the passage of the bill without amendment.

The report was concurred in, and the committee discharged accordingly.

WABASH AND ERIE CANAL.

Mr. BREESE, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives, entitled "An act in addition to an act therein mentioned," reported it without amendment; and asked the unanimous consent of the Senate to its immediate consideration.

No objection being made, the Senate proceeded to consider said bill, as in Committee of the whole, and no amendment being made it was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it pass to a third reading.

Mr. BAGBY objected to the third reading of the bill at this time, but subsequently withdrew his objection, and

The said bill was read a third time.

Resolved, That this bill pass.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives accordingly.

RETIRING LIST FOR THE ARMY.

On motion by Mr. DAVIS, of Mississisippi, the prior orders were postponed and the bill to increase the efficiency of the army, by a retired list for disabled officers, was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CLAYTON remarked that this was a very important bill, and he hoped the vote would not be pressed upon it at this late hour, without time for an examination of the subject.

On motion by Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, it was Ordered, That the further consideration of the bill be postponed to, and made the order of the day, for Monday next.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

Mr. ALLEN gave notice that on to-morrow, or some early day thereafter, he will ask leave to introduce a bill, further to extent the time for locating Virginia Military Lands Warrants, etc.

Mr. ATCHISON gave notice that on to-morrow, or some early day thereafter, he will ask leave to introduce a bill to grant to the State of Missouri the right of way, and a donation of public land for the purpose of making a railroad in that State.

TEMPORARY OCCUPATION OF YUCATAN.

Mr. HANNEGAN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the message of the President of the United States on the subject, reported a bill to enable the President of the United States to take temporary military occupation of Yucatan; which was read and passed to the second reading.

Mr. HANNEGAN asked the unanimous consent of the Senate to the second reading of the bill at this time, not with a view to immediate action, but that it might be made the special order for to-morrow, at one o'clock.

No objection being made the bill was read the second time, and is as follows:

An Act to enable the President of the United States to take temporary military occupation of Yucatan.

SEC. 1. Be it enacted, &c. That the President of the United States be and he is hereby authorized to take temporary military occupation of Yucatan, and to employ the army and navy of the United States to assist the people of Yucatan in repelling the incursions of the Indian savages now overrunning and devastating that country.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the President be and he is hereby authorized, and empowered to furnish, on such terms and conditions as he may deem proper, to the white population of Yucatan, such arms, ammunition, ordnance, and other military means as they may need, to enable them to resist and repel the Indian hostilities now waged against them, and to restore peace and security to their country.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the President be and hereby authorized and empowered to accept the services of any additional number of volunteers, to supply the place of such as may be withdrawn from that service by virtue of this act, provided their services shall be required; the same to be raised for service during the war with Mexico, agreeably to the provisions of the act of May 13, 1846, and March 3, 1847.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—I move that this subject be made the special order for one o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. BADGER.—I hope not. It is too soon.

The question was put, and decided in the affirmative.

Mr. BADGER asked for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I am in favor of deferring the consideration of the subject for a few days. The bill was only laid upon the table yesterday.

Mr. BADGER—(in his seat.)—To-day—it has just been reported.

Mr. CALHOUN.—It seems to me there is a necessity for additional information. I hope the Senator will name another day.

Mr. BADGER—(in his seat.)—Let it be Monday next.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—I have no disposition to press unnecessarily this or any other measure. But, sir, this is an extraordinary exigency, such as has never, perhaps, before presented itself. If we act at all—if we be sincere in our profession of sympathy for those people—we must act at once. An hour may be of infinite value to them. A day may involve their existence—the existence of every living being with white blood in its veins within the territory of Yucatan. For this reason alone, and because every Senator is as fully in possession of the facts now as he could be next week, I am anxious that the consideration of this measure should be entered upon at once. The message discloses all the facts necessary to our action. The correspondence has been before us with the message for several days. Every Senator has had a full opportunity to judge of the merits of the whole question. These are the considerations, sir, which influence me in moving so early a day.

Mr. CALHOUN.—It may be, and I presume it is the case, that this is a great exigency. But I do hope that this Senate is not to be forced on every occasion to act upon an emergency. From looking over the correspondence very hastily, I perceive that even before the 7th of March last, the administration was fully apprized of the state of affairs in Yucatan. They have taken their time to deliberate, and surely a few days may be allowed to the Senate. I have no disposition to occasion any unnecessary delay whatever. I am willing that Monday next should be the day fixed for the consideration of the subject.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—I may state that I have seen letters from some of our naval officers in that vicinity—describing the present dreadful state of affairs. Lieut. Murray Mason states the fact that the beach is darkened with women and children naked and perishing from hunger. They have not sufficient means to feed them. Commodore Perry's letter is almost as strong. Mr. Mason is stationed there. Our naval force has not the means of affording food and shelter to the numbers that are flocking to the coast. Every hour they are expecting the assault of the merciless savages who according to their well known rules of warfare, butcher without regard to age or sex.

Mr. CASS.—It appears to me that this is one of these things which to be well done, should be done speedily. The appeal which is made to us is very strong. Providence has placed us in some measure at the head of the republics of this continent, and there never has been a better opportunity offered to any nation to fulfil the high duty confided to it than the present affords to us. I see no reason for delay. I believe the feeling of the country is altogether in favor of the adoption of the measures which have been recommended. I do not believe that there is a Senator present—I will not say who has not entirely made up his mind—but is strongly inclined to vote either for or against the measure, and to whom any farther information would not be at all necessary. If we have any disposition to aid these people, it should be, as my honorable friend from Indiana has said, manifest at once by decisive action. It is a case of crying necessity. I think the last accounts left the Indians besieging the capitol of the country. It is a war of extermination. It is precisely one of these wars in which a nation ought to engage on the side of humanity.

Mr. HALE.—I would enquire of the chair, whether any answer has been received to the resolution of enquiry submitted by the honorable Senator from Alabama, passed some four weeks since, calling for the propositions submitted by various States of the Mexican Republic?

The PRESIDING OFFICER.—The chair is under the impression, that an answer has not been received.

Mr. HALE.—I submitted an amendment to that resolution which was accepted by the mover of it.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—Yucatan was not amongst the States to which the resolution referred.

Mr. HALE.—I desired to include Yucatan, and for that purpose offered my amendment, which I have remarked was accepted by the honorable gentleman from Alabama. I should be very happy to be in possession of the information for which a call was then made.

Mr. FOOTE.—I must confess that I feel greatly surprised at the attempt made on the present occasion to procrastinate our action.

Mr. CALHOUN.—Does the Senator mean to charge me with a design to delay the action of the body?

Mr. FOOTE.—I know precisely what I intend to state. I understand that the Senate at the present time—so far as the fact can be ascertained upon a superficial examination of the body, and from the indications all around—is divided into two classes, one of which is for immediate action, that speedy action which has been so judiciously advised by the Senators from Michigan and Indiana; and the others—I hope it is composed of a very small number, is in favor of delay. To the former class I belong. And I was about to express the surprise, amounting to a most profound sentiment in my bosom, that there should be the least doubt in any mind with reference to the propriety of speedy action upon a question of so much importance, and seriously involving the honor and welfare of this nation. I am particularly surprised—I say it with the most perfect respect—that this suggestion of delay should come from the quarter whence it emanates. The Senator from South Carolina the other day, with more than his usual impetuosity (I trust, certainly not with all that deliberation and formal gravity which ordinarily characterize his course in this body, when the President's message was received, arose, and apparently with much excitement, avowed his hostility to the recommendations of the Executive. He indulged in language of recrimination and censure. He was prepared then to take the question at the first hop—to enter at once upon it, and he made a speech somewhat extended, quite ingenious, and decidedly unkind towards the administration—in reference to the message and the recommendations which it contained. All this the Senator did on the spur of the moment. Now, however, so far as we have reason to know anything on the subject, or form any conjecture, I believe I may say, with the utmost respect for the Senator from South Carolina, that he regrets the precipitation of his conduct on the occasion to which I have alluded. Now, he is not ready to proceed. He was ready to declare his opinions at once upon the message and the views contained in it, and he did express them at some length in a speech which is now circulating far and wide throughout the republic, has even gone beyond our shores, and is well calculated to produce the most injurious impression. I believe that that speech has been already detrimental to the cause which now demands our consideration. I believe that already some error has been diffused, and some prejudice excited by the remarks of the honorable Senator. Why is it, then, that the Senator is not now prepared to go on? Why is it that he desires this bill to lie upon our table, for what length of time I do not know? Why is it that he asks for delay on a question on which, when first presented, he was prepared to pronounce his opinion, and to utter a most fierce and vindictive philippic against the administration for daring to send that document here?

We hear in various high quarters denunciations of this administration for its tardiness in regard to this matter. It has been accused of disregarding the most important interests of the country, and in other quarters equally influential and respectable, we hear much complaint, that an attempt has been made improperly to hurry the action of this body in relation to this subject. Well, sir, I believe the Senate is now prepared to act upon this matter, and to act in opposition to the views of the Senator from South Carolina. Every intelligent Senator must have made up his mind, to some extent at least, in regard to the simple proposition contained in the bill. We must all feel it to be painfully true that instead of our being over hasty in this body, we are in general, most shamefully tardy in our legislation; and our tardiness seems unfortunately, to be proportioned to the magnitude of the matter on which we are called to deliberate, and the pressure of the exigency in which it is presented. When we were invited to adopt resolutions of sympathy with the people of France, the Senator from South Carolina and a few others, were not at all prepared to cooperate with us. The action proposed was too quick for him. He wished time to deliberate—to consider the matter—to ascertain whether the new government of France was likely to succeed. Happily for the honor of the country, and the cause of freedom, we have, by a majority of this body, evinced our readiness to proceed with that promptitude, which such an occasion demanded. So it was in regard to the various measures connected with this war. Frequent attempts were made to postpone our action. When the country was known to be in a state of real suffering and surrounded with perils, there were those who counselled and endeavored to procure delay. The Senator from South Carolina is mistaken when he supposes that there is any particular body of men here who always raise an emergency. I have known no emergency to arise here that was not real and substantial. I have known no attempt made to quicken the legislation of this body unduly. In the case now before the Senate, the Senator from Indiana, who is, as I understand, thoroughly acquainted with the subject, has presented reasons which should induce us at once to unite with him in giving immediate consideration to this grave and important matter. I can conceive no reason for delay. Indeed, no reason has been given, except that the case is one of grave importance, of extraordinary magnitude, and that, therefore, it would be improper to proceed too rapidly to act upon it. I think the Senator from South Carolina might be prepared to act, at all events, to-morrow. He was prepared a few days since to condemn, in the strongest manner—whether justly or not will be seen hereafter—the recommendations contained in the message. I do hope that the Senate will not delay its consideration of the measure proposed.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I did not know that the message had been printed, and laid upon our desks till this morning. I have cast my eyes over it, however, and I see enough in it to induce, on the part of the Senate, the greatest degree of caution. If the peace and welfare of this country are of any value, the recommendations presented in this message call for the most deliberate and cautious consideration. There is, indeed, a great deal upon the score of humanity to excite our attention to this subject. I believe there is a wretched state of things in Yucatan, whether we can relieve it or not is another question. The Executive have not been in any hurry in this business. If the Senator from Mississippi will look to the document which has been laid upon our desks, he will find that the letter from Mr. Sierra of the 7th March complains that he had written previous notes to the Secretary of State, to which he had received no answer; and these notes gave an account of the atrocities perpetrated in Yucatan, as forcibly and fully as any subsequent communication. Now, if the Executive took from the 7th of March till this day, time to consider the matter, surely we are entitled to one or two days in which to consider so grave a subject as this—for it will turn out to be one of the gravest subjects, full of complication and difficulty.

Now, I am not to be intimidated. I know how to discharge my duty here, whether alone or in company. My duty I know, and I cannot be driven from it. We were once urged into a war, precipitately and hurriedly, for which we have paid dearly. I trust we shall not be driven into another war, and perhaps a more complicated one, in the same rash and precipitate manner. I desire delay, because it appears to me to be necessary, in order that we may obtain all the information. Many notes which have passed between Mr. Sierra and the Secretary of State have not been published, if we may credit that gentleman's statement. There is no communication here from the Commodore on that station, who could give us a great deal of information; no direct information as both the origin and the character of the war, which should be known to us before we act. In my opinion, the document before us is very imperfect, and one days' delay is necessary before we make our decision.

Mr. FOOTE.—I regret very much to hear the Senator talk about attempts to intimidate. I understand this sort of language very well. I have heard it before. I trust I am one of the last persons who would attempt to use the language of intimidation any where. The respect which I entertain for the honorable Senator from South Carolina, who is a gentleman of known moral and physical courage, inflexible will, and the utmost fearlessness of character, prevents the supposition that I could be so silly as to attempt, on any occasion in this body, to use arts of intimidation in reference to him. I do trust that there was nothing in my manner or in my language to authorize such an idea. It is true I did express myself in the language of surprise and regret. I did say that I thought that the Senator from South Carolina when so ready the other day to denounce this message, might have been equally prepared now to decide upon precisely the same subject as that embraced in it.

Mr. CALHOUN.—If the honorable Senator will give way for a moment I will state by way of explanation, that I expressed my regret that the President should mix up a question of pure humanity, with high political considerations, connected with the general policy of the country.

Mr. FOOTE.—I suggested to the Senator after he had made his remarks the other day, that an attentive examination of the message might convince him that he had misunderstood the document. I am satisfied that such will be the fact. I was urging, and I still urge, that if the Senator was prepared the other day to discuss the merits of the message, he must be equally well prepared to do so now. I see no reason for the postponement desired by the Senator. I would not have alluded to what fell from the Senator from South Carolina the other morning in reference to this subject, but for the conviction which I entertained that his denunciation of the administration demanded some notice. He now says, that the President has mingled up other considerations with those of humanity, and of that the honorable Senator complains. Well, I would remark, that in the discussion of this message the Senator has thought proper upon the spur of the moment to mingle up another matter with the subject before us, with which, it certainly has no connection whatever—with which it has no legitimate affinity that can be imagined by any one but himself. What was that subject? The war with Mexico! He said that the President of the United States should have learned from that war, the danger of precipitate action. I felt at the time, all must have felt, and the Senator from South Carolina was bound to recollect what the public will be at no loss determine, that the responsibility of this war with all its evils—all its horrors—all its loss of of life—all that enormous expenditure of money so strikingly presented by the honorable Senator the other day, is not to be charged upon this administration. The responsibility of that war rests upon a man of exalted intellect, unwavering patriotism, inflexible temper, who, in obedience to a call of a former Executive of this nation, left his quiet home in South Carolina to come to the succor of the government, at that time much perplexed by the concerns which occupied its consideration; and the application for whose aid was, as I have understood, unanimously sanctioned by this body.—"He came, he saw, he conquered!" He arrived in Washington. He assumed charge of the duties of the State department. He conducted the movement of Texan annexation to its conclusion. It was the most signal act of his life. He performed it boldly—fearlessly—in defiance of menaces from various quarters. It had been predicted before that event, as it was afterwards, by various distinguished individuals, that Texan annexation would lead to war. The Senator from South Carolina was bound to perceive that there was much danger that these predictions would be fulfilled. The Mexican minister had openly proclaimed that Texan annexation would be recognized in Mexico, as just cause of war. The Senator from South Carolina, with his keen perception, might almost have anticipated with certainty, that the act would "let loose the dogs of war," in Mexico. But with that boldness of character which belongs to him, and with none of that timidity which it seems he supposes I have suspected him to possess, he dared to do what he believed was necessary for the honor of the country, and the safety of the South. I speak of a delicate matter, but I wish to speak frankly. He regarded it also, as an act of justice to our brethren in Texas. The measure was accomplished, and war followed. Thus began the Mexican war—the wretched war of which the Senator from South Carolina spoke the other day. The war which has cost so many lives, and such a large expenditure of treasure; but sir, a war in which every American who fell, met a glorious death. Texan annexation, then, was in part, the cause of this war; but it was a righteous war, and one into which the administration was justified in entering. But the administration did nothing more than sanction what had been done by its predecessors. We inherited the war from the administration, of which the Senator from South Carolina was the principal member. In the State to which I belong, humble as I am, I have ever been the advocate of the policy of the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, with regard to Texan annexation. I passed through the State from one end to the other, vindicating that act, as the act of the Senator from South Carolina. I endeavored to repel the denunciations which had been uttered against him in various quarters, even in this body. His friends everywhere gloried in that measure, and omitted no opportunity of defending him against the ill-will and aspersions, which it provoked against him. And, when the war occurred, what course did his friends throughout the Union pursue? Did they endeavor to shuffle themselves out of the responsibility of the act? No—they boldly avowed that to him and them belonged the glory and the responsibility of the measure. We had a right to annex Texas, but we were bound to suppose that it was at least probable, that annexation would lead to war. It did lead to war. But the Senator from South Carolina says, that the war has been brought on by this administration, and that from it, they should have learned a signal lesson, and be warned against the danger of precipitate conduct in future. Now I believe, that in this body, among those who have undertaken to express themselves in reference to the causes of the war, there are only two or three opinions. Some have said that it was Texan annexation; others, the movement of the army to the Rio Grande; and others again have said, as I have endeavored to maintain, that it was the act of Mexico—however instigated, that brought on the war. I believe that the Senator from South Carolina, has insisted that the movement to the Rio Grande, for which he holds the administration responsible, brought on the war, and that those engaged in the annexation of Texas are not to be held responsible. It will hardly do to urge this view of the subject very strenuously now, inasmuch as it begins to be understood that General Taylor claims the responsibility in part of this movement of the army. He saw the danger of an immediate invasion of our soil; he beheld a strong concentration of hostile forces on our border; he almost heard the fierce threatenings of the foe; and he asked the consent of the government to be allowed to defend his country in the only mode deemed by him possible. I pronounced in this chamber several months since, without the least personal acquaintance with Gen. Taylor, that it was impossible that he would be mean enough to deny his own recommendations to the government, or attempt to evade the just responsibility flowing therefrom. I predicted that he would repudiate the sophistical vindication attempted in his behalf by some of his friends and supporters here. It appears that I was not in error on this point, and it remains to be seen whether these same military movements, denounced so fiercely on former occasions, when supposed to be chargeable to a democratic administration, will be as strongly complained of now that they are ascertained to have originated with a whig Major-General of our army. But to return to the Senator from South Carolina and his public course in connection with the war now so much deprecated by him. I insist again and again, and I shall never cease to insist that whether the movements on the Rio Grande, or annexation, or foreign instigation, caused the war, certain it is, that when annexation did take place, there were indications not to be mistaken, that influences would be set to work to bring about a war, if we dared to do an act that we were bound to do, and by a failure in the accomplishment of which, the national character would have been disgraced. The Senator from South Carolina dared to do his duty, and the country gave him full credit for it. I insist that it is too late for him to attempt to avoid the just responsibility of his own noble conduct; and I hope he will not be offended at my saying so. I intend no intimidation—I mean no discourtesy. I speak warmly, but frankly and sincerely. Useful as has been his life, brilliant as have been his achievements, notwithstanding the extraordinary intellectual power which he has always displayed, and the reputation for purity, not only unsullied, but beyond question in every quarter of the globe, it is his misfortune—if I may call it so—justly or unjustly—to have been often charged with originating measures and not afterwards standing up fully to those measures in all their consequences. I do not undertake to prefer this charge. He has often vindicated himself against it, but not always satisfactorily to all. Some have said, and he will permit me to say it, that he is responsible as a former advocate of a national bank. Yet, surely, he does not now admit any responsibility on this subject. Again, at different times he has been accused, by various individuals, on such evidence as appeared to be satisfactory to them—of being the father of the protective system; but at the present time he would not think of assuming any responsibility upon that score. His friends, at different times, have been called upon to vindicate him against the charge of being in favor of various other measures, which I need not now name—among them internal improvements—to which he afterwards manifested hostility. It has been even said that he is actually the father of the whole system of internal improvement which once overshadowed the country, and as we believed, seriously menaced the welfare and freedom of its citizens. Yet, I believe that he has not been known lately to assume any responsibility upon that subject. I do not say that these charges are just; but I insist upon it, that the Senator is so surrounded by circumstances of this character, that he is bound to be a little more circumspect than other individuals, else men will get into the habit of saying, that the Senator from South Carolina originates vast projects for the advancement of his country's prosperity and his own personal fame; and that yet, when their remote effects turn out to be disastrous, he is found denying all responsibility or account of those acts, and casting it upon those who have had the good fortune to be elevated by the suffrages of their fellow-citizens to high situations, and whose duty it is simply to take care, so far as they can, to guard the country against those consequences which have inevtably followed the adoption of the measures proposed by him.

So it is with this war. I insist that every man who has fallen in Mexico, if murdered, (as has been strongly suggested by the honorable Senator, in consequence of the imprudence and folly of this administration,) would—if he could arise from the grave and assume the attributes with which the bard of Avon has invested the dramatic Banquo—come to the bedside of the Senator from South Carolina in the stillness of the night, and say to him—

"Thou all my murderer!"

Nor could the Senator respond in the words of Macbeth:

"Shake not thy gory locks at me—
Thou canst not say I did it."

Yes every million of money expended in this war, which the Senator from South Carolina deems so unjust, so wretched in every point of view, is, for the reason I have given, justly chargeable upon him more than upon any man in this nation. Let the Senator, then nobly assume the responsibility of his acts. He has received credit for them, and he will receive still more credit from posterity. Let him unite with those friends who have been always associated with him, and defend the most noble achievement of his life instead of burdening others with the task of vindicating it.

In relation to this particular matter, I am sure that the Senator must be satisfied that the occasion is urgent. There is ground for the most serious apprehension, in consequence of delay. The Senator from South Carolina is bound to sustain us in every thing connected with this war; we have a right to claim his zealous, efficient, untiring support. I hold that we have a right to complain of him. I will not denounce him; I will not attempt any thing so shocking to the sensibility of every man of good taste, as would be an effort to cast ridicule upon him. I prefer no charges, but I say that we have a right to complain, that during the whole course of this administration the Senator has either withheld from us his support, or has given a slow, reluctant, cold acquiescence to its measures. His conduct has been such as to authorize the public in general to recognize in him one of the greatest enemies of the administration. It ought not so to be. Why? First, for the reasons that I have stated. Besides, the great issue of 1844 we got from him; we carried it triumphantly; we placed a man in the Presidential chair who boldly assumed the responsibility of discharging his duty to the constitution and the country; and we carried out the views of the Senator from South Carolina, as that Senator no doubt would have done if he had occupied the Presidential chair. But I give him the credit of absolute consistency in his whole course since March, 1844.

Mr. President, I cannot bring these remarks to a close without expressing the deep regret which I feel that the course of the distinguished Senator from South Carolina should have not only justified the strictures in which I have indulged, but have made it indispensable to a just appreciation of the administration in power that the whole truth about the origin of the war should be at last plainly told. I lament that I have been felt compelled in addition to declare that this administration has much reason to complain of the hostile conduct of the Senator and some of his leading friends ever since its career of authority commenced. Never, I believe, has the Senator from South Carolina been known to defend this administration, or to commend it even in terms of the most moderate laudation. He has seen it surrounded with difficulties from the beginning, the most serious of which had been entailed upon it by the administration which had preceded it; he has seen arrayed against it continually, many of the ablest and most influential politicians in the country, whose energetic and steadfast hostility had been evidently called into action chiefly by that extraordinary devotion manifested on all occasions by this administration for those great and invaluable principles of democratic policy, to the maintenance of which the Senator from South Carolina owes so large a share of that enduring fame which he has acquired as a statesman. He saw this administration, in the very outset of its career, boldly place itself upon the very ground that had been proudly occupied by the enlightened and high souled statesmen of South Carolina for years before; he saw free trade principles asserted and successfully maintained by it, in all their amplitude, for the first time in our annals. He saw his favorite independent treasury system adopted and enforced also. He beheld a gigantic scheme of internal improvement, so dangerous to the rights of the States and the freedom of the citizen, prostrated by the fearless exercise of the veto power, that truly conservative feature of our system, for the retention of which in the constitution of the republic, and its triumphant vindication in this body on a memorable occasion, the country owes such a debt of gratitude to the Senator from South Carolina himself. He saw the country engaged in a troublesome and expensive war—calumniated, denounced, belied by thousands in every form which malignant opposition could assume; and yet the Senator from South Carolina has either been found in the Senate room speaking and voting against this administration, or giving a cold and reluctant support to its measures. When did he withhold censure, when any pretext, even merely plausible, was afforded to him? How many speeches designed and calculated to bring the administration into discredit, and to counteract its favorite measures of policy, have we not all heard from that Senator in the last seven years? How often have we been him surrounded by distinguished members of this body, avowed opponents of the administration, from whose lips he was receiving the language of warm congratulation and gratitude for the efficient service which he had just rendered to their cause! Sir, how are we to account for the conduct of the honorable Senator from South Carolina? What are we to think of it? How shall we characterize it? To what mysterious motives are we to attribute it? Instead of calling to let rumor do the Senator himself, attempt the full elucidation of these points; being content for the present, with having suggested them, and by doing so, to have administered a seasonable warning to democrats every where no longer to rely upon the Senator from South Carolina for the maintenance of their principles in the only manner in which they can ever be maintained—by sustaining those who, amidst the most fearful responsibilities which any administration in this country has ever had to encounter, have never wavered for an instant in their support; an administration, whose whole career has been marked with the most distinguished success both abroad and at home—and which is destined, as I confidently believe, to descend to posterity with as much of true glory as any which has ever been entrusted with power in any age or country under the sun.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I certainly had no expectation when I asked further delay of a few days in relation to this subject, that it would give rise to so long a debate. I am sure the Senate will not expect me to undertake to repel the various charges of the Senator from Mississippi, old as well as new. I rise to make only a very few remarks upon a general subject with which these charges have been connected. In the first place, I have given this administration as full and complete support upon all occasions as my conscience would permit. There has not been a single measure of theirs, to which I could give my support, to which that support has not been given. I yielded to the administration upon the question of the tariff, though the modification of it did not entirely suit me. I yielded upon the treaty, upon all the measures of preparation. I have dealt with this administration as I have dealt with all administrations from the time I first entered Congress. I have given no administration, whether friendly or unfriendly to it, my support upon any measure that I thought to be wrong; and I have supported all measures that I thought right. I have acted irrespective of party upon all occasions. I think it proper, also, to make a few remarks relative to the annexation of Texas. I repel no charges against me for being the author of annexation. It is an act of which I never can repent. It was an act of necessity, indispensable at the time, and will be so considered hereafter. But we all took ground, Mr. Polk and the whole of us, that it was not a measure necessarily involving war, that we had recognized Texas, that we had a right to annex her, and that annexation was no just cause of war on the part of Mexico. We introduced the measure upon that ground, and in my opinion successfully. If any thing has brought discredit upon that measure it is this war with Mexico; and as far as I am concerned or my reputation is concerned, I have a right to complain. I deny that the war was a necessary result of annexation.

Mr. FOOTE.—If the honorable Senator will allow me a moment, I will inform him that I said that war did not necessarily grow out of annexation; but that at the time annexation was effected there were circumstances which I enumerated, and of which the Senator from South Carolina must have been cognizant, which excited the apprehension that if annexation took place war must follow.

Mr. CALHOUN.—The Senator must permit me to act upon my judgment; whether I owe a debt of gratitude to Mr. Polk or not; whether I am bound to support this war because the author of it, must be decided according to that judgment. I deny that the war necessarily grew out of annexation. On the contrary, I speak with the full knowledge of the circumstances connected with the subject, when I say, that in my opinion the war could have been avoided by using ordinary discretion. I go farther. In my opinion it required a great deal of mismanagement to make the war. I was about to say, it required something like ingenuity, but that would be improper. I do not believe that the administration intended war; it would be a serious charge to say they intended war. It would be an impeachable offence to say they intended war, when they ordered General Taylor to the Rio Grande. But I ever believed that the movement could not be made without producing war. Can any man doubt it? They were told it would produce war. Amongst those with whom I conversed on this subject there was very little difference of opinion; and that was known to be my opinion from the first. With the view of preventing war I stated that opinion to the President. The gentleman entirely mistakes my course with regard to the administration in speaking—not as an organ but as one ardently attached to it—when he charges me with being its enemy, and as having come to assail it. I took my seat here with great reluctance, and was rather compelled to come than otherwise; but believing I might be able to do something to avert a war with respect to Oregon I came; with the most leading desire to co-operate with the President; and no man knows it better than he does. I held frequent conversations with him in the kindest manner, and never spoke an unkind word with regard to the administration except when assailed in this body. So far from being the assailant, I appeal to the older Senators here, who have been much longer members in this body than the Senator from Mississippi, if I ever spoke an unkind word except when compelled to do it. I believe the first instance in which I became the assailant was when this message was sent in, and then because I believed there is greater depth and danger in it than appears on the surface. It has upon the face of it the bearing of a question of humanity, but there is a complexion about it leading to consequences of which it is hard to foretell the termination. These, however, are topics which ought to be left for the discussion; and I regret exceedingly that the Senator from Mississippi has compelled me to say so much. I would be ashamed of myself, if I could permit myself in any case to be governed in my course, by enmity or friendship, for any administration. I never have been so governed and never shall. I look to the public interests in the discharge of my duty, and if I be mistaken it is because I am honestly mistaken.

Mr. HALE said he desired to express great gratification at the occurrence of this debate. The causes and origin of the war had been discussed frequently in his own and the neighboring States. Indeed this was the great question of the age; had however much matter of glorification gentlemen might find in it, it was one which would stamp itself in indelible characters upon the history of the time. He did not say what the judgment of posterity might be, though he had his own convictions with regard to it, to which he had given expression on a former day; and which became daily deeper and stronger. But he desired to state the reason why he felt gratified at the debate. Whenever he had alleged that the war had grown out of annexation, and that the measure itself had been effected for the purpose of extending slavery, he had been accused of saying that which was not true. He was glad that he could now appeal to one who could not be considered a partial witness, for proof of the allegation that this war had grown out of the annexation of Texas, and that the object of that measure was the protection of the interests of the South.

Mr. FOOTE.—I might have said that out of annexation necessarily grew the Mexican war; and that I was perfectly willing to meet the responsibility of that statement. But I was more cautious than the Senator seems to suppose. I said that there were circumstances at that time which I enumerated that authorized the opinion, which was entertained in various quarters that war would be produced by annexation. I believe that annexation was the remote cause of war.

Mr. HALE said he was happy to hear the explanations of the honorable gentleman, as he did not wish to misapprehend his position. He hoped that the attention of the country would be called to the debate, and he thought that out of doors it would excite vastly more interest than it had awakened in that chamber. Before the interruption of the honorable Senator he had remarked that he would call to the stand, one who would not be considered a partial witness, and ask him to testify under the responsibility of his senatorial oath and declare that this war had grown, not necessarily, but simply grown out of annexation. If he understood the Senator from Mississippi, he said that if there was any man in the whole country that should have sustained the war, it was the Senator from South Carolina, because he was responsible for annexation. And further than that the Senator remarked that annexation was necessary for the protection of the interests of the South. He wished to know if the Senator was now perfectly understood?

Mr. FOOTE.—My remarks were hastily made; and, perhaps, I enumerated some circumstances which the Senator has not thought proper to notice. I alluded to prognostications in 1844, with respect to the results of annexation. And amongst them, I had reference to a speech made by a distinguished Kentucky statesmen at the city of the Oaks, in North Carolina, which contained such predictions, predictions which were frequently repeated in certain other high quarters among the whigs, and possibly among other persons calling themselves Liberty men in New England, which may have had considerable influence in encouraging Mexico to go to war. I also had reference to foreign influence; to British and, perhaps, to French influence. Guizot and his associates were certainly opposed to annexation; and it was not an improbable supposition that they gave some encouragement to Mexico. I did say also, that amongst the objects which the Senator from South Carolina had in view in annexation, one was the security and safety of the South, at that time certainly menaced, as we now all know in connection with that subject. But I did not mention that, as the primary object of annexation. I alluded to it as an incidental object.

Mr. HALE believed that he now understood the Senator, and he had called the attention of the Senator to the subject, for the purpose of guarding against any misapprehension. He had not thought of undertaking the task of following the gentleman from Mississippi in all his flights of oratory. Far be it from him to attempt any thing of that sort! All that he desired was to call the attention of the country to the fact, that the Senator from Mississippi had added his testimony to that of his friend from Tennessee sitting not far from him. [Mr. TURNEY,] that the Senator from South Carolina, inasmuch as he was the author of annexation, was responsible for the war; and that annexation was intended to secure the interests of slavery. He was confident that the candor of the Senator from Mississippi would induce him to admit, that when he said that annexation was due to the safety of the South, he meant simply that it was necessary for the protection of slavery. That was the position to which he had desired to direct public attention; and an account of which he regarded this debate as so interesting and important. It had now been asserted and established by one of the archons of the tribe, one of the chieftains of the camp, that the people of the United States were this day engaged in a foreign aggressive war, growing out of a measure intended for the protection and sustenance of slavery. That is the admission without any paraphrase.

Mr. FOOTE.—I did not use the word "aggressive."

Mr. HALE.—I do not say that the Senator did.

Mr. FOOTE.—I made no such acknowledgment as the Senator represents. I said that it was a defensive war on our part, occasioned in part by the performance of an act which a distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, not now in his seat, in his Springfield speech openly affirmed to be justifiable, and on account of which Mexico had no right to complain.

Mr. HALE.—When the Senator from Mississippi undertakes to close my mouth by no higher authority than the Springfield speech of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, I can only say that that is not my catechism. I am not bound by any such opinions. The Senator had spoken of seers who predicted this war, well, among their number was Martin Van Buren. In one of his celebrated epistles, written just before the convention, that gentleman laid down the principle that we could not consistently with the relations that we then sustained with Mexico annex Texas, without giving just cause of war. That was in May, 1844; but in November of the same year, the thing was entirely different. History will tell the true causes of the extraordinary metamorphosis of circumstances which had, in a few months, so completely changed the aspect of the question.

But he would leave that subject. As to the bill before the Senate, he did not think there was any danger growing out of it, because, by the constitution of Yucatan, slavery has been entirely abolished in that territory. The honorable Senator from South Carolina indeed, had attributed all the evils under which the people of Yucatan labored, to the abolition of slavery. While that honorable Senator views the institution so favorably, as to regard the present relations of Yucatan as a righteous judgment from Heaven for doing away with so Divine an institution, all who felt alarmed about the annexation of Yucatan, might repose their heads upon their pillows in perfect peace and security. As to the declaration which Mr. Polk has made relative to the adoption of the principle avowed by Mr. Monroe, it never was and never could be the policy of the United States in the sense which Mr. Polk conceived it. The moment that such a policy would be attempted, the great maxim of Washington, "Peace and friendship with all, entangling allowances with none," would be departed from; and the nation would embark in a wild quixotic scheme, entirely at variance with the constitution and institutions of the country. With respect to the question of humanity, while certainly anxious to do everything which he consistently could do, in response to its call, yet he could not forget the humanity that was due to his own countrymen—a humanity which involved the hopes of the world, looking with intense and painful interest to the policy and progress of the United States—a humanity which regarded the interests of unborn millions hereafter—a humanity that regarded the interests of the oppressed of all climes, anxiously looking to the beacon light, ever cheering them in the desolation of despair. No doubt Don Quixotte was inspired with great humanity when he encountered the wind-mill. Besides, a treaty of peace and amity had just been made between the United States and Mexico, by which the former was bound to withdraw their forces from all the territory of latter. A boundary line had been agreed upon. Would it not then be in direct violation of that treaty to send to Yucatan any portion of the forces of the United States, without the consent or cooperation of the Mexican government? He did not throw out this in a spirit of cavilling, but suggested it as one of the serious difficulties which presented themselves to him in the way of adopting the measure before the Senate.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—I feel bound to make a point of order, without any particular reference to the Senator from New Hampshire. But it appears to me that this debate is out of order. We have already wasted two hours on the motion, merely to fix a day for the consideration of the bill. There is important business before the Senate which ought to be taken up.

Mr. FOOTE.—I hope the debate will be allowed to go on; if not, as my remarks were somewhat extended, I would beg to say in vindication of myself—

Mr. WESTCOTT.—I had no particular reference to the remarks or course of argument of any gentlemen.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER.—In the opinion of the chair, the debate has undoubtedly been very discursive; but the chair does not think that at this stage it will be warranted in arresting it.

Mr. CASS.—The question is whether this bill shall be taken up to-morrow. That it should be taken up to-morrow seems to me a matter of absolute necessity. The honorable Senator from South Carolina argues, as a reason for the postponement of the consideration of this bill, that the administration was apprised of the facts on the 7th of March.

Mr. CALHOUN.—(in his seat.)—Before that time.

Mr. CASS.—But they had not come to a decision upon the matter. When the subject was presented to our consideration, the facts were all before us. What, in the meantime, has the government been doing? They have been collecting information, until finally they received a communication directly from the government of Yucatan, detailing the progress of events, which had rendered it essentially necessary that some civilized nation should interpose, else the white population of Yucatan would be swept out of existence. All the information which can possibly be acquired has been obtained by the Executive. What additional information can possibly be procured and laid before us between this time and Monday next? The message was published last week. It states all the facts. There is not another fact which can possibly be obtained, necessary to guide our action. This is a direct appeal to the humanity of this nation, and nothing can be gained by procrastination. At the date of the last accounts, the Indians were besieging the capital, and the population was fleeing to the coast and fortified places. Application had been made to Cuba for aid, and a vessel had been despatched by the governor of that island. Every consideration urges the propriety—the necessity of immediate action.

I must be allowed to say that I heard with extreme regret the Senator from South Carolina speak of "this wretched war." Whether he referred to its inception or progress, he considered it "a wretched war."

Mr. CALHOUN.—(in his seat.)—Rash and precipitate.

Mr. CASS.—I am happy to hear the explanation. My impression was that the Senator had used the term "wretched."

Mr. CALHOUN.—I do not undertake to correct always. All who were here at the time will recollect what took place on the day previous to the declaration of war. The President's message was communicated to us, and on motion of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON,] that portion of it relating to the raising of an additional military force, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and the other portions of it to the Committee on Foreign Relations. My view in voting in favor of the motion was that we might grant the military force at once to meet any emergency, and take time upon the declaration of war. But the two were united, and the very next day the whole was voted at a single dash. I was anxious for deliberation, because I did not believe that we should make a formal declaration of war at that period. My opinion was that we should raise a provisional force, without adopting formal war measures, and then await the action of Mexico.

Mr. CASS.—The recollection of the Senator is perfectly correct; and his statement is entirely consistent with that which I was about to present. The war, in his opinion, was "rash and precipitate," because we did not wait in order to ascertain the views of the Mexican government. The Senator labored with his usual ability to induce us to wait till we ascertained whether it was the act of the Mexican government. The forces of Mexico had crossed the Rio Grande in order of battle. The Senator wished to ascertain whether it was the act of the Mexican government. He now knows that it was their act. He now knows that he was in error, and that we were right in our judgment. Had we waited till the end of time we could not have ascertained any thing more than was known at the time.

Mr. CALHOUN rose, and was about to address the chair.

Mr. CASS.—I shall yield to the Senator with pleasure when I conclude, but I am not now making any statement calling for explanation—I am reasoning on the facts before us. We know that it was the act of the Mexican government, and I ask the Senator, had we waited for any length of time, could we have ascertained any thing more? The forces of Mexico had crossed the Rio Grande and attacked our troops. We had a right to regard that as an act of war. Every nation would have so viewed it, and would have acted accordingly.

With regard to annexation, which so much connects itself with this subject, I have no hesitation in declaring that it was the cause of the war. I never doubted it. The great democratic party of the country has pronounced the same decision. The President has said it. Mexico said it from the first moment that the suggestion of the annexation of Texas was presented down to the last moment. Mexico declared it through her minister here; and through our minister there. She declared again and again that if we annexed Texas she would go to war. We did annex Texas, and Mexico fulfilled her threat. But this is a double question.—It is a question of fact and a question of political casuistry. I believe it is now pretty generally conceded by all except the warmest political partizans that annexation was no just cause of war. I hope that there is scarcely one member of this body who will affirm the contrary. The honorable gentlemen from Maryland and Texas, [Messrs. JOHNSON and RUSK,] have placed the title of the United States to the Rio Grande in a very clear point of view. If that be so, of course we had a right to march an army thither; if not, we had the right which every nation possesses, and which we have exercised, to march there and repel the attack of the enemy. No government would be justified in waiting till the enemy struck the blow in the place and manner which he chose to select. In this case our decision was right, and subsequent facts show clearly that Mexico meant to attack us. In one sense, then, as a question of political casuistry, annexation was not a cause of war; but as a question of justice, involving our character before the world it was just cause of war.

Mr. CALHOUN.—It is very painful to me to be thus called upon so often in this irregular debate. I chose to say that this was a "rash and precipitate war," and gentlemen think it necessary to enter into a formal argument to show that it was not. Would it not have been enough if they had said that they thought differently? But there is always, it seems to me, a lurking suspicion in the minds of the gentlemen that their cause is not a good one; for I have never known a case in which there has been so much effort at all times to prove that the war was just and necessary. These frequent explanations, this argument at all times, to prove the justice of this war, do not indicate a well settled state of mind. I am at issue with the Senator from Michigan, as to the fact that the Mexican government authorized the war. Arista may have authorized it. Paredes may have authorized it. But that is not the question; it was the Congress alone that could have authorized the war. But the Congress was not in session, and therefore could not have made the war. The same mistake is made on our own side. The gentleman says that we had a right to order General Taylor to repel the attack. If he means that the Congress of the United States had the right to do so, I agree with him. Now I put the argument to the Senator; and let him answer it if he can.

Mr. CASS, (in his seat.)—I shall.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I am about to put the argument. The resolution of annexation admitted that there was a disputed boundary, because it expressly provided that it should be settled by the United States. Now, the utmost claim that Texas ever made was to the Rio Grande. I do not say that the Rio Grande was the boundary; that is another question. But Texas admitted that it was disputed. If there were any disputed territory it must have been east of the Rio Grande. Now, I beg the attention of the gentlemen to this question to which I ask a specific answer. How are disputed boundaries to be settled? Is it not in one of two modes—by treaty or by war? If by treaty, the settlement is made by the President and the Senate; if by war, the war power is exclusively with Congress. After the treaty power had exhausted itself, as the Senator and all have assumed, is it not perfectly clear that the settlement of the disputed boundary could be made only by the Congress of the United States? We had a right to order General Taylor to the Del Norte, to repel invasion. It was not the President who had the right to issue that order, but Congress who ought to have been called upon to do it. The same error, then, was made on both sides. It was only Congress who could make war on either side. The authority of Paredes, and the authority of the President of the United States, were no more than blank paper; therefore, the war was illegally and unconstitutionally made. I do not choose to argue this question, unless when assailed, and my views called in question. The gentleman says that annexation was a just cause of war.

Mr. CASS.—I said that in point of fact Mexico went to war on this account, but that in point of justice, she had no right to view it as a cause of war.

Mr. CALHOUN.—The Senator said that Mexico threatened war and went to war. Who does not know that she fumed and fretted; but was that any reason why we should take a high stand and force a resort to arms? Not at all. Paredes showed a strong desire to terminate the controversy without war. It was he or his minister who made a proposition to Mr. Black, looking to an accomodation of the difficulties between the two countries. True, it came to nothing, but it evinced the disposition of the Mexican authorities to settle the controversy without war. Herrera was turned out; but there were circumstances connected with his removal, aside from the proposition which he had made with this country. I have been informed, on good authority, that the gentleman afterwards appointed as Secretary of Legation, was in Mexico at the time that this communication was made by the Secretary of State to Mr. Black, our consul, late at night, at his own house, and under strong protestations of the absolute necessity of secrecy. I understand that the information was made public. Mr. Black is here; and if I am wrong I can be corrected. But the fact has been stated, that the gentleman to whom I have referred, before he left Mexico, divulged it, and that the proposition that had been made, thus came to the knowledge of the people of Mexico. These facts do not show that the Mexican authorities had a fixed and resolute desire to make war upon us. On the contrary, we are thus furnished with evidence that there was a desire to make peace, and I feel the deepest conviction that having settled the Oregon question, the Mexican question would have settled itself, if General Taylor had not been obliged to take up the time of the Senate by these remarks in my own defence. I had not the slightest idea that any debate would have arisen. My sole object in asking for delay was to obtain an opportunity for examining the case.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—It seems to me that the question before the Senate, has entirely disappeared from the view of honorable gentlemen. In order to obtain prompt action in a case in which all admit the necessity of speedy action, I have asked that the bill before the Senate should be made the special order for to-morrow. Instead of addressing ourselves to this simple question, we have again entered upon that wide field, over which we have been travelling for the last five years. The Texas question entered the Senate at the same time that I had the honor of becoming a member of the body; and although it has been constantly ever since presenting itself, I must confess that I did not anticipate that it would be found to be at all connected with the present question. The causes of the war, too, must be dragged into the discussion! I had have hoped that all that would have been left for the debate on the volunteers bill, which my friend from Michigan, before me, is so anxious to get up. But my object in rising now is, to repel certain implied charges made by the Senator from South Carolina. He charges the administration with delay in communicating this matter to Congress.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I only said that the administration did not regard the subject as one of so much urgency, inasmuch as they had full knowledge long ago of these calamitous occurrences in Yucatan. By no means censured them for what they had done, but expressed the opinion that as they had had an opportunity for deliberation, it was proper that the Senate should also have time to form their judgment.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—The delay was occasioned in consequence of the endeavors of the administration to collect information.

Mr. CALHOUN.—We have not a particle of that information.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—Pray whose fault is it? On last Saturday, this message and the accompanying documents, were ordered to be printed, on Monday morning they were laid upon our desks.

Mr. CALHOUN, (in his seat.)—I did not see the publication until to-day.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—I received mine on Monday. The House of Representatives did not pursue the course which has been taken here. When they received the message they immediately called upon the department for the correspondence. They have received other correspondence of the Navy Department and the officers in the gulf. I have got some copies of this correspondence, and will lay them on the table of the Senate. The note of Mr. Sierra of the 8th of April presents in stronger language than I can possibly command, the reasons which should induce immediate action on the part of the Senate. It states the facts. They are truly appalling. All I ask is, that the Senate should enter at once upon the consideration of the subject.

Mr. NILES.—This debate has been remarkably pertinent; and has at least proved one thing, the propriety of giving gentlemen time to prepare their speeches. All the old questions of the war are, it seems, to be discussed over again. We are to have second and third editions of these speeches; and I do not know but that we may run as high as the seventeenth edition. Now, however good these speeches may be, they have become somewhat obsolete—there is not much freshness about them; and, therefore, I think it would be well to give a few days delay for preparation.

It is very certain, sir, that we do need additional information on this subject. The bill is one involving principles of the gravest character. I, for one, want additional light before I can be prepared to act upon it. I do not now propose to go into the merits of the question. The bill does not propose mere temporary relief, it goes beyond that; and the view presented by the Senator from New Hampshire is important. There certainly should be some deliberation before we interfere with a civil war in any other country. We should proceed with the utmost caution. I am opposed to legislating under impulse. We should act promptly, I admit; but our duty to the country requires that we should act with great deliberation.

The administration have done no doubt what they supposed to be their duty, and I hope the Senate will do its duty. I must say I can see no propriety in acting hastily, as though under the whip and spur, upon great questions of this kind. I have known such action here, sir; at least attempts of the kind. I have heard it declared in regard to great measures, some few years ago, that it was "now or never." Sir, I do not wish to act in any such impulsive manner. I do not choose to act under coercion, or in the manner that is implied by such a remark as that. I think we should act as promptly as the nature of the circumstances will permit; but at the same time, that our duty to the country requires that we should not act without giving to the subject all the consideration which its importance demands. And, as I said at first, I believe the delay of a few days will expedite our final decision; for gentlemen will have an opportunity to digest it, to settle their own judgments, and to narrow the debate, and confine the discussion to the essential points in the case.

Mr. CALHOUN.—One word in justification of the course which I shall pursue. It is important that we should have a knowledge as to the nature of this conflict in Yucatan. I have never seen the documents relating to the matter until this morning. I have had no information except such as is contained in the public papers, and upon such information I never act. I desire to have the official information, for which the Executive department waited so long before they made up their minds to act in this matter, which calls so loudly upon their humanity. As soon as I get that information I shall be ready to act.

The question was then taken upon the amendment proposed by Mr. CALHOUN, to the motion of Mr. HANNEGAN, making the bill the special order for "Saturday next," instead of "to-morrow," and it was, upon a division, determined in the negative:

For the amendment - - - - - - - -	13
Against it, - - - - - - - - -	17

Mr. HALE then moved to amend the motion by substituting "Monday next," for "to-morrow."

Mr. HANNEGAN demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and the question being taken, it was decided in the negative, as follows:

YEAS - Messrs. Bagby, Benton, Bell, Calhoun, Clarke, Clayton, Cunningham, Dickinson, Greene, Hale, Johnson of Louisiana, Niles, Sevier, Underwood, and Upham - 13.

NAYS - Messrs. Allen, Atherton, Atchison, Bagby, Benton, Borland, Breese, Bright, Butler, Chas. Dayton, Miller, Moore, Pearce, Phelps, Rusk, Sturgeon, Tappan, Turney, and Woodbridge - 21.

The question was then taken on Mr. HANNEGAN'S original motion, to postpone the bill and make it the special order for to-morrow, at one o'clock, and it was agreed to.

On motion,

The Senate then adjourned.

FRIDAY, MAY 5, 1848.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. WALKER, his Secretary, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 4th instant, transmitting the correspondence between the Secretary of State and the representative of Yucatan.

On motion by Mr. HANNEGAN, it was Ordered, That it be printed.

VIRGINIA LAND WARRANTS.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. ALLEN asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill further to extend the time for locating Virginia military land warrants, and returning surveys thereon; which was read the first and second times by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

GRANT OF LAND TO MISSOURI.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. ATCHISON asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill granting to the State of Missouri the right of way and a donation of public lands, for making a railroad connecting the town of St. Joseph on the Missouri river, with the town of Hannibal, on the Mississippi river, which was read the first and second times by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

UNITED STATES' COURT IN TENNESSEE.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. BELL asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to authorize the District Judge of the State of Tennessee to hold a special term; which was read and passed to the second reading.

Mr. BELL.—I trust that there will be no objection to the passage of the bill at this time. It is one to which I cannot conceive there will be any objection. It is purely of local interest, and there is a necessity that it should be passed at once, in order to be of any avail. The distance between the two exterior counties of the State is between two and three hundred miles; and there is but one district judge who is required to hold two terms in each year. It is desirable that the privilege should be given to him to hold a special term in order to expedite the business. I trust there will be no objection.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—I feel myself bound to object to any bill, for altering the plan for holding courts in any State, until it has received the approbation of the committee, and has been regularly reported.

Mr. TURNEY, (in his seat).—It does not propose to change the place of holding the courts.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—There are a number of applications of that sort from several States of the Union, and the Judiciary Committee has had a great deal of difficulty in regard to them. Much confusion is likely to be created, and no bill ought to be passed, until it has gone through the regular course. I must insist on my objection.

Mr. BELL.—It is merely for the convenience of the judge, to enable him the better to despatch the business belonging to his court. I do not see why the Judiciary Committee should be troubled with a local matter of this kind. It does not derange the judicial system at all; but if the Senator from Florida insists on his objection, I suppose we must submit to the delay, and allow the bill to go to the committee. I trust, however, it will be speedily permitted to pass.

Mr. BUTLER.—I hardly think it is a bill of such a character as to require that it should be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. I understand that it is simply intended to supply an omission.

Mr. BELL.—I will state further to the Senator from South Carolina, that it is simply authorize the judge to hold a special term whenever he may find it expedient, on account of any obstruction which may have prevented him from holding the court at the appointed time.

Mr. BUTLER.—On principle then it is neither more nor less than I have said, to supply an omission in regard to a matter that is incident to almost all the courts I have ever known. Some of the bills that are before the Judiciary Committee are very embarrassing, so far as regards the creation of new circuits, or additional judges. And any amendment of any kind that is calculated to introduce a new feature ought to go before the committee, in order to be reconciled with the general system. I think, however, that this bill does not come within that description.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—From what I gather in regard to this bill I shall feel myself bound to oppose it. The expenses of our judiciary system are a subject of great complaint; and these expenses are being continually augmented under one pretext or another. One mode of increasing the expense is, by creating additional places for holding these federal courts. Virginia, I believe, has five or six separate places at which courts of the United States are held; Tennessee has two or three districts, I believe. The grand jurors, petit jurors, marshals, and officers of the court all will get their per diem at these special terms, which laws like this now proposed allow, adding enormously to the expense of the judiciary system. I have resisted the attempt to get these increased expenses, during all the time I have been a member of the Judiciary Committee. I hope the bill will be referred to the committee.

Mr. BELL.—The Senator seems to misunderstand the object of the bill. But I suppose his objection is available, no matter upon what ground he places it. The bill must of course go to the committee.

Mr. TURNEY.—It does seem to me that there can be no necessity for a reference of this bill to a committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER.—A single objection is sufficient to prevent the action of the Senate upon the bill without a reference.

The bill was then read the second time by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NAVAL PENSIONS.

Mr. YULEE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill renewing certain naval pensions for the term of five years, and extending the benefits of existing laws respecting naval pensions to engineers, firemen, and coal heavers in the navy, and to their widows; which was read and passed to the second reading.

PRIVATE BILL.

Mr. YULEE, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of commander James M. McIntosh; which was read and passed to the second reading.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. YULEE, from the same committee, to whom were referred the petitions of John H. Williams; Passed Midshipman John L. Worden; Susan T. E. Williamson, widow of Charles L. Williamson; Henry La Reintree, and of Samuel Raub, submitted adverse reports thereon; which were ordered to be printed.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. WESTCOTT, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of John Morgan, reported it with an amendment; and submitted a special report on the subject, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WESTCOTT, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of G. de Lirac, reported it without amendment.

Mr. WESTCOTT, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of William T. Holland, reported it without amendment; and asked the unanimous consent of the Senate to its immediate consideration.

The bill was then considered, by unanimous consent, and passed over informally.

THE ADAMS TESTIMONIAL.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted on the 28th ult. by Mr. HALE:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate procure, for the use of the Senate, 5,000 copies of the addresses recently the Speaker and the members of the House of Representatives, and of the addresses made to the Senate, together with the discourse of the Rev. Mr. Gridley, upon the occasion of the death of the Hon. John Quincy Adams: Provided that it can be obtained upon the same terms that 20,000 copies of the same were furnished to the House of Representatives.

Mr. TURNEY moved to lay the resolution on the table.

On this question a division was called for, and no quorum voted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER again put the question on the motion to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. ALLEN demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and it was determined in the affirmative as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Atchison, Atherton, Bagby, Borland, Breese, Bright, Butler, Calhoun, Cass, Chittenden, Felch, Foote, Houston, Johnson, of Georgia, Lewis, Moor, Niles, Sturgeon, Turney, Underwood, Westcott, and Yulee—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Baldwin, Bell, Clarke, Clayton, Davis, of Massachusetts, Greene, Hale, Johnson, of Maryland, Johnson, of Louisiana, and Upham—10.

So the resolution was laid on the table.

DEFERRED NOMINATIONS.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted on the 28th ult. by Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, and it was agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform the Senate whether any officers are now in the military or civil service of the United States, under appointments from the President, which have not been submitted to the Senate; and, if there be any such appointments, that he state the date of such appointments, and why it is that it has not been in the power of the President to submit them to the consideration of the Senate.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill from the House to amend an act entitled "An act supplemental to the act entitled "An act providing for the prosecution of the existing war between the United States and the republic of Mexico,"" was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The joint resolution from the House extending the time for the erection of certain lighthouses, was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

RECONSIDERATON.

Mr. ALLEN said the Senate had adopted a measure of some importance (alluding to the resolution just agreed to) without their attention being drawn to it, and he moved, therefore, that the vote be reconsidered.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland.—I will inquire whether the Senator voted for the resolution.

Mr. ALLEN.—I believe that the resolution was passed sub silentio, and that it attracted no attention.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland.—The question I put is whether the Senator voted for the resolution; because, unless he did, he cannot move a consideration.

Mr. ALLEN.—Why really I do not think I voted at all; but I will ask somebody who did vote, to move the reconsideration.

Mr. BREESE.—So far as I am informed, it is the constant practice for any member to move a reconsideration.

Mr. BAGBY.—I am certain I did not vote, for I did not hear the resolution read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER.—In the opinion of the chair, a motion for reconsideration cannot be made except by some Senator who voted for the resalution.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland.—I would ask the Senator from Ohio, what his object is in having the vote reconsidered.

Mr. ALLEN.—My object is to call the attention of the body to the question which the resolution presents, and that is, whether it is in order for the Senate of the United States, to demand of the President his reasons for not sending in his nominations within a given time? Has not the President an equal right to demand of the Senate, why they have not confirmed his nominations?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland.—If the Senator means to discuss the question, I have no objection at all that he should move the reconsideration, in order that we may have the discussion at once.

The question being put, on the motion to reconsider, it was agreed to.

The question recurring upon the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. HANNEGAN inquired whether it would not necessarily lie upon the table for one day under the rule?

The PRESIDING OFFICER replied that it would not.

Mr. ALLEN then moved that the resolution be laid upon the table.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland.—I thought the Senator was about to discuss the question.

Mr. ALLEN.—My only object was to call the attention of the Senate to the subject, in order that no incautious proceedings of this kind should be had. I believe there is no instance upon the journals of this body, of the Senate having demanded of the President, why he had not done a particular thing, which, by the constitution, he has a right to do at any time during the continuance of the session. If it be in order to call upon the President now, to shew cause why he has not sent in the nominations, it was quite as much in order to do so on the second day of the session; and by a parity of reasoning, the President would have an equal right to call upon the Senate to know why we have not confirmed his nominations, or rejected them, within a given time.

Mr. HANNEGAN moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the special order.

The motion was agreed to.

THE YUCATAN BILL.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to enable the President of the United States to take temporary military occupation of Yucatan, which is as follows:

A Bill to enable the President of the United States to take temporary military occupation of Yucatan.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States of America is hereby authorized to take temporary military occupation of Yucatan, and to employ the land and naval forces of the United States for the protection of Yucatan in repelling the invasion of the Indian savages now waging war against the inhabitants of that country.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the President be, and he is hereby authorized and empowered to purchase such arms, ammunition, ordnance, and other military means as they may need to enable them to resist and repel the Indian hostilities now waged against them, and to employ for that purpose such officers, soldiers, etc.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be authorized and empowered to accept the services of [illegible] to enable him to supply the place of such as may be withdrawn from their present duty, by virtue of this act. Provided, That no officer shall be employed [illegible] during the war with Mexico, [illegible] and forty-six, and Mexican and [illegible] and forty-seven.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—When the message of the President was received, and before it was referred to the committee, I entertained the hope that action, and prompt and decided action, would be taken, in pursuance of the recommendation of the message, without debate, or at least without opposition. I am satisfied, however, from what has transpired, that we have opposition to anticipate, and in opening the matter at this time, I shall confine myself to a very few observations, and those mostly in reply to the suggestions which fell from the Senator from South Carolina on Saturday. Those suggestions—for they were suggestions rather than arguments—comprise I believe the only objections that have been, or can be offered upon the merits of the question, and without further premise or preface, I shall at once proceed to consider them in the order in which they present themselves to me. The Senator expresses his surprise that the President should have taken an occasion of this kind to recommend to Congress the armed occupation of Yucatan even for a temporary period. He pronounces it to be in his opinion most inopportune; and points with alarm to the results which are to follow. But the distinguished Senator has failed to point out the results which he seems to considerer so formidable. I, myself, after the closest and most deliberate scrutiny which I have been able to give to the subject have been unable to discover the alarming dangers which, like a hidden ledge of rocks beneath the smooth surface of the sea, in the Senator's apprehension, are covered by the plain and explicit language of the message. The meaning of the message, it appears to me is obvious; the case is there plainly and clearly stated, and it is also fully given in the documents which accompany it. Yucatan applies to the United States for assistance to protect her people against the barbarous savages who are pursuing them, of wives and families to the ocean. They appeal to us by every obligation which men hold dear to come to their rescue, or else in a few short months from this period, they must cease to exist. The President presents the case to Congress, and the committee to whom the subject was referred, report a bill as strictly in accordance with the recommendation which the message contains as a bill can be drawn. We propose by the bill to leave it to the discretion of the President to furnish to Yucatan munitions of war, and all necessary means of defence and protection. We propose moreover to allow him to abstract from Mexico, or from any part of the United States, sufficient force to meet and drive back the savages who perhaps before this day are in possession of the capital of Yucatan. We propose to go no farther than this. The President does not ask for the permanent occupation of Yucatan. The bill expressly prohibits the thought; it declares by its title that it shall be but a temporary military occupation. No man has dreamed as yet, so far as I know, of the permanent occupation of the territory of Yucatan. There are motives, however, which may lead us to such a result. As the Senator from South Carolina has remarked, we may be led we know not where. Considerations may arise which will lead us beyond our first intentions, and render it imperative that we should convert this temporary occupation into something more. I am thus frank in the outset, for I desire no disguise. Let it be remembered, however, that these are my own individual feelings and opinions; and that I speak only for myself.

Sir, there is a most formidable power in Europe menacing American interests in that country, and let me add American institutions too. That power is hastening with race-horse speed to seize upon the entire Isthmus. Heretofore, by slow degrees, according to her usual policy, England has got possession of various points along the gulf coast of the Isthmus. Now, sir, we have authentic information that at this hour, despite the assertion of the Senator from South Carolina—whose information and whose opinions I always hold in the most profound respect and veneration—despite the statement of the Senator, that England has enough to attend to at home, and will not attempt to interfere with the affairs of Yucatan, we have authentic information that she has interfered in the affairs of Yucatan already. England has seized upon the territory of the Belize. She holds that absolutely. Farther south the whole Mosquito coast is in her possession; and if not openly, by her agents she has advanced her troops and actually seized upon the southern portion of Yucatan, under the pretence of taking care of British interests there. England "enough to do take care of her own affairs at home!" England never saw the day when "she had enough to do at home." Since the remarks of the Senator from South Carolina were made on Saturday, the steamer has arrived with the intelligence, that while all the other powers of Europe are convulsed and distracted with internal dissensions, England has had the ability, without shedding a single drop of blood to allay the tempest that was threatening to disturb her domestic tranquility, and to laugh at the threatenings of her disaffected subjects! England never yet had "enough to do at home" to prevent her from extending her power all over the habitable globe. England cherishes the design, at this moment, to secure the most practicable route for an artificial means of communication between the two oceans, and to effect that object she is gradually and rapidly absorbing the entire Isthmus. Unless we act, she will accomplish her purpose. Does any man suppose for a moment that the miserable traffic in dye-woods, which is the principal article of commerce there, is what is leading England so steadily and regularly to seize, foot by foot, all the territory of which she can obtain possession in that quarter of the globe? No! It is the great and mighty object, which I have just indicated. In Yucatan she has another and a higher object. She has in fact a double purpose. The first relates to herself, but the second strikes directly at us. Look at the position of Yucatan! Look upon the map—see how she stands out in almost juxta-position with Cuba! She shakes hands with Cuba! The possession of Yucatan by England, would soon be followed by the possession of Cuba. I entertain no doubt that if she secure Yucatan now, five years hence we shall see her in possession of Cuba. I doubt it no more than I do my own existence. I doubt it no more than I doubt that the trees will put forth their leaves, and that the grass will renew itself next spring. It is inevitable.—Every indication points to it. The conduct of England tends directly to it. We have, I may say, the information that at this very hour she is taking steps to accomplish that object. Give her Yucatan and Cuba, and what will be the result? That very instant the Gulf of Mexico will be under her control. It becomes mare clausum! The whole coast of the United States, from Cape Sable to the mouth of the Rio Bravo—a coast, with all its sinuosities, nearly two thousand miles in extent—is as locked in as it possibly could be by fortified positions. Cuba has been called the key of the gulf. Yucatan and Cuba combined are the lock and key. Place them in the hands of England, and she controls the mouth of the Mississippi, as absolutely as she controls the mouth of the Thames! We shall not be able to go in or out without her permission. Is it not enough that she holds all the maritime power of the North Atlantic coast? Is it not sufficient that she holds Halifax, standing out as it does—that mighty observatory, the most prominent feature of the coast? Shall we stand still, quietly folding our arms while she is proceeding thus to hem us in and encircle us with her possessions? Shall we, by rejecting this bill, show that we are willing to acquiesce in her aggressions?

Sir, will the American government stand quietly by and see England take possession of Yucatan—and if we refuse to act she will do so, for she is acting in advance—she has taken the first step; the Governor of Jamaica has been already appealed to, and he will probably respond to that appeal before we act? Are we told our arms and refuse to render assistance to drive back the savages and protect Yucatan, the probability is—nay it is a certainty—that England will seize upon Yucatan and afterwards upon Cuba. There is one feature in this correspondence, to which I especially desire to call the attention of the Senate, to show the design of England. The allusion, in one of the letters of Mr. Sierra, the commissioner of Yucatan, is so broad as not to be misunderstood; that England is absolutely, through her agents, furnishing these Indians with arms and munitions of war to enable them to pursue this horrible massacre.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland.—Does the Senator say that the British government is doing this?

Mr. HANNEGAN.—Yes! I say that England through her agents is furnishing these Indians with arms. The Indians who are driving the inhabitants to the sea coast are armed with British muskets, bearing the mark of the Tower of London. It is more than suspected that they are supplied through the instrumentality of Mr. Patrick Walker, the British agent at the Belize, where England has established a depot of arms. Where else do they procure them? In one of the communications to the Secretary of State the allusion to this fact, is so broad that it almost amounts to a distinct charge. I put it then to the Senate, if we stand quietly by, if we are deaf to the appeal now made to us, if we refuse to respond to it, that inevitable result will be, that England will seize upon both Yucatan and Cuba. The honorable Senator from South Carolina has declared, that this was a most inopportune and improper moment for the President to express opinions of this kind. Why? What is there in the affairs of the world to make it so? If England, as the Senator anticipated, when he made the remark, was upon the verge of internal commotion, would she therefore be incapacitated from carrying out her designs? England, says the Senator, will no more think of taking possession of Yucatan, or throwing her troops into that province, than he, as an individual would think of seizing upon that province. Will he then be good enough to account to the Senate and the country for the steps which she has been taking, and in which she persists? She has seized by violence, or by fraud, every foot of land which she holds south of Yucatan? Sir, I am satisfied that under no circumstances will England construe our language or our course as disrespectful to her. But even if she does it will not matter a hair with me. If we interpose the great principle laid down by Mr. Monroe, reiterated by Mr. Polk, England will hold hands off! Never—never will she plant her foot where we have placed ours firmly! It is only when our hesitation or our tameness shall encourage her, that she will present her advancing front. I trust no Senator thinks that I am weak enough to believe that she is afraid of us. No! The English heart never knew fear. But it is not her interest to fight us. For no cause short of the sacrifice of her honor—of her character—of her reputation—would England fight us, simply because it is not her interest to fight us. If her interest led her to engage in conflict with us, if her honor was involved, if her character or reputation were at stake, though she had read in the book of doom, that the result would be her national annihilation, I believe she would fight us or any other nation on the face of the earth. Such is the indomitable character which England has ever exhibited. But she has an eye ever open to her interests. The destruction of British interests would be the consequence of a war with the United States. This she knows full well.

Mr. President, the Senator from South Carolina in the course of his remarks, brought before us once more, the phantoms of debt and taxation, in order to deter us from taking a step in this matter—those frightful phantoms which are continually held up to our view in terrorem. No proposition looking to no less extension, looking to our aggrandizement, or to an increase of the national prosperity can be made, without being met by such opposition as this. Why, sir, to what must we come? If we are not to defend our honor, because of the debt that must follow; if we are not to reach out our hands and secure a position vitally important to the interests of the country, because a little debt must follow, what are we to do? Are we to fold our arms and stand inert? No alternative is left us. We will find ourselves in the position of the Portuguese government some centuries back. When the question of constructing a canal was agitated, the resolution was taken that it would be impious to construct it, because if the Almighty had designed there should be a communication, he would have made it himself! Are we to be thrown back upon such a position as this? Our population has increased, our prosperity has advanced, all the elements of national greatness have been multiplied, and yet because our annual expenditure has proportionably increased, he regards it as a proof of wasteful extravagance! The Senator points us to the present condition of Europe, and directs us to the example of England and France. He says that in the accumulation of a debt, necessarily leading to enormous taxation, one of them, an old long existing government, has at last found its grave; and the other, as he anticipated, was about to follow it. Sir, there must be a similarity in systems, before there can be any similarity traced in results. There can be no possibility of a true parallel being drawn between the governments of France and England, and that of the United States. The nature of our institutions, the extent of our territory, everything in and around us, forbids the idea that we shall ever see the hour when our people, like the people of England and of France, will be compelled to pay a tax for the very light of heaven! It cannot be, sir. The Senator from South Carolina, too, by way of censure of the existing state of things, pointed back to the administration of Mr. Monroe, during the whole eight years of which, I believe the Senator was a member of his cabinet

Mr. CALHOUN—(in his seat.)—Yes, sir; nearly the whole.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—The Senator stated that the average annual expenses during Mr. Monroe's administration, was about ten millions of dollars.

Mr. CALHOUN.—(in his seat.) The ordinary expenses of the government.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—Now, does the Senator require his attention to be directed to the striking contrast between the circumstances of the country at that period, and the present time? We had not at any period of Mr. Monroe's administration, ten millions of people. Where were, then, our boundaries? Since that period, our population has increased three-fold. I believe it is a moderate estimate to place it at twenty-four millions; and how vast has been the extension of our borders! It is only necessary to point to Pittsburg, Wheeling, Cincinnati, Louisville, St. Louis, or New Orleans, as illustrative of our extraordinary increase and progress in all the most essential elements of national greatness. Look at New Orleans, already rivalling the mighty commercial emporium of the North on our Atlantic border; and look at St. Louis with its one hundred thousand inhabitants, yet at the commencement of Mr. Monroe's administration it was little more than a collection of huts of Indian traders! Then, there is Pittsburg, with a population of an hundred thousand inhabitants, which was then a mere point of embarkation for emigrants passing down the Ohio. My friend from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN] knows how long it then took to perform the journey to Washington on horseback. Since that time we have shot to the foot of the Rocky Mountains—have passed beyond them—and are now resting on the shores of the Pacific! All the resources of vast territories, unrivalled for productiveness and fertility, have been brought to light. Our internal commerce has literally grown up since that hour; for before we had comparatively none. Yet the Senator from South Carolina complains that our expenses have increased from ten to thirty millions! Well, there is something to show for all this augmented expenditure. Is it to be supposed that ten persons shall be able to subsist on that which only sufficed for the sustenance of two?

The Senator admitted the other day that it would be justifiable to act on one ground presented in the message of the President. He remarked that we would be justified in acting on the ground of humanity; but he said at the same time that he did not know how far or to what extent the President ought to go.

Mr. CALHOUN—(in his seat.)—How far are ought to go.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—I thought that he included the President. He was not prepared to say, then, how far we ought to go. I ask if we move at all, can we stop short of what the bill proposes? Will you merely send them food and raiment? Of what avail would such a measure of relief be, unless accompanied by arms and munitions of war? Would you send food and raiment to feed and clothe dead bodies? If you send them not troops and munitions of war, of what avail is your sympathy, unless you mean to "hold the word of promise to the ear, and break it to the hope?" We confine ourselves within limits, as close and strict, as could possibly be imposed in the circumstances. I repeat, that it is not the intention of the committee, in draughting this bill, to retain permanent possession of the territory of Yucatan, unless there should be an absolute necessity for it; and of course the whole thing is within the control of Congress. It is the first time in my life in which I have found a gentleman approving of a measure on account of one good reason assigned for it, and in the same breath, announcing his opposition to it, because another reason, which, in his judgment, is a bad one, is urged in favor of its adoption. I have always understood, that according to all sound rules of argument, if nineteen bad reasons and one good reason were given for any measure, the good one was sufficient to outweigh all the bad ones! It seems that with the honorable Senator from South Carolina, the rule has been reversed, and that the bad reason overrules and vitiates the good! The Senator also alleges that the message of the President goes far beyond the doctrine announced by Mr. Monroe. Now, sir, the President quotes the language of Mr. Monroe, and it seems to me from an attentive examination of the subject, that Mr. Monroe goes beyond the President! In the first place, I beg to remind the honorable Senator, that Mr. Monroe embraced in his declaration both the North and South American continents; while Mr. Polk has uniformly restricted himself to the former. In the annual message of Mr. Monroe to Congress, in December, 1823, he stated, that in the discussion of the respective rights of Great Britain, Russia, and the United States, on the north-western coast of America, the occasion had > "been judged proper for asserting as a principle, in which the rights of the United States are involved, that the American continents, by the free and independent position they have assumed and maintained, are henceforth not to be considered as subjects for future colonization by any European powers."

In the same message it was declared, that we should regard any attempt on the part of European powers to extend their political system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety." The message says:

> "With existing colonies or dependencies of any European powers we have not interfered, and shall not interfere. But with the governments who have declared their independence, and maintained it, and whose independence we have, on great consideration and on just principles, acknowledged, we could not view any interposition for the purpose of oppressing them, or controlling in any other manner their destiny, by any European power, in any other light than as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition towards the United States."

To my poor judgment that is as strong language as Mr. Polk has ever used; and if it is to be regarded as offensive to quote it, or allude to it now, I desire to know why it was not denounced when it was first uttered? I desire to know how it happens that on the first attempt to carry out in practice the spirit and meaning of the memorable declaration, the Senator from South Carolina should think proper to denounce it, when he was certainly committed to it himself as a member of Mr. Monroe's cabinet? I await the explanation of the honorable Senator. If it be offensive to him now that the danger is impending, and when we are invoked to maintain it, by our regard for the common but hallowed ties of humanity which bind the whole human family, why was it, I ask, that at the hour of its adoption—the hour not merely of its adoption by the administration of James Monroe, but of its instalment into the great American heart, for I regard it as one of the cardinal doctrines of the American political creed—no voice of denunciation was raised against it; and that opposition to it has been reserved until the moment that it is about to be put into practice?

Sir, I hold that it is a fundamental principle of our system, that there shall be no intervention in the affairs of the North American people by any European power. The Senator from South Carolina must certainly have given his assent to that doctrine at the time when it was embodied in the message of Mr. Monroe. I happen to know the history of this memorable sentiment. I obtained it some four or five weeks before his death from that illustrious man who for more than half a century adorned the political annals of this country, and whose name will live while the sun shines in brightness in the heavens! I speak of John Quincy Adams. This declaration was so endeared to me by its true and lofty patriotism, that I sought an interview with that venerable man, in order to make some inquiries in relation to this very subject. He gave me an interview of two hours. He has descended to the tomb, and there can be no indelicacy in relating the substance of the conversation. He stated to me that Mr. Monroe was in the habit, when preparing his message, of calling upon the different members of his cabinet for suggestions in relation to the affairs of their respective departments. About this period the governments of Mexico, Central America, Columbia, and so on, had succeeded in establishing their independence, and these interesting and important events were the subject of conversation between Mr. Monroe and Mr. Adams. Mr. Monroe asked him what duty was indicated to the United States by the occurrence of these gratifying changes in the aspect of affairs upon this Continent. Mr. Adams replied that it would be a proper occasion on which to announce this principle to the world. He was requested by Mr. Monroe to reduce it to writing. Next day Mr. Adams returned to President Monroe that declaration, which, with possibly a few slight verbal alterations was incorporated in the message. Was it meaningless? No, he replied. It was fraught with meaning, and intended to convey all that it expresses. And Mr. Adams added, that neither the Senator from South Carolina nor any other member of the cabinet heard of it until he heard it read in the message. I asked, did it mean that we should appeal to arms? No, was the reply—that when an attempt of this kind was made, we should first resort to negotiation, and exhaust it; and negotiation having failed, it would then be time to consider the question of peace and war, which would depend entirely upon the importance of the object.

The declaration was officially communicated to the ambassadors of the various European powers represented here. The English minister instantly protested against it. The other European ministers silently acquiesced, with the exception of the Russian ambassador, who took it with a quasi protest, announcing his intention of communicating it to the Emperor for instructions, but the opinion of the Emperor was never returned. Now, I have the authority of that venerable man in making this statement, which I committed to paper on the evening of the day on which I had the interview. It shows that Mr. Monroe and Mr. Adams meant something of that character whether others meant any thing or not. I think it presents a principle upon which alone I would be willing to place myself on the present occasion. I withdraw the appeal to humanity altogether, and I take higher ground. Let us say to the people of Yucatan, that we will act—we will preserve you from destruction—we will prevent the seizure of your territory by any foreign power.

I have spoken at greater length, sir, than I designed, but situated as I am in relation to the measure before the Senate, I could not well have said less. Thanking the Senate for the kindness with which it has heard me, I conclude by imploring you to act speedily if you act at all.

Mr. CLAYTON.—I desire very briefly to state the reasons why I cannot vote for the bill. It goes beyond the recommendation of the President, as I understand it. He does not propose to take military possession of the province of Yucatan. He merely proposes to send our naval forces in the Gulf, not required at other points, to relieve the white inhabitants from the war which is waged against them on the coast.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—The Senator will acknowledge that it is not my habit to interrupt a gentleman when he is addressing the Senate, but I beg that he will allow me to read an extract from the President's message.

Mr. CLAYTON.—I have the message before me, but I shall be very happy to allow the Senator to read any extract from it.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—I am under obligations to the courtesy of the honorable Senator. The President says:

> Whilst still considering Yucatan as a portion of Mexico, it would from its geographical position, be proper, if we deem it proper, during the continuance of the war with Mexico, to occupy and hold military possession of her territory, and to defend the white inhabitants against the incursions of the Indians, in the same way that we have employed our troops in the State of the Mexican republic in our possession, in repelling the attacks of savages upon the inhabitants who have maintained their neutrality in the war.

Mr. CLAYTON.—The President adds:

> But, unfortunately, we cannot at the present, without serious danger, withdraw our forces from other portions of the Mexican territory now in our occupation, and send them to Yucatan. All that can be done, under existing circumstances, is to employ our naval forces in the Gulf, not required at other points, to afford them relief. But it is not to be expected that any adequate protection can thus be afforded, as the operations of such naval forces must, of necessity, be confined to the coast.

I do not then understand the President as being at all responsible for this bill. He has not recommended it. He has said that during the continuance of the war with Mexico we cannot spare the troops, but if he could spare them, he would take military possession of this as of other Mexican provinces; and he would hold it how long? Why, during the continuance of the war with Mexico. The President has not proposed to retain possession of Yucatan an hour longer than the continuance of the contest between us and Mexico. But what does the bill propose? To take military possession, and retain it indefinitely. My honorable friend from Indiana says for his part, he would go still farther, and he says he is prepared for the permanent annexation of Yucatan to the United States. I propose to restrict myself, however, to the bill itself; and I ask the Senate of the United States whether they are prepared to take military possession of this province, a part of Mexico, and hold it for an indefinite period, even after the war shall have ceased?

Mr. HANNEGAN.—The message says "temporary occupation."

Mr. CLAYTON.—That is true. What does it mean? How long is the occupation to last? Why, just as long as you please. The gentleman does not propose any limitation at all, as to the time during which this occupation is to continue. The first question which meets me, and I think will meet others, is this: how does this bill consist with the treaty stipulations which we have recently offered to Mexico? I desire to know from any of the gentlemen who support this bill, or who have intimated a desire to support it, how they can do so consistently with these treaty stipulations? I suppose I am at liberty to say, that we have offered a boundary line to Mexico, and pledged ourselves by treaty, that it should be forever the boundary between Mexico and the United States. Now, Yucatan is, as the President says in his message, at this moment a part of Mexico. We have never recognized her independence. Like many of the other Mexican States she has been occasionally in a state of revolution. But there can be no doubt, that if a treaty of peace should be finally made between this country and Mexico, Mexico would resume her empire over that State. It is now claimed by her, that she has never relinquished her title to Yucatan; and I presume she never will relinquish it. Again, we have stipulated also, after declaring that this shall be the boundary line between us and Mexico, that after a certain period we shall withdraw our troops from every part of that republic. Yet this bill proposes without reference to the continuance of the war, to take and hold military possession of one of the most important provinces of Mexico. It seems to me with all deference to the honorable chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, that this bill violates the treaty in both particulars; first, in reference to the line, and secondly, in respect to our removal of the troops.

Again, it seems to me, that this is a most unfortunate time to make a proposition for the military occupation of any portion of Mexico. I fear the effect of it. It is said that the Mexican Congress is about to assemble at Queretaro, and we have strong hopes that that Congress will ratify the treaty between us and Mexico. Now if at the first moment, after that Congress shall assemble they learn that there is a bill actually pending before the Congress of the United States, which has passed one branch of that Congress, whose provisions are directly in conflict with the solemn stipulations of the very treaty, which they are asked to make with us—that it provides that we are to take and hold one of their most important provinces, I put it to honorable gentlemen, what will be the opinion which that Congress will entertain of our good faith? Will they not believe, notwithstanding all your professions that you are acting from principles of humanity alone, that your real object in making this whole movement, has been, to violate the treaty, to disregard its provisions, and that you now stand ready on the slightest pretext, to cast it to the winds to acquire more Mexican Territory?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland—(in his seat.)—Then there is the armistice.

Mr. CLAYTON.—Sir, as it is suggested, what are you to do with the armistice? That is now in force, and in direct violation of it, you propose to send troops into Mexico! Why this bill appears to me to be so plain a violation of the treaty; and the negotiations which have been entered into between us and Mexico, that I trust it never can obtain the assent of the Senate of the United States.

In regard to those principles of humanity, on which we are called upon to act, I am very willing to adopt the suggestion made by the President of the United States; if he, who ought to understand the subject and doubtless does much better than I do, is of opinion that by sending some portion of our naval force, now in the Gulf, for the relief of these suffering people, their lives may be saved without our being involved in a war. To that extent I am willing to go with all my heart. What I object to is, entering into a war with either the Indians or Creoles of Yucatan, at this or any other time. If we are to act on the great principles of humanity, I desire to know if we are not to have some regard for the health and lives of our own gallant soldiers, who, after having fought through one of the most brilliant campaigns on record, in Mexico, are now, by this bill, to be sent away to Yucatan? I apprehend that there is not a more destructive climate in the world than that of Yucatan for our soldiers. Our army is for the present in Mexico. Are we now at the commencement of the summer months to order the embarkation of any portion of that army at Vera Cruz, or any other point, for Yucatan? Or are they to be marched thither? If you send them there, how many of them are destined to return to their native country?

Mr. HANNEGAN, (in his seat.)—The country around Merida, the capital of Yucatan, is represented as being quite salubrious.

Mr. CLAYTON.—There are various representations on that subject. It is certainly said, that the country through which you approach Merida is extremely unhealthy. Why, before our army went to the Rio Grande it was stated that the country there was very healthy, but how many of our most gallant countrymen perished on the banks of that pestilential river? I take it, that the tropical climate of Yucatan is still more destructive. While fully disposed to carry out the principles of humanity in reference to these Yucatecos, I desire the Senate of the United States to have some regard for the health and lives of our own countrymen. I understand that there are about fifty thousand of the white race in Yucatan, and that nine-tenths of the population consist of Mexican Indians. How many lives have been sacrificed in this conflict? I know not, and I have no means of ascertaining. It has been said, and I believe on credible authority, that the Spanish race is unable to raise an army of more than two thousand men. I suppose then, that we are called upon to send an equal number; and that, with that force, we are to encounter as many assailants as these four hundred and fifty thousand Mexican Indians can muster. I do not know what may be the result of that conflict should we engage in it. I desire a little more light before I engage in such a conflict. I know very well, that we fought with our whole army, a few thousand Indians in Florida for many years, at a cost of about forty millions of dollars. And I know, also, that we have another fight with 40,000 Camanche warriors on our hands, if the Mexican treaty be ratified. Now, I do not desire too many fights on our hands at one time. Aware of the disposition and determination of my countrymen, that if once they enter into a fight with these people, or any other, they never will cease until they have conquered, at whatever cost of blood and treasure; as one of the Senators of the United States I desire to enter upon this business with great caution. I deprecate precipitate action. I desire information to guide my action. The principle of intervention in the affairs of other nations, carried out in this bill, is inconsistent with the farewell admonitions of the father of his country, and with the whole policy of the government under our earlier Presidents. If we adopt it now, it will react upon us at some future day.

I do not think that this is an appropriate time for discussing the question of the war with Mexico. That subject has been already exhausted. I trust that no such issue as that of farther annexation of territory will be brought into the coming Presidential election. I trust that no such issue as that, shall ever again be presented to the American people. We have got into a war, which my friends on the other side as well as myself, regard as having terminated gloriously, so far as the success of our arms is concerned. How much it has cost us, we do not know; and probably we shall not ascertain for a year to come. We have acquired, by that war, that which many regard as an absolute curse, and others as a blessing. Which of these opinions is the true one, remains to be decided. But I think it is a most unfortunate thing to agitate the country about annexation at this moment, and I hope that my friends on the other side do not intend any thing of the kind. I content myself with adding to what I have already said, that I think this measure in direct conflict with the treaty between this country and Mexico, and that from all that I can see of it, if adopted, it will be most disastrous in its consequences. If we do any thing for the relief of Yucatan, it should be done with the consent of the Mexican government. If we enter upon a crusade against these Indians, it ought to be with the consent and cooperation of Mexico. If, without obtaining that consent and cooperation, we embark in this movement, in my judgment, the negotiation of the treaty will be broken up, and Mexico will charge us with having acted in bad faith. For these reasons, sir, I must vote against the bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi.—I have no disposition to follow the Senator from Delaware into any discussion of the treaty, or the probabilities of future annexation. On the treaty, I consider my lips yet sealed. The subject of future annexation, I leave to the future. The President's message distinctly announces that he seeks no annexation of Yucatan. It is not the acquisition of territory to which he directs his attention. He merely points out the sole motive which has prompted him on this occasion, to invoke the action of the legislative branch of the government. Nor do I conceive it necessary at present, to assert that principle, which, when the time arrives, I, like others, shall be ready to maintain; the non-intervention of European powers, in the affairs of the North American continent. I do not think that that principle is involved in this question. We are at war with Mexico. Yucatan is recognized as a part of Mexico; standing neutral, it is true, through the greater part of the war, but on one occasion, throwing off her neutrality, and identifying herself with Mexico, in her war against the United States. Being thus a part of Mexico, the Mexican war covers Yucatan. The President requires no more than a sufficient force to enable him to prosecute his military operations in Yucatan or elsewhere, to save him from the necessity of applying to Congress, for any action at all. It is well known, that a response to his application for an increase of the army, has been long delayed. The measure has been long discussed in this body, and it remains to be seen, how long action upon it may be deferred in the other branch of Congress. In these circumstances, an urgent demand for the presence of American troops in Yucatan, arises; and the President calls upon Congress to give him the means to carry out what was his plain duty, as the chief officer of the Executive government. A portion of that country, against which we made war, and rendered especially helpless by our act of invasion, calls to us in a voice of deep suffering for aid. That is the ground upon which I put this question. This measure is an incident of the Mexican war, which past legislation has declared and recognized.

The President only asks for troops to enable him to carry out an object, entirely consistent with the prosecution of the war against Mexico. It is true that he alludes to the present condition of Yucatan in connection with Great Britain. This is no new announcement. We have seen Great Britain year after year extending her naval stations, until by a line of circumvallation she almost surrounds the gulf of Mexico. We see her posts at telegraphic distances from the banks of the Bahamas to the mouth of the Oronoco. And certainly we may be jealous of any attempt on her part to seize a cape which actually commands the entrance into the gulf from the Carribean sea.—The chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations has appropriately connected with this the question of the pos session of Cuba. Yucatan and Cuba are the salient points commanding the gulf of Mexico, which I hold to be a basin of water belonging to the United States. Whenever the question arises whether the United States shall seize these gates of entrance from the South and East or allow them to pass into the possession of any maritime power, I am ready for one to declare that my step will be forward, and that the cape of Yucatan and the island of Cuba must be ours.

Mr. CLAYTON.—Will the honorable gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DAVIS.—Certainly.

Mr. CLAYTON.—Suppose there should be a negro insurrection in Cuba, and that from motives of humanity Great Britain should interfere and take military possession of that island, for which course we are about to make a precedent, would the honorable Senator hesitate to go to war?

Mr. DAVIS.—Not a moment!

Mr. CLAYTON.—It is the answer that I expected.

Mr. DAVIS.—I have no confidence in the humanity of Great Britain, the great slave-trader of the world. If she should interfere, on any pretext, in the affairs of Cuba, in order to obtain a footing there, I would regard it as a proper occasion to interfere. Great Britan has already attempted, under a pretext of establishing an hospital on the island of Cuba, in connection with her slave ships, to build up a Gibraltar to overlook the Spanish Moro Castle; and if the government of Cuba had yielded to that demand, the weak court of Spain not denying it, I would have considered it as demanding the immediate interference of the United States. The very necessity of defending the United States requires that we should take whatever steps should be necessary always to secure the freedom of the great point of exit and entrance to a large portion of the American coast. But I understand the question of the Senator as making the interference of Great Britain in the affairs of Cuba a parallel case with the present.

Mr. CLAYTON.—I put that case to show the Senator the effect of his own declaration.

Mr. DAVIS.—I saw the conclusion, and was prepared for it.

Mr. CLAYTON.—It is a foregone conclusion.

Mr. DAVIS.—If we were not at war with Mexico, and a war of castes had sprung up in Yucatan, in which we had no right as a belligerent power to interfere, however I might have been pained in beholding the spectacle, I should have viewed it as I did the case of Guatemala, in which the Indian race triumphed, and established, as I will concede to the Senator a better government than Guatemala ever had before. It such were the case at present I would stand quietly by, and let the people decide which race should rule them. But I place this case of Yucatan, solely on the ground of the Mexican war. I have not yet seen any convincing proof that Great Britain has interferred. She has been asked to send some troops, and I believe has sent three companies of artillery.

Mr. CLAYTON.—Is there not an armistice now existing?

Mr. DAVIS.—That originally constituted a difficulty with me, which by one best calculated to construe it, has been removed and does not now interpose any ostacle to my action. I am not apprized at what date that armistice expires, but I think it will come to an end before we can possibly get troops to Yucatan. Again, that armistice points directly to the fact that no new posts are to be taken in Mexico, except on account of hostile movements on her part. Here is a movement, the result of which, we cannot determine. It is like the war of factions all over Mexico. It may be for the purpose of interferring with the progress of the American army in the conclusion of the treaty. Is the Senator from Delaware prepared to say it is not?

I do not rely upon the argument of the honorable Senator, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, based upon the fact that these Indians have been furnished with arms, bearing the Tower mark. It does not follow from that fact, that these arms were furnished by Great Britain. Cæsar, Frederick, and Napoleon the three greatest generals, have demonstrated that celerity of movement is the great groundwork of military success. Great Britain aware of the value of the maxim has been constantly reducing the weight of her arms. The Tower muskets have been condemned and sold as unfit for service. Hence, they are found all over the South American States.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—Has not Great Britain established a great depot of arms at the Belize?

Mr. DAVIS.—Certainly, I am aware of that fact. If she was sending muskets there, however, she would send them from her own armories, and of the present standard. Those Tower muskets were also found in the hands of the Mexicans, having been purchased by those who could obtain only cheap arms, or had less skill in the use of them. Great Britain may be interfering in the affairs of Yucatan, but I am not prepared to jump to that conclusion. Like ourselves she may only be answering the call of humanity; or she may be insidiously arming the Indians. But whether it be the one or the other, it is immaterial to my argument. I take the ground that as we are at war with Mexico, we have a right to establish posts in any part of Mexico, if it be necessary to the prosecution of that war; and if Great Britain steps in when we have prostrated the Mexican government, to take advantage of the condition of affairs and seize Yucatan, we have the right to interpose. We are the belligerent power; we may take up positions within that territory; and with the highest motives of humanity and policy assert our right to exclude any other power from seizing Mexico, or any portion of her territory in the present prostrate condition to which she has been reduced by us. In my judgment, therefore, the President has placed the question on the true ground.

I rise to offer an amendment to the bill, upon the ground simply of the urgent demand which exists for the immediate increase of the army, and to give power to the President to call out troops to supply the place of those withdrawn from the army for the purpose of holding posts in Yucatan. With these introductory remarks, I beg to offer my amendment.

The amendment which is as follows, and is a substitute for the whole bill, was then read:

Be it enacted, &c., That the President be, and hereby is authorized and empowered to accept the services of an equal number of volunteer troops to supply the place of such as may be withdrawn from their present duty, to answer to the exigent demand for the immediate presence of a portion of our army in Yucatan: Provided, Their services shall be required. The same to be raised, in service during the war with Mexico, agreeably to the provision of the act of May, [illegible] eighteen hundred and forty seven.

Mr. UPHAM.—I would ask if the President has not the right now to increase the army to the extent of twelve thousand volunteers?

Mr. DAVIS.—The President is authorized to call out a certain number of volunteers by regiments. These regiments were called out. They have wasted away in the service, and it would take perhaps the number named to fill up the ranks of regiments already existing in the volunteer service, but the only way in which that can be done is by recruiting, and recruiting for volunteer regiments has been found to be so difficult, that no one looks to it as a means of increasing the army with the rapidity required by this exigency.

The Senator from Delaware, I may remark before I resume my seat, represents Yucatan as a sickly country, and speaks of the sufferings of our troops in Mexico. Now, I do not believe that the interior, either of Yucatan or of Mexico are sickly, but when new troops are sent to a tropical climate in the summer season, exposed to the inclemencies of camp life, and put upon soldier's fare, they are liable to contract disease, partly in consequence of their want of knowledge of the proper mode of encampment, and of the best means of protecting themselves. Hence the necessity for sending into a new country troops that have had some experience; and in sending out fresh volunteers, they should be mingled for a time with troops that have been in service, from whom they can learn all the necessary means of taking care of themselves in a climate, the peculiarities of which are to be learned.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—It appears to me that the amendment of the honorable Senator from Mississippi, entirely changes the character of this bill, and that it is simply a proposition to increase the military force employed in the war with Mexico. In that point of view there is no occasion for this measure whatever. My honorable friend from Michigan [Mr. CASS,] has been laboriously marching forward—slowly, I acknowledge, but not the less diligently—for the last two months, at the head of his twenty thousand militia men! They are, indeed, now pretty well advanced, and every day the word has been "forward—march!" Where is the necessity, then, for introducing this special bill for the purpose of making an uncertain and indefinite augmentation of the army, instead of taking the bill which has already been proposed, providing for an army commensurate with all the exigencies of the war? The amendment makes this bill nothing more than a provision for the general purposes and exigencies of the war, according to the discretion of the Executive who has the management and control of it—nothing more. The twenty thousand volunteer bill has the same purpose for its object. Why then introduce another measure to effect the same object? If there be any new exigency, demanding the augmentation of the twenty thousand volunteers, we have only to amend that bill and enlarge that measure. The bill now before the Senate has a peculiar and especial object and purpose which have been explained to us by the honorable chairman of the Committee, and by the message of the President of the United States. My friend's amendment cuts loose the bill from the object of the President altogether. The object of the President is to rescue an unhappy people overwhelmed by a savage foe. That is his object. But the amendment proposes to increase the army so as to give to the President a force adequate to affect the military occupation of the country as a measure in our war with Mexico. But, sir, we may have, and I trust that at this day we have, a treaty ratified which is to give peace to this country and Mexico. What then becomes of the message of the President and the object of this bill, if you connect this warfare in Yucatan as merely incidental with your war in Mexico? If the war with Mexico is terminated by a treaty of peace, the incident goes along with it, and you do not interfere at all. The amendment of the gentleman has for its object the following up of purposes of war, and the abandonment of the purposes of peace and preservation proposed by the message under consideration.

If the exigencies of this war, or the interests or honor of this country require it, I am prepared to vote for any additional number of men that may be necessary for the general purposes of the war. But as to this particular measure, and this particular object proposed by the President, it seems to me that it is subject to great objections—objections of the gravest character. This interposition in Yucatan is not proposed by the President as a part and parcel of the Mexican war, for the Mexican war has for its object the prostration of our enemy; and Yucatan, he says, is a portion of Mexico, and therefore our enemy. So far from having any destructive purpose of war, the measure proposed has for its object purposes of preservation and charity. It is in that point of view that it seems to me to be subject to very grave objections. It seems somewhat surprising to me, that it has not been thought necessary to accompany this certainly extraordinary proposition with an official copy of the armistice lately made between the forces of the United States and those of Mexico—an armistice extending to and beyond Yucatan. I hear differences of opinion expressed among gentlemen, how far the measure proposed might be consistent with the armistice? I cannot conceive—though I have not lately seen a copy of that armistice, never having seen an official copy of it—that it would be by any possibility consistent with it, to give to either party the privilege of extending itself, or making additional preparations for war. That is not the object of an armistice. Can it be possibly supposed, that under the terms of this armistice, we could extend our military occupation over all Mexico? No. And I can scarcely conceive of a construction of any armistice which could allow us to take military possession of a province of the enemy, not in our possession when the armistice was made.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi.—I beg to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that there was an express provision in the armistice, that in the case of any military movements being made, we had the right to send our troops to counteract them.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—I suppose it may be fairly inferred that that provision had reference only to such military operations as were supposed to be hostile to us.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, (in his seat.)—Yes; I have no doubt such was the understanding of the provision.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—Let it be recollected that this civil war raged in Yucatan at the very time that the armistice was made, and if the understanding had been that Yucatan was not included in the terms of the armistice, it would have been mentioned and so stipulated. But I may be mistaken about this armistice. I think, however, we should know precisely what it is, before we enter upon a movement which may be in violation of its terms. Suppose, however, all this difficulty removed. Our humanity is invoked in behalf of a suffering people; and the question is whether it is sound policy on our part, on such an occasion, to engage in a foreign war. I hope I am not destitute of the proper feelings that belong to us on such an occasion; but it seems to me, that such a step would be an exceedingly perilous one, leading us into new and untried scenes of public policy. The proposition wants a definitiveness, that would enable us to determine, with any degree of certainty, what would be the consequences of this step. The bill provides for a military occupation of Yucatan, as a thing distinct from, and independent of, our war with Mexico. I suppose it is so considered by the honorable chairman of the committee.

Mr. HANNEGAN signified his assent.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—Then, how long is the occupation to continue? To what extent? Every thing, sir, is here boundless, both as regards time and space! Is it not a perilous step, then, which we are called upon to take? We are called upon, then, from motives of humanity, to involve our country, to an extent of which we know nothing, in foreign difficulties, foreign wars, and vast expenditures of the public money. How far ought we to go? Are we not transgressing altogether that principle of non-intervention, which lies at the foundation of the security of nations? It is not merely a sound rule of domestic policy, but it is a great principle, which seems to me to be necessary to the preservation of nations in their distinct and independent character. If this doctrine of the right of intervention be generally admitted, the ambitious nation which seeks aggrandizement and extension of power, will employ every pretext and be satisfied with the slightest reasons, to act upon the principle. The consequences will be apparent. The violation of the principle of non-intervention is calculated to fill the world with distress, discord and war! It will produce atrocities every where, at which humanity would shudder. The intervention of one nation on the pretence of humanity, would furnish the pretext for another to interfere, and in order to check the inhumanity which they would charge upon the former. And thus wars originally made for peace and preservation, will be multiplied one upon another. We make war upon what we call the savages of Yucatan, to prevent them from murdering, or to punish them for murdering the white inhabitants of Yucatan. England, or France, or Spain, makes war upon us; because she alleges we have interfered needlessly, and are unnecessarily putting to death the aboriginal inhabitants of the country. Thus, sir, war is got up on all sides in the name of humanity; and in the name of humanity there is a continued slaughtering war spreading throughout the world. It may be so. Ought we not then to be a little careful—however laudable may be the motives which impel us—however active may be our feelings of benevolence—that we do not suffer ourselves in this instance, to violate one of these great principles upon which the security and peace of men, and of nations repose—lest by our misjudged humanity, and by the dangerous example which we set we aid in the subversion of the peace and order of society, and add to these very evil which we deprecate, and in the vain hope of averting which, we embark in this war? There will be wars; there will be rumors of wars. And when will they cease, or how are they to be made to cease? By our interposition, or the interposition of the army of any single nation? No. It is a higher and mightier Power alone that can stay the course of war, destructive war, unjust war, waged in various quarters of the globe. How many unjust wars are now going on in the world? How many wars comparatively are just? Very few. There are but few of which history gives any account. Mr. President, are we to enter upon these new schemes? Ours has been the safe doctrine, and policy, of non-intervention. We meddle with none, and we allow none to meddle with us. We cannot take too much care to maintain that policy, now, and forever. We shall acquire more honor in that way than in any other. We shall contribute most to the great principle of peace among men, by that course, rather than by adopting active intervention upon whatever plausible pretext. It is the safest and best course for us—not that I would not if it were in the way, save those who are assailed, succor the distressed, rescue the feeble from the hands of the murderer; but we cannot upon general principles undertake the correction of these excesses, and the persecution of these savages, by any general system of national policy. We cannot as a nation step out such a course of policy. If we do, we bring upon ourselves general destruction, and do not accomplish the object at which we aim.

But, Mr. President, there is beyond all this, an entire want of the necessary information upon this subject that will enable us to interpose with justice. We hear but one side upon this question I am without information as to the other side of the question. I am entirely without information as to the merits of this warfare, which is waged in Yucatan. Its mode is said to be an unlawful one, one of indiscriminate slaughter? That is wrong in itself, whatever may be the merits of the controversy. But before we interpose, we ought to know something of the merits of the controversy itself. Who complain? Are they the majority of the people of the country? Undoubtedly they are the mere minority. They must be in a minority, or how could they come here as men, and seek as suppliants for the assistance of a foreign nation?—And are we, without examination, simply upon the cry of the minority, to interfere and take up arms and unsheath our swords against the majority? Why, to do so, would be in violation of the principle that we recognize as the foundation of government. We presume here, that the majority is right, and it seems to me but fair that we should carry out the principle. The persons against whom this complaint is made of carrying on an inhuman warfare, are the aboriginal inhabitants of the country. What is their condition? I am, for one, but very imperfectly informed respecting it.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—(in his seat.)—They are savages.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—I do not understand it so. If so, what a mighty reproach it must be to the men who are calling to us for assistance.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—The whites muster but two thousand troops.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—For three hundred years they have governed these people, and been teaching them religion, and giving them knowledge and education. And now they come and tell us that these people are still savages, when church and state have had them under their direction for three hundred years. They must have been very badly governed, and the government must have been a very unjust one, at least a very unparental one, if after three hundred years of subjection, they are still in their savage state. Now, I apprehend my friend is a good deal mistaken. They may be savages in point of education and information, in comparison with what we have called savages. The relation which they sustain in Yucatan is not the relation which the savages of our country have borne towards us. These people are citizens. There is no such thing as slavery there in the legal sense of the term.

Mr. CLAYTON.—(in his seat.)—They have the right of suffrage.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—They enjoy civil rights. But such civil rights and such enjoyment of them as the laws of Spanish colonization have left, to the conquered people of South America. A state of subjugation I acknowledge; but what are these people attempting to do in Yucatan more than has been done by these people in Guatemala, which we have considered as a government, and to which we send a diplomatic agent? What are they doing, but what has been successfully done by the people of Guatemala about twenty years ago, when one of their chiefs, at the head of the Indian population—who would be better understood in this country if we were to call them native Mexicans—or the aboriginal inhabitants of the country—throwing off the yoke of the Spaniard, established a government for themselves? They have risen up against the descendants of the Spaniards, by whom they were first conquered, have overthrown them, and have governed that country very well from that time to the present. I know of no difference between these Indians and those who are termed savages in Yucatan; but I may be mistaken. I wish a great deal more information than I now have, before I can venture to vote for this bill. If our humanity must interpose, I would rather send an umpire to examine into the justice of the case, before we should take part with either side. Let us, at least, at least judges before we become executioners. It seems to me extremely unwise, and manifestly unjust, to enter into a controversy on the character of matter and judge, without knowing anything whatever, of its merits. While I say all this, there is nothing short of entangling ourselves with this principle of intervention, as now presented, nothing short of adopting it as a principle of policy, that I would not be willing to do, to rescue the descendants of these Spaniards, the white possessors of Yucatan, from the cruelties to which they are now exposed in a servile warfare. We may infer that from the parties engaged in it. Who are they? We all know. They are the aboriginal inhabitants of the country, who for three hundred years have been the victims of mis-government and cruelty; for three hundred years they have suffered the oppression of the Spanish yoke. They have worn it upon their galled necks. That the warfare between these two races after the accumulation of such a debt of wrongs now should be characterized, as it is, as opposed to all the dictates of justice and humanity will not be regarded as surprising by any one who knows Latin-American history. But I would not stand by and, if I could prevent it, behold the accomplishment of this work of vengeance. I would assert it, if I could. I would negotiate between these parties. I would put them at peace, one with the other; and if I could not succeed, and found that one party was, without cause, murdering their innocent neighbors, I would not hesitate for a moment to arrest the blow. But as for banishing an army of our own citizens to that territory there to remain, I know not how long, that is another question altogether. How long are they to remain there? Suppose the savages recoil and flee to the fastnesses, of which we are informed in these documents, there to nourish the vengeance which our interposition has restricted, will it not be only to pounce upon their prey as soon as we are absent? Does not the [illegible] from Indiana perceive that our occupation of the territory may be almost interminable. If our object be to protect the inhabitants must we not remain there to protect them, until the vengeance of the Indians be extinguished? And how long will it be till these fifty thousand of the white race shall become strong enough to protect themselves? Are we to stay there till that time shall arrive? To consummate our act of humanity we are bound to do so. We are not to protect them for a day and have them slaughtered on the morrow. In order to make our interposition effectual the army must remain there, and it is because I want information that I cannot now act upon this bill, assuring the gentleman at the same time that there is no duty of humanity, none of its tenderest obligations which I do not stand ready to perform, so far as I can do so consistently with the great national trust which is committed to me as one of the Senators of the United States.

Our first duty is to ourselves, and our own fellow-citizens. Our first duty is to our own country. That discharged all that we can do for the benefit of mankind, all that we can do to raise up the fallen, and relieve the distressed I am willing to do, but when you demand of me this particular act of interposition, I want to know all the circumstances which can guide me in forming a judgment of the probable extent of that service to which by my vote I have committed my country. How many men will we be bound to furnish by this bill? How much money will we be called upon to expend? How long have you bound us to this service? All these questions we ought to be prepared to answer for ourselves, in order that we may answer them to our constituents. At present I can answer none. I must, therefore, vote against this bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, I understood the senator from Kentucky, his objection to the bill as I have proposed to amend it, arises out of the existing armistice between the United States and Mexico. In addition to the stipulation before mentioned by me, the Senator will find two general exceptions to the condition of the armistice. One to restrain the Indians from predatory incursions upon the Mexican settlements; the other, where armed men may be found banded together acting without the authority of either of the contracting parties. The first case gives the right to pass limits of present occupation, the second makes it the duty of both contracting parties to suppress such lawless or insurrectionary movements. Within one or other of these exceptions the contemplated campaign in Yucatan must be included.

Mr. FOOTE.—I do not propose to occupy much of the time of the Senate. Indeed, I paused to see if some other gentleman would not proceed to address the body; but discovering there is no one who seems disposed to rise, and having a few remarks to make, I may as well, perhaps, proceed to reply to a portion of the speech of the Senator from Kentucky.

The chief Executive of this republic is the most unfortunate man in the world. The Senator from South Carolina has no objection at all to the proposition presented to us, except that the President did not confine himself exclusively to the high ground of humanity; whilst on the other hand, his placing it on the ground of humanity constitutes, with the Senator from Kentucky, an insurmountable objection. It is quite impossible that the President can conform to the taste and judgment of both these distinguished Senators. If he can make an approximation it would seem, to the views of both, it is as much as can be reasonably expected to be accomplished. The distinguished Senator from Kentucky ought to be the last to object to this measure on the ground of humanity. That Senator is the great teacher of humanity. It was from his eloquent lips that I heard last year, when sitting behind the bar of this chamber, a most stirring appeal in favor of humanity, every word of which went to my heart; every argument that he uttered had more or less influence upon my understanding. It was an appeal in behalf of the suffering Irish. The Senator from Kentucky, with that commiserative sympathy for the sufferings of his fellow-beings, which constitutes equally his ornament as a private citizen and his glory as a high-souled statesman, brought forward and sustained by his irresistable eloquence, a measure for the relief of the starving sons and daughters of Erin, which did the highest honor to his heart, and, as I think, imparted additional dignity to his character as a public man. From him we all learned, on the occasion referred to, that one of the highest duties which a government like ours can perform, is that of looking out sometimes beyond our own borders, and administering to the wants of others who have, strictly speaking, no legal claim to our bounty. Then he informed us that we owed it to our own character as one of the civilized nations of earth, to evince on all suitable occasions, the absence of every thing like cold-hearted selfishness, or apathetic indifference to the happiness of other human beings, wherever situated—whether located in our own vicinage, or separated from us by the wide Atlantic. The Senator now instructs us, as I understand him, very differently, indeed. He advises us to look closer to our own concerns as a nation, and suggests that our charity will be most judiciously displayed by confining its cheering influence to domestic objects. I was not prepared for this second lesson from the distinguished Senator, nor do I see how he can enforce the views which he at present enunciates, without somewhat impairing the glory which he has heretofore acquired as a political philanthropist. Sir, the case of intense human suffering which has been so pathetically presented to us by the Senator from Indiana, has been seldom surpassed in the annals of civilization; the picture of wretchedness, destitution, murder, ravage, and desolation, which has been so glowingly delineated by the chairman of the Committee of Foreign Relations, needs no additional coloring from me, in order to be enabled to awaken, in all who shall behold it, sentiments of sorrow and shame, and of intense indignation.—The evidence submitted to us of present distress, and the ten times greater distress which is obviously threatened, is so conclusive, that I am persuaded that we cannot refuse the aid demanded by the unfortunate people of Yucatan, without incurring the most profound and lasting disgrace which has ever been incurred by any great nation, in ancient or modern times. It was certainly not thus that Rome was seen to act when the Grecian colony of Marseilles appealed to her for protection against the barbarians who menaced her with destruction; nor can we extract one justifying precept from the whole code of pagan ethics, for such a course of disgraceful inaction as that to which we are advised. One of the most distinguished of the classic historians of Rome has told us—

Idem velle atque idem nolle, ea demum firma amicitia est—and surely we all feel, sir, how closely the sympathies of human hearts become intertwined, and how powerfully our own sensibilities are often awakened to the duties of heaven-born charity, by finding that the objects presented to us for commiseration and relief, are persons whose moral and intellectual qualities are entirely in unison with our own. In the case now under consideration, we learn that civilized men have been overrun by barbarians—that their towns and villages have been burnt down or otherwise destroyed—that their property has been seized upon—that thousands have been massacred in cold blood, "without distinction of age, or sex, or condition"—that their merciless enemies are still pursuing them, and are determined still to pursue them, with all the nameless horrors of the most infernal savage warfare, until the whole white race in Yucatan shall have been utterly exterminated, and all the vestiges of civilization shall be made to disappear throughout that unhappy country. Men, women, and children cry out to us in tones of agony that pierce the sky—fellow Christians devoutly implore our protection—a civilized race invokes us to shelter them from the unsparing violence of enraged barbarians; and when we propose to administer, in moderation, some small aid to those who are bound to us by such tender ties of moral and religious brotherhood, we are coldly urged to pause—to wait until we can send a special agent to Yucatan, to ascertain who is in the wrong, the civilized class, or their barbarian enemies; after which we will be able to act more understandingly and with less risk of committing some mistake in the affair!! I should certainly have sooner expected such admonitions from any other quarter than the one whence it has emanated on the present occasion. So much for the question of humanity; I will not enlarge upon it; it cannot be necessary in this illustrious body.

And now, sir, let me examine for a moment the other question growing out of the celebrated recommendation of Mr. Monroe, concerning which we have of late had so much discussion, both here and elsewhere. This chances to be no new topic, but has been much and ably debated, at different periods, in both houses of the national legislature; but the doctrine of non-interference on the part of the European power in the concerns of this continent, has, so far as I am informed, had comparatively few opponents any where. I regret to know that the wisest and most salutary principle announced and acted upon by the administration of Mr. Monroe, has met with the sternest and most deadly opposition from a surviving member of the cabinet by which it was, at the period of its original announcement, unanimously approved. I have heard from various sources heretofore the history of this part of Mr. Monroe's messages; and that it was unanimously and deliberately sanctioned by his whole cabinet, we have all long since learned from contemporaneous history, and we would equally have inferred it from the fact, that no protest against it [illegible] to the public attention, and no disapprobation has been at any time insinuated, even by the Senator from South Carolina, now so vehement in his denunciations, until very recently, indeed. In confirmation of this statement, I beg leave to read a short extract from a memorable speech, delivered in the other wing of this capitol, by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, now so unhappily detained from his seat here by domestic afflictions, in the year 1826. The gentleman alluded to, thus spoke in reference to the declaration of Mr. Monroe, of late grown so odious to some of its former friends:

"It has been said, in the course of this debate, to have been a bravado upon the occasion. It was, I have still and again declared. It was understood, immediately after the delivery of the message, and decidedly approved by every one of the President's advisers at that time."

When this account of the matter was given in the House of Representatives, by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, the Senator from South Carolina was presiding in this body, must have read the speech, and yet did not undertake to deny the correctness of the assertion contained in it relative to the unanimous and deliberate approval of the principle now in question by the whole cabinet. I think he will have to admit at least, that, if under this message of Mr. Monroe, his countrymen have been led into error, and have been persuaded into the adoption of a principle now deemed by him so unsound and dangerous, he is himself not altogether free from censure in the premises.

But, Mr. President, I hold the declaration of Mr. Monroe in as much respect now as I have ever done heretofore; and I am gratified that the present Executive has so strikingly and repeatedly manifested his own deliberate regard for it. It asserts a principle which, I am satisfied, is indispensable to the stability of our republic, our safety from foreign violence, and our exemption from influences unfriendly to our peculiar institutions. I shall not enter at this time into a labored vindication of Mr. Monroe's declaration; perhaps its wisdom has been sufficiently established by experience. I will, however, read a few extracts from the speech already referred to, supposing that they may be not without some pertinency and cogency upon the minds of those who hold the opinions of the distinguished gentleman by whom it was delivered, in special respect:

"Sir," said the gentleman alluded to, "I agree with those who maintain the proposition, and I contend against those who deny it, that the message did mean something, that it meant much; and I maintain, against both, that the declaration effected much good, answered the end designed by it, did great honor to the foresight and the spirit of the government, and that it could now be taken back, retracted, or annulled, without disgrace. It met, sir, with the entire concurrence, and the entire approbation of the country. The tone which it uttered found a core sounding response in the breasts of the free people of the United States. That people saw, and they rejoiced to see, that, on a fit occasion, our weight had been thrown into the right scale, and that, without departing from our duty, we had done something which was calculated powerfully for the cause of civil liberty—one general glow of exaltation—one universal feeling for the gratified love of liberty. One conscious and proud perception of the considerations which the message suggested to the people had burned which needed to be pervaded all bosoms. Possibly the public enthusiasm went too far: it certainly did go far.

"But, sir, the sentiment which this declaration inspired was not confined to ourselves. Its force was felt every where by all those who could understand its object, and foresee its effect. In that very House of Commons, of which the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. Hayne] was a member, how was it received? Not only, sir, with approbation, but, I may say, with the utmost enthusiasm.

"I have been a good deal surprised at the declaration against European colonies in America. The late President seems to have thought the moment a good one to put on record a solemn protest to the powers around of the principle which had already been acted on. Great and important principles, it was feared, might be approbated, from the establishment of new colonies in America, having a European origin and a European connection. Attempts of that kind, it was obvious, might possibly be made, amidst the changes that were taking place in Mexico, as well as in the more southern States. Mexico bounds us, on a vast length of line, from the Gulf of Mexico to the Pacific ocean. There are many reasons why it should not be desired by us, that an establishment, under the protection of a different power, should occupy any portion of that space. We have a great interest, that, though all the vast territories rescued from the dominion of Spain, our own means might have its way protected by treaties with governments existing on the spot. These views, and others of a similar character, rendered it highly desirable by us, that these new States should settle it, as part of their policy, not to allow colonization within their respective territories. True, indeed, we did not rest our right to aid us in maintaining such a course for ourselves; but we had an interest in their assertion and support of the principles as applicable to their own territories."

And now sir, having, as I think, vindicated both the ground of "humanity" and that of "policy" which have been taken in the President's message, I will offer one or two observations further upon the latter of them. I confess, Mr. President, that whilst I would be willing to do all that Yucatan requests, because I deem her suffering people entitled to our sympathies, I am not wholly unmindful of the fact, that if we do not grant her assistance she is likely to receive it from other powers—from England especially. She has made application for aid and offered to surrender the territorial dominion of her country either to Spain or Great Britain, if we refuse to recognize her as entitled to our sympathetic regard. Suppose we do refuse the succor applied for, and Great Britain, more mindful of her national honor as well as her policy, should grant it, and proceed to take possession of the country, (all of which she is certain to do, as I think no one can doubt who has examined the documents upon our table,) what will we say then? What will we do? Will we then go back to the message of Mr. Monroe, and order her to retire from her newly acquired domain? Or will we submit to her retaining possession of Yucatan? If we do, then it is plain that Cuba will also shortly be in British possession. Long has England been sighing for this rich prize; and nothing has deterred her from seizing upon it but the declaration of Mr. Monroe, and the well-founded belief which she entertained that that declaration would be maintained by arms if necessary. Let her ascertain once that our government has resolved to cower before her, and to permit her to colonize again on this continent, and she will own Cuba and all Mexico up to the Rio Grande, in less than ten years from the present time. No man is excusable for not comprehending this branch of the policy of Great Britain; it has been developed in a thousand instances, many of which are too recent to have been forgotten by any member of this body. But, sir, I take it for granted that were we even to allow Great Britain to get possession of Yucatan, and thus open the way to farther conquests on the American continent, the citizens of this republic would never permit her to hold it in her grasp. They would prefer going to war to submitting to evils worse than war. If we would and ought to be resisted in the case stated, I earnestly ask, why shall not war be averted by the only means capable of being used for that purpose; viz—the present occupation of Yucatan ourselves as proposed to us? Sir, I confess that I am willing to go farther in securing our country from prospective dangers than this bill proposes to go. I should be willing to acquire Cuba at once from Spain, by purchase, on just and equitable terms. We have reason to believe that the present is a particularly favorable period for attempting this important movement. If we neglect our interest in this matter, no reasonable man can doubt that the opportunity of obtaining this noble island will have passed away forever. With Cuba and Yucatan we will have complete control of the Gulf of Mexico, and of all the commerce that floats over its surface; we will have it in our power to establish at once a direct communication between the Pacific and Atlantic oceans; we will be able to secure to ourselves the rich monopoly of the East India trade; we will be safe in every direction from foreign assailment. Without both Yucatan and Cuba—(and doubtless they must shortly belong to the same power)—to what inconveniences and dangers must we always be exposed? Other Senators have pointed these out so particularly, that it is unnecessary for me to dwell upon them.

But the Senator from Kentucky supposes that we sustain the same relations to Yucatan and Cuba that the powers of Europe do—that we have no greater right to complain of their interfering in the affairs of this continent, than if this intervention should occur in Europe; or, rather that we have no more right to complain of such intervention by any European power than that power would have to complain of such intervention on our part. That Senator seems to place no value upon the circumstance of local proximity; and yet this circumstance has been relied on by a distinguished statesman of the whig school, in a speech which has already supplied me with several valuable extracts for the edification of his brethren of this body, as authorizing even a declaration of war, by the United States, against any power of Europe who should undertake to possess herself of Cuba, either by conquest or purchase. I read for the instruction of Senators on the other side of the chamber, as follows:

"I now proceed, Mr. Chairman, to offer a few remarks on the subject of Cuba—the most important point of our foreign relations. It is the hinge on which interesting events may possibly turn. I pray gentlemen to review their opinions on this subject before they fully commit themselves. I understand the honorable member from South Carolina to say, that if Spain chose to transfer this island to any power in Europe, she had a right to do so, and we could not interfere to prevent it. Sir, this is a delicate subject. I hardly feel competent to treat it as it deserves; and I am not quite willing to state here all that I think about it. I must, however, dissent from the opinion of the gentleman from South Carolina. The rights of nations, on subjects of this kind, are necessarily very much modified by circumstances. Because England or France could not rightfully complain of the transfer of Florida to us, it by no means follows, as the gentleman supposes, that we could not complain of the cession of Cuba to one of them. The plain reason is, that the transfer of Florida to us was not dangerous to the safety of either of those nations, nor fatal to any of their great and essential interests. Proximity of position, neighborhood, whatever augments the power of injuring and annoying, very properly belongs to the consideration of all cases of this kind. The greater or less facility of access itself is of consideration in such questions, because it longs, or may bring, weighty consequences with it. It justifies, for these reasons and on these grounds, a full control of that island, in the sense I have mentioned. By treaty with a foreign power, Mr. Jefferson obtained a province. Without any alteration of our constitution, we have made it part of the United States, and its Senators and Representatives, now coming from a remote region, are here among us. Now, sir, if, instead of being Louisiana, this had been one of the provinces of Spain proper, or one of her South American colonies, he must have been a madman, that should have proposed such an acquisition. A high convention of its convenience, arising from proximity, and from close natural connection, alone reconciled the country to the measure. Considerations of the same sort have weight in other cases.

"An honorable member from Kentucky, [Mr. WICKLIFFE,] argues, that, although we might rightfully prevent another power from taking Cuba from Spain by force, yet, if Spain should choose to make the voluntary transfer, we should have no right whatever to interfere. Sir, this is a distinction without a difference. If we are likely to have contention about Cuba, let who will contend, we must assert rights, and not commit ourselves. And, sir, if we have any right to interfere at all, it applies as well to the case of a peaceable, as to that of a forcible transfer. If nations be at war, we are not judges of the question of right in that war; we must acknowledge, in both parties, the mutual right of attack, and the mutual right of conquest. It is not for us to set bounds to their belligerent operations, so long as they do not affect ourselves. Our right to interfere, sir, in any such case, is but the exercise of the right of reasonable and necessary self-defence. It is a high and delicate exercise, one not to be made but on grounds of strong and manifest reason, justice, and necessity. The real question is, whether the possession of Cuba by a great maritime power of Europe, would seriously endanger our own immediate security, or our essential interests. I put the question, sir, in the language of some of the best considered State papers of modern times. The general rule of national law, is, most undoubtedly, quite otherwise in the transactions of other States. There are, however, acknowledged exceptions, growing out of circumstances. These exceptions, it has been properly said, cannot, without danger, be reduced to precise rule, and incorporated into the ordinary diplomacy of nations. Nevertheless, they do exist, and must be judged of when they arise, with a just regard to our own essential interests, but in a spirit of strict justice and delicacy also towards foreign States.

"The ground of these exceptions is, as I have already stated, self-preservation. It is not a slight injury to our interest—it is not even a great inconvenience that makes out a case. There must be danger to our security, or danger, manifest and imminent danger, to our essential rights and our essential interests. Now, sir, let us look at Cuba. I need hardly refer to its present amount of commercial connection with the United States. Our statistical tables, I presume, would show us that our commerce with the Havana alone is more in amount than our commercial intercourse with France and all the other countries. But this is but one part of the case—no the most important. Cuba, as is well said in the report of the Committee of Foreign Affairs, is placed in the mouth of the Mississippi. Its occupation by a strong maritime power would be felt in the first moment of hostility, as far up the Mississippi and the Missouri as our population extends. It is the commanding point of the Gulf of Mexico. See, too, how it lies in the very line of our coast-wise traffic, interposed in the very highway between New York and New Orleans. Now, sir, who has estimated, or who can estimate, the effect of a change which should place this island in other hands, subject it to new rules of commercial intercourse, or connect it with objects of a different and still more dangerous nature? Sir, I repeat that I feel no disposition to pursue this topic on the present occasion. My purpose is only to show its importance, and to urge gentlemen not to prejudice any right of the country, by assenting to propositions which, perhaps, may be necessary to be retracted.

"And here I differ again with the gentleman from Kentucky. He thinks that, in this as in other cases, we should wait till the event comes, without any previous declaration of pretentions upon subjects important to our own rights or interests. Sir, such declarations are often appropriate means of preventing that, which, if unprevented, might be difficult to redress. A great object in holding diplomatic intercourse, is frankly to expose the views and objects of nations, and to prevent, by candid explanation, collision and war. In this sense, the government has said that we could not assent to the transfer of Cuba to another European State.

"'On suppositions?' Do gentlemen think we can? If not, then it was entirely proper that the intimation should be frankly and seasonably made. Candor required it, and it would have been unpardonable; it would have been injustice as well as folly to have been silent while we might suppose the transaction to be contemplated, and then to complain of it afterwards. If we should have a subsequent right to complain, we have a previous right, equally clear, of protesting; and if the evil be one which, when it comes, would allow us to apply a remedy, it not only allows it, but it makes it our duty, also, to apply prevention."

And now, Mr. President, what remains for us to do, but to support this bill, simply and heartily, in the form in which it has been offered to us by our committee. I see no necessity for material amendment of any kind; and I feel bound to declare that I am particularly opposed to the amendment introduced by my worthy colleague, which, in my judgment, would seriously jeopard the success of the measure contemplated. For, if our sending troops, munitions of war, and money to Yucatan, be made to depend on the continuance of the war with Mexico, it may happen that we may get intelligence of the ratification of the treaty in Mexico just after the passage of this bill through both houses of Congress, and we shall thus be compelled to refuse the aid requested, solely for want of adequate legislation. Having ample confidence in the Executive, I am willing to commit the whole matter to his discretion, and have no doubt that his action will be wise, energetic, and successful.

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, MAY 8, 1848.

RESOLUTIONS OF STATE LEGISLATURES.

Mr. DIX presented a resolution passed by the Legislature of the State of New York, in favor of the payment of the claims of American citizens, for spoliations committed by France prior to the year 1800, which was read, and ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. DIX, in presenting the resolutions said, he owed it to the Legislature of the State of New York, and to himself to observe, that during the second session of Congress, after he had the honor of taking his seat on this floor, this subject came before the Senate, and he was appointed a member of the Select Committee, to which the application of the claimants was referred. A majority of the committee were in favor of satisfying the claims, and to report a bill for that purpose. In one respect in which an honorable Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. MANGUM,] not now in his seat, he had dissented from the opinion of the majority of the committee, and it had become his duty to oppose the report, and to defend the position of the minority. Though they had both regarded the cases of the claimants as special grounds of liability, they did not think it could, either in justice or in equity, be thrown directly or indirectly upon the public Treasury. He had seen no cause to change the opinion he had then formed after the most careful examination he had been able to give to the subject, though we regretted to find his opinion at variance with that of the Legislature of the State he had the honor in part to represent here; he should, if the resolutions contained an instruction, pay a cheerful obedience to them. But it will be observed that the Legislature has not given to the resolutions such a binding force, the Senators and representatives in Congress are "earnestly requested" to support the claim. He would, therefore, only add, that if the subject should come before Congress, he should pay to the request of the Legislature the most respectful consideration.

Mr. PALMER presented a resolution passed by the Legislature of the State of Vermont, in favor of the construction of a railroad from Lake Michigan to the Pacific Ocean upon the plan proposed by Asa Whitney; which was ordered to lie upon the table and be printed.

AID TO YUCATAN.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to enable the President of the United States to take temporary military occupation of Yucatan.

The question pending was upon agreeing to the amendment submitted on the 5th instant, by Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi.

Mr. HOUSTON addressed the Senate at length in favor of the bill. His speech is given in the Appendix.

Mr. NILES intimated his intention to submit some remarks upon this bill, but desired an opportunity to examine the documents which had recently been laid before the Senate, upon the subject to which the bill related.

Mr. GREENE.—I am informed that there is some Executive business to be transacted, and as it is late in the day, if there be no objection, I will propose that the bill be passed over informally.

Mr. FOOTE.—There is an urgent matter of business to be transacted in Executive session.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—If the Senator from Connecticut is not ready to proceed with the discussion of this bill, I suppose some other Senator is ready. It is very important that the bill should be speedily passed.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland.—I understand the honorable Senator from Connecticut to say that he desires to examine the documents connected with this subject. They were laid upon the table only this morning I believe, and I suppose there are not three Senators who have seen them. The Senator is naturally desirous of informing himself first of the facts out of which this particular measure has grown. Now, I understand the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations to say that it is a matter of vast importance, which demands instantaneous action on the part of the Senate. If it be so all important, this is, of itself, a sufficient reason why it should be well considered. But I am surprised to hear from the Senator that it is a matter demanding instantaneous action. Why, if I understand the matter aright, the subject has been before the Executive for six months. The papers are now laid upon our tables, and we are asked to involve the nation, if such is to be the decision of Congress, in all the perils of a protracted and uncertain warfare against savages. I trust that Senators will see that it is due to the President, that it is due to the nation, to say nothing of the Senate that we should have full time to deliberate before being called on to act upon a measure so vitally important.

Mr. FOOTE.—It seems to me that there has been sufficient time for an examination of the documents that have been laid upon our table; and that Senators ought to be prepared to act upon at this moment. In reference to a remark of the Senator from Maryland, he will allow me to say that the Executive has not been in possession of all the facts relating to the case of Yucatan, for six months as the Senator supposes. New facts have been communicated from time to time. I trust that if the Senator from Connecticut is not ready to proceed this morning, that there is some other Senator, who desire to discuss this bill who may be ready.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—The Senator from Maryland will recollect that the message was communicated to the Senate on last Saturday week, and ordered to be printed; that on Monday it was referred to the committee, and reported back on Thursday. The Senator will perceive, then, that I have not demanded instantaneous action. I had hoped, however, that the Senate would take action to-morrow upon the subject, for the reason that if we act at all it is necessary that we do so at an early period. When we come to read the accounts that have been placed upon our tables this morning, they will be found to amount to a mere corroboration of what we have already heard. The delay in communicating to us the facts of the case by the President was because he was waiting until all the information relating to the subject had been obtained.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland.—I do not wish to be understood as censuring the Executive at all—

Mr. HANNEGAN.—I will state another fact connected with this subject to show the reason why I deem it of the utmost importance that we should act promptly upon this subject. It is that if we do not act promptly, not only will the people of Yucatan suffer in the meantime for the want of assistance, but the result will be that on the arrival of our troops we shall find an English force there, and who will pretend to say that he can foresee the consequences to be apprehended from such a state of things?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland.—I was about to say that it was not my purpose to censure the Executive. The message was sent on Saturday week, but so far as I can understand from examining the papers accompanying the message, the facts were laid before the Executive six months ago. I now understand the Senator from Indiana to say that this is true, but that the Executive waited until further information was received, and I desire to ask the Senator if that information is not contained in the documents that have been laid upon our tables this morning.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—I reply to the Senator that it is not any new or additional information, it is merely in corroboration of that which has already been put into our possession. The subject has been before the Senate for upwards of a week, and the Senator has not thought proper to call for any information in addition to that which was communicated with the message.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland.—I had presumed that the President of the United States, in sending to the Senate a message like this, would have sent with it all the information relating to the case. I understand now, however, from the Senator from Indiana, that the information he has sent, is information on which the Executive did not act, and that the information that induced him to act is not communicated to us. I was not aware of this before. I supposed that what was laid upon our tables this morning, was every thing that the Executive was in possession of at the time he sent in the message, but, if it is not it affords another reason why we should act deliberately, and, I propose, if the subject be postponed, to call upon the President for all the information.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—It it were proper to allude to the proceedings of another branch of Congress, I could inform the Senator that a call was promptly made and promptly responded to by the communication of letters from commodore Perry, and from Lieut. Murray Mason who have been upon that station, in confirmation of the statements already communicated. Much as I dislike the mode of debate by question and answer, yet, if the Senator from Maryland will allow me, I will ask him, suppose we delay action and that authentic information comes to us that England is in possession of Yucatan, how would he then act?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland.—When I get such information I shall be prepared to answer the Senator. About the time when the annexation of Texas was proposed, we heard a great deal said about the design of England to interfere and take Texas under her protection. We heard a great deal about England's coquetting with Texas, and we were told that if we did not annex her, she would annex herself to England—that the affair was pregnant with danger. Now, if the honorable chairman will permit me to put the same question to him in relation to every part of the continent. According to the doctrine of Mr. Monroe, we must take charge of the whole continent. How do we know but that the forces of England are now crossing the Atlantic with the view of seizing upon some portion of the continent, and if this is to justify us in involving ourselves in a state of war, we shall be engaged in war continually! I think that one war at a time is quite enough, we have got little from it except glory. And it is a little extraordinary that there should be an effort to force upon us now a measure like this, when we have it confessed by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, that the very information without which the President would not have acted, he has not thought proper to communicate to the Senate. I am a little surprised, and I cannot help expressing my surprise, that he should not have communicated it without being interrogated. I propose now to ask him to communicate all the information in his possession.

Mr. CALHOUN.—There are two questions involved in this matter. One is the danger of England taking possession of this country before we can; but in my apprehension, there is no necessity for hurrying on that account. The other question is that of humanity. According to the provisions of this bill, we can render no aid for months to come. The only aid that can be furnished is in the hands of the President. I mean the naval forces—and I trust he will use them with the utmost effect. He has ample power to do so without the authority of Congress. I trust that the Senator from Connecticut will be permitted to have to-morrow for presenting his views to the Senate.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—So far as aid can be extended by the naval forces it will be to a very limited extent indeed. I dislike very much to have this question delayed. One word in reply to the Senator from Maryland. I put the case of England taking possession of California. If England puts a hostile foot there, she meets an enemy to oppose her, there is no similarity at all between the cases.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland.—Does the honorable Senator mean to say, that we have both Californias, and mean to hold them?

Mr. HANNEGAN.—Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof. I hope her foot will not be placed there; if it should be, I would hold it right to drive her off without hesitation. England may be coqueting says the Senator, it is a strange species of coquetry.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland.—I did not say so.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—The Senator said that Texas and England had carried on a little game of coquetry.

Mr. HOUSTON.—Will the Senator be good enough to state upon what authority he founds a charge like that—for it is certainly a serious charge.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland.—I said that Texas had coquetted with England, but I did not intend to bring it forward as a charge against Texas, or her worthy representatives. If the Senator will allow me, I will recall to his recollection, that on a certain occasion when he was making a pilgrimage with General Jackson, and was at New Orleans, where the people received them with great eclat, in a speech that he made there, he said—if the papers of the day correctly reported his remarks—that there was a little coquetry in the manner of England towards Texas.

Mr. HOUSTON.—I am glad that the Senator has afforded me an opportunity of replying to a charge that was utterly unfounded. It was corrected in a communication the next day, sent to an editor, which he never thought worth while to publish. What I said was, that if Texas had been guilty of coquetry with England, she would be perfectly justifiable, in consequence of, the indifference with which she had been treated by the United States. It was true that, after the United States had treated Texas with indifference and even repulsion, some influence was brought to bear upon the public mind to dispose it more favorably towards Texas. The agent of the United Stafes in Texas was a gentleman who felt deeply interested in the matter; and from a want of becoming courtesy on the part of the authorities of Texas towards the British agent, his apprehensions were greatly excited. No pains were taken to allay or counteract these apprehensions. The agent of the United States was at liberty to draw his own conclusions, and I would have thought it very indelicate to have instructed a minister of this enlightened government to extend civilities to any one which were not agreeable to himself.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—I have only to say that this coquetry, like most coquetry, would have resulted in the most serious consequences, had not the United States determined to annex Texas. It would have resulted fatally for Texas. The honorable Senator from New York, in a speech some eight or ten days since, laid so clearly before the Senate, the rapid stride that England is making along the Isthmus, that it would be folly for me to advert to it again. The gentleman said that England is ready to grasp Yucatan. Has she not already seized possession of the most fertile part of that country called the Balize?

It is England through her agents, that has stirred up the Southern Indians against the white people. The gentleman is not satisfied, because the President has not communicated every thing to us. What does the President do? He communicates to your body the transactions, he gives you all the substance, all the information that any man can reasonably ask, and yet it does not satisfy the Senator! Yucatan being a province of Mexico, and being overrun and laid waste by savages, applies to us for protection, simultaneously with England, whose object we are told, is to seize upon Yucatan. The question is then, will you wait and allow her to do so? That would involve at once the question of war or peace between the United States and England. The governor of Jamaica has been applied to, and I have not the slightest doubt, that without waiting to hear from home, he will respond to the call that is made upon him. Mr. Sierra says, that unless they receive aid within two months, Yucatan must cease to exist, and yet we are to sit here day after day, without coming to any determination. I have ever been in favor of the largest liberty in debate, but in such a case as this, when we are called upon by every consideration of justice and humanity, out of regard to our own government and its institutions, we ought not to hesitate a moment.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi.—The honorable Senator from Indiana, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, has presented the emergency in such a strong light that it ought to be sufficient to induce the Senate to act upon the bill, but if not sufficient, then I hope the bill will be passed over until to-morrow, and give place to a bill reported by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, for raising twenty regiments of volunteers. I hold that if we are to do any thing, it must be done immediately, that Great Britain may find us in the occupation of the country, otherwise we may be compelled to come in collision with that power. If the bill be passed over, then I hope the chairman of the Military Committee will press his bill, and that it will be passed this day.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I think that the Senate must be satisfied by this time of the correctness of what I said, when the message first came in, that there was a great deal in it to produce deliberation. When certain words were used in a message—I am always on the look out. Here comes a quiet message of but few lines, merely intimating that it is possible, and only possible, that Great Britain may take possession of Yucatan.—But there is not a particle of information which leads us to apprehend such a result. The original basis of the recommendations of the President, however, is the question of humanity. But connected with this, there is presented the supposition that there is actually danger of an English war for the possession of Yucatan. That, I regard, as the merest fiction. This is not, in my opinion, any such exigency as requires us to act at once, except as relates to the question of humanity.

Mr. CRITTENDEN supported the motion of the Senator from Mississippi, to lay the bill on the table, and reiterated his objections to the bill itself.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—I am in favor of the suggestion of the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. DAVIS;] but not on the grounds advanced by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN,] and I will state my reasons. I am in favor of measures being adopted by this government with respect to Yucatan, like those indicated in this bill. I have heard a great deal said about sympathy and humanity, and so forth for one of the belligerent parties in Yucatan, and that it should influence our action on this bill. These considerations, in this matter, have not a feather's weight with me. My sympathy, as a Senator, is for my own country—my care for its honor and its interests. I don't know, nor do I care, any thing about the quarrel between the different hostile parties in Yucatan. My vote and action is induced by totally different considerations. It is true, and that is all that I regard it as important to know, that Yucatan is now the theatre of a civil war. Under the pretence of sympathy or humanity, or of protecting the interests of her subjects, Great Britain is sending troops into that State. I have had sent to me a newspaper, published at Campeachy, on the 31st of March, 1848, called "El Amigo del Pueblo," which I have now in my hand, with a translation of it, showing fully the state of affairs on this point in Yucatan. It states that the British governor of the Balize had sent to a town or village in Yucatan, called Bacalar, "three companies of troops for the object of protecting the interests of British subjects in the town of Bacalar." I am satisfied, from the past courses of Great Britain, that the object stated is a mere pretence—a pretext for getting possession of the country and holding it. She got possession of the Balize some sixty odd years ago, by a diplomatic fraud followed up by force. By the treaty of peace between her and Spain in 1783, he secured the right to cut logwood in Honduras, but the sovereignty was not ceded by Spain to her, and Great Britain was even required to demolish all forts she had created there; (Vide Chalmers collection of British Treaties, vol. 2, p. 233,) and yet she has sent and kept troops there, has a governor and other officers, and a custom house there, and has assumed and exercises all the powers of sovereignty. So she took possession of the islands and keys on the coast opposite to the Balize, though not in the treaty. She has never faltered at the mode or means of accomplishing her designs upon territory, or important military or naval positions belonging to another nation. Gibralter and Malta, and the Bahamas, are held by her because they are such positions. She is now ready to pounce down on Yucatan, and she will hold it, because it will also, in her hands, be such position—nay, she has already got it within her grasp.

Mr. President: It is important for our interests that she should not continue to hold Yucatan. She hates us, and there is not much love lost. She wants Yucatan as an important naval position, from which she can, in time of war, harass and annoy our commerce in the Gulf of Mexico, and that which goes through the Caribbean sea farther south, and as a military outpost, from which she can assail the five States lying on the Gulf. Sir, the northern point of Yucatan is but 250 miles from the southernmost point of Florida, and but 60 miles from Cuba, and less than 400 from Jamaica. Look at the map of my State; for nearly a hundred miles the Lucayo or Bahama islands lay a long side of her, and with a population of emancipated slaves, many employed in vessels of small burthen, and being from fifty to sixty miles only from us. These are within our coast at pleasure, and seek to interfere in the occupations of our citizens. They have often aided slaves to abscond, and have harbored them, and as the Senator from South Caroina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] can state, while he was Secretary of State; they harbored several fugitive slaves, who fled across the Florida straits to Nassau, N. P., in a stolen boat, after perpetrating an atrocious murder, and yet, when demanded by the United States, and an officer sent in public a vessel for them, and though they were in Nassau, in violation of the tenth article of the Ashburton treaty, the British authorities refused to yield up the felons, though evidence of the murder and felony was furnished duly authenticated—being copies of the indictment found against them in Florida This infamous violation of the treaty, is yet unatoned for! Great Britain covets Cuba, and unless we keep a sharp look out, will get it. Does any body doubt it? If there is any one who does, I would ask them to listen to a part of Lord George Bentinck's speech in the House of Commons, on the 3rd of February last, in a debate about the West Indies and slavery, and emancipation and sugar, and this country. I call the attention of the Senator from South Carolina, to his language.

"He (spoke agreed with Captain Pilking on The would never put down the slave trade so long as it depended upon blockading 10,000 miles of coast. He would do what Captain Pilkington recommended—strike at the head, and not at the hornet. He would not send an army to destroy every individual hornet, but go to the hornet's nest at once, and smother that nest of the slave trade which now existed in Cuba. Hear, hear. He had stood on the Tyne quay, in conjunction with a United States citizen, to which it was stated, that if the United States did not possess herself of Cuba, Great Britain would, and that England had a greater claim by one hundred fold to Cuba, than the United States had to Mexico, because a sum of £45,000,000, was due to British subjects upon Spanish bonds, and Cuba was hypothecated for the payment of that debt. And why did the Americans think that Great Britain would like to have possession of Cuba? Because they knew she could never put down the slave trade so long as it was carried on at Cuba, in its present form. He would therefore say at once, let them take possession of Cuba, and settle the question altogether; let th m obtain upon it for the just debt due, and too long asked in vain, from the Spanish government. Hear, hear. It would put an end to the slave trade, it would save much waste of blood and treasure, and it would be cheaper than the course we are now pursuing. If the people of this country thought it right to spend £150,000,000, in putting down slavery, and running our colonies besides, would it not be cheaper policy to put an end to the cause by securing Cuba?

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER (Sir Charles Wood) but would you secure the Brazils as well?

Lord GEORGE BENTINCK said, "the case of Cuba stood upon its own merits, and upon the debt of £45,000,000, due to British subjects from the Spanish government Then, depend upon it, when Great Britain possessed Havannah, as once she did, in 1762, when she held it for about a year and then exchanged it for the Floridas, and when she could cut the trade of America in two, no more boasts would be heard of what the United States could do, such as that which was not long ago uttered by one of her military officers, who declared that they never would be satisfied until Uncle Sam had set his right foot upon British Canada, and his left upon California, embrace the whole of the eastern seaboard, and throw his leg, like a freeman, over the whole continent of South America to Cape Horn, with Cuba for a cabbage garden. That was the course which should be taken, to put an end to slavery and slave trading, and that having been done, there would be no difficulty in the British planter going to the coast of Africa and obtaining, not by purchase, not by war, but by the inducement of freedom and good wages, any number of Africans he might require for the cultivation of the soil. He thanked the house for having so long listened to him. (Hear, hear.) As he had said before, if any one should choose to take a more decisive and immediate course for affording relief to the British planters, a course which he should think most desirable,—he should not consider himself precluded from supporting such a proposition; but, feeling himself without the power of carrying such a resolution through the house he was prepared to go into the committee, resolved to examine into all the different modes by which relief could be afforded, and if he could not obtain all he desired, he would accept all he could get for the planters in our East and West Indian possessions. (Hear, hear.) The noble lord concluded by moving for a select committee to inquire into the present condition and prospects of the interests connected with and dependent on sugar and coffee planting in Her Majesty's East and West Indian possessions, and to report to the House how far it is expedient to consider whether any and what measures can be adopted for the purpose of affording relief."

This was the language of one of the most distinguished statesmen of Great Britain, in his place in Parliament.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I am very glad that the Senator has called my attention to the declaration of Lord George Bentinck, and I take this opportunity of exposing what I regard as a very fraudulent proceeding, on the part of newspaper editors in this country. Lord George Bentinck is hostile to the present administration in England. When he made the declaration the British ministry in the grossest manner utterly disavowed it, and yet our editors have printed and published in every direction the remarks of Lord George Bentinck without publishing the contradiction. But the fact is as I have stated, that an express disavowal was made by the British ministry in the strongest possible language.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—The interruption of the Senator prevented me from adverting to the course of the British minister in the next sentence I should have uttered, as I have seen that course stated in the same report from the London Times from which I copied the remarks of Lord Bentinck. I may be in error, but I am quite certain, the British Chancellor of Exchequer, (not Lord John Russell,) in reply, confined his speech to the declaration that he should not follow Lord George in his remarks, and that he could not accede to his suggestions. I do not remember any emphatic repudiation of them. But it is not Lord George Bentincks declaration alone, that I rely on to prove the designs of Great Britain on Cuba, and, as it follows of course, on Yucatan. Besides the possession of these places, and whether she gets possession of them or not, she seeks to emancipate the slaves in Cuba, and to strike the southern portion of this confederacy through its domestic institutions. She has avowed her design to see slavery abolished on this continent, and that her efforts will be directed to effect it. Her policy towards us is consistent with this avowal. She meddled in the Texas affair—she meddled in California and Mexico, and is now interfering in Yucatan. Her agents made the Mexican treaty and it is more for their advantage than it is for ours. Are the Southern States of this confederacy prepared to see the slaves in Cuba emancipated by the efforts of Great Britain—and then to see her in possession of Yucatan, and populate it with a colony of manumitted negroes from Jamaica. My State will not assent to such a state of things, while my voice can be heard to protest against any line of policy that will result in it. Why sir, Florida would be surrounded by a cordon of foreign colonial governments, the population of which would be emancipated slaves, under the control of the worst enemy of the United States, While Cuba is not disturbed by British intrigues—while Spain is allowed to remain in quiet possession of that beautiful Island—while abolitionism is not allowed to foment incendiarism, then I would not interfere with Spain in her dominion over it. We do not covet it, unless our enemy seeks to obtain it as a means to work us injury in peace or in war. Before Great Britain is allowed to take it, I trust those who may be in the administration will resist it by force. Rely upon it, Great Britain looks to Yucatan with similar views, as she looks to Cuba. With respect to it I would observe the same policy. I would go to war with her for it.

Mr. CRITTENDEN would ask the Senator from Florida if the government meant to take possession of Yucatan under this bill and hold it permanently?

Mr. WESTCOTT.—If Great Britain attempted to retain possession of it, I hope our government will, and I would resist Great Britain's attempts by force.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—That is not an answer to my enquiry. Does the Senator design to take possession of Yucatan at once and retain it, and, should it be necessary, by military force?

Mr. WESTCOTT.—That depends on circumstances. If Great Britain makes any attempts to hold, or if the country becomes derelict of government, I certainly would do so. Yucatan was of the utmost importance to the United States. I have not time, and this is not the proper occasion to go into this part of the subject, but I can show it is important to us. As to its present condition being any evidence that it was no agricultural country; every body knows that the Spanish and Mexicans, and half Indians that reside there, are not the people to develope the agricultural resources of a country. Twenty-seven years ago, when under Spanish rule, there was scarcely a white inhabitant within a hundred miles of what is now a flourishing city in Florida, exporting upwards of six millions of agricultural products annually, and the surrounding country settled with planters of cotton, sugar, rice, and corn, though that country was then denounced by travelling writers, newspapers, and in Congress as valueless. Yucatan can be made valuable as an agricultural country but if not, and if held by us merely as a naval station it will render the possession of Cuba to Great Britain for the objects she wished, comparatively worthless.

Mr. President, I am in favor of carrying out the principles proclaimed by President Monroe in his messages of 1823 and 1824. I regard his declarations to amount in substance to an announciation to the world, that no European monarchical power would be allowed, thereafter, to extend or increase its empire or dominion in this country. I am for standing by these declarations at all hazards. And, sir, it is a mistake to suppose that this was the first time in the history of this government that a President of the United States advanced such doctrine. In 1811 President Madison advanced it, and carried it out. Congress sanctioned it by practical and efficient action. I allude to the acts of Congress passed in 1811, with reference to the taking possession of the Floridas. We were then at peace with Spain—had no dispute with her—Great Britain, it was suspected, was seeking to get hold of the Floridas. Not half the evidence of her designs as to the Floridas existed, that exists as to her designs, on Cuba and Yucatan. Mr. Madison addressed a special secret message to Congress, and it was acted upon it with closed doors.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland.—Give the dates if you please.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—The message is in the 3d vol., American State Papers, title Foreign Relations, page 695; see also page 591, for other papers; and it advances the doctrines and policy declared in the law and resolution I shall quote. It is dated January 3, 1811. The resolution and laws are to be found in 3 vol., Statutes at Large, page 471. I will refer to them particularly.

Congress, in secret session, January 15, 1811, passed a resolution resolving:

That taking into consideration the state of Spain and of her Vice-roys in America, and the use that may be made by the enemies of the United States of the ports and territories bordering on the Gulf of Mexico, it is not compatible with the present duty and disposition of the United States to permit any part of the said territories, now in their possession, to be occupied or taken possession of by any foreign government; and that, rather than such occupation or possession should take place, they will, in full confidence of the good faith of the proprietors of the said territories, and of the just regard of other powers to the rights of the United States, accept the same, to be held subject to the future disposition of the United States: and that a due regard to the protection of the said territories against hostile occupation, and to the tranquillity of the neighboring country, requires that provision should be immediately made for occupying the said territories, or any part thereof, in case of an apprehended occupation by any foreign government.

On the same day it passed, in secret session also, an act authorizing the President "to take possession of, and occupy all, or any part of, (the Floridas,) in case an arrangement has been or shall be made with the local authority of the said territory for delivering up the possession of the same or any part thereof to the United States, or in the event of an attempt to occupy the same, or any part thereof, by any foreign government," &c.; and it authorized the employment of the army and navy which he deemed necessary for that purpose, and it appropriated money to effect the object; and it further authorized the President "to establish within the territory aforesaid a temporary government," with military, civil, and judicial powers, &c.; and March 3, 1811, it passed, in secret session also, another act directing said law and resolution not to be published with the other laws.

In 1811 part of West Florida, west of Perdido, was taken possession of, and occupied, and held under this authority; and February 12, 1812, another act was passed authorizing the President to continue to hold it, and we did hold it till Spain ratified and confirmed our possession by the treaty of 1819. In 1811, and 1812, and 1813, under these laws troops were also sent to East and West Florida, west of the Perdido, but subsequently withdrawn at the close of the war with Great Britain.

Here is the action of Congress carrying out the doctrine claimed to be Mr. Monroe's twelve years before his message.

Mr. President, I am for standing up to these principles and doctrines. I would not retreat one inch. Maintain them by the power we now possess, treble that we could wield in 1811. The case of Yucatan is one that calls for their being put into force. For this reason, and not from any affected sympathy shall I support the administration in sending troops to Yucatan; and I would not leave the President to act on his own responsibility, I would make it his duty by express law. It is due to the country, and it is due to the chief magistrate, that the action of Congress should be had, by which he can be governed, and faction cannot impute unconstitutional proceedings to him if it should involve us in a contest with another power.

The bill was then passed over informally.

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The following message, was received from the President of the United Sates, by Mr. WALKER, his Secretary:

Mr. President: The President of the United States has this day approved and signed an act, for the relief of John Black, late Consul of the United States at the city of Mexico; an act for the relief of Cunningham Cunningham; and a joint resolution respecting contracts for coals for the use of the American navy.

DEFERRED NOMINATIONS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted by Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, on the 28th ult., in relation to military and civil appointments made by the President during the recess of the Senate, and not yet nominated for confirmation.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland.—The honorable Senator from Ohio the other day objected to this resolution on the ground, that it was unconstitutional to demand of the President his reasons for not having sent to us for confirmation the appointments that he has made during the recess of Congress. Although in my opinion it is not obnoxious to this objection, yet to remove all difficulty I will move to strike out the latter part of the resolution, so as to make it call upon the President to know merely whether there are officers, civil or military, holding commissions, whose appointments have not been communicated to the Senate.

Mr. ALLEN.—The amendment which the Senator proposes to make in the resolution does not entirely remove my objection to it. If the Senate has a right to call upon the President at all for information in regard to such a subject as this, he has an equal right to call upon the Senate to know what they have done, or intend to do in regard to matters before them. I think the thing is entirely irregular and unconstitutional; and I, therefore, move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland.—I had hoped that the amendment which I have suggested would have removed the objections of the Senator from Ohio, and have induced the Senate to adopt the resolution at once; but I was disappointed. I understand the Senator now to say, that any such resolution of inquiry would be irregular and unconstitutional.

Mr. ALLEN.—Any resolution in regard to the appointing power.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I understand the honorable Senator; he told us the other day that it was in conflict with the provisions of the constitution, which confers upon the Executive authority to appoint to all vacancies that occur, in the recess of Congress, and that such commission would be in force until the end of the succeeding session. There is other pressing business before the Senate, and it would, therefore, be improper in me at this time to occupy its attention upon this question, but I must be permitted to say, that I think the honorable Senator from Ohio will perceive that the provision to which he has alluded, that such appointment was to continue during the next session, was merely intended to give the Executive a reasonable time; but it must not be supposed that the Senate is to be deprived of a reasonable time to act upon the nominations after they are sent in. In order that there should be no interruption in the service to be performed by any officer so appointed the provision was, that he should continue to hold his appointment during the continuance of the session unless he should in the meantime be displaced. Now it is a little singular—I am not to be understood as finding fault with the power of appointment of the President, but it is a little singular that there are none of the powers of this government that have received so latitudinarian a construction as this power of the Executive. It has happened more than once that the decisions of the judiciary departments of the government have been denounced as usurpations. So far as the Executive is concerned, if he keeps within the letter of the constitution it is supposed that he acts in obedience to its spirit. No man can be so blind as not to see, that the investment in the President of the appointing power during the recess of the Senate, is a matter arising from the necessity of the case for the purpose of keeping the government in existence. But we have been in session now for upwards of five months, and we are yet without official information in regard to appointments to office that have been made since our last session.

For the first time in the history of this government almost—nay, for the very first time—we have sent abroad our army, and our navy charged with the duty of conquest, by way of indemnity; that conquest to be prosecuted until indemnity was fully obtained. At the commencement of the war we gave to the Executive authority to raise fifty thousand troops. He discharged that duty, I will venture to say, not improperly. More field officers were required, and authority was given to the Executive by Congress to appoint those officers. He appointed them in obedience to that authority, and in addition to this he has appointed other officers during the recess of the Senate. Why is it that these appointments have not been sent in? Is the government paying nothing for the services of these officers? Are they not now receiving their pay and emoluments? I have said—and I meant it in no invidious sense—that we have a certain Brigadier General Pillow in the service, upon whom the chief command would have devolved in case of the happening of a certain event. Why is it that his appointment has not been sent to us for confirmation? Why is it that he, upon whose bravery, and skill, and judgment, the success our army might have depended, is to be the mere appointee of the President? There are also others who have been appointed in the same manner. There is a certain Brigadier General Cushing, who is now sitting in judgment on the commander-in-chief of the army. Why has not his appointment been sent in? Is it because the President has not had time? The question is an insult to our common sense. For ought the President can know these commissions would not stand an hour if they were submitted to the calm judgment, and impartial decision of this body; and I was struck with surprise—a surprise that would have been still greater a few years back—to hear it declared on this floor that we have no right to make an inquiry of the President concerning such appointments. The Senator from Ohio, when he moved a reconsideration of the resolution, cited an authority to show that the President had the right to fill vacancies, and argued from this that he had the right to keep these appointees in office without communicating their appointments to the Senate; that he might withhold such communication if he pleased, until the end of the session. We are, then, according to the honorable Senator, to have these nominations thrown in upon us, if the President chooses to do so, at the last hour of the session, when there is no time remaining for us to decide upon them; and if we interrogate the President, it is an irregular and unconstitutional proceeding. How much more irregular would it be for the President to withhold the nominations until the last day, when the Senate would be entirely without the means of determining intelligently regarding such nominations. I trust that the Senate will pass the resolution, and I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. ALLEN.—So far as regards the merits of General Scott, and the merits of the court of inquiry now sitting upon his acts, and so far as regards the Executive in connection with either one or the other, I burn the whole matter over from the Senate to the hands of General Scott himself and Secretary Marcy. I will not be a party to any proceeding that is intended or calculated to arraign the court of inquiry now sitting in Mexico, and to prejudice the results that may follow from that court of inquiry by a condemnation of the court itself. When the proceedings of that tribunal shall have been completed, when the facts on which they have proceeded, and their adjudication upon those facts, shall have been made known to the public, it will be quite time enough to bring it forward as a subject for public discussion. But there are some observations of the Senator from Maryland which I cannot permit to remain unnoticed. His argument seems to be predicated on the idea that the President of the United States is a mere individual, and not a department of this government; that the President of the United States is a sort of appendage to the Senate—a sort of Sergeant-at-Arms—having no powers given to him by the constitution. The idea, sir, is revolutionary of our institutions. The Executive is a department of the government; that department has powers which it is sworn to maintain and depend against the encroachments of the other departments of the government, and which that department cannot allow to go to decay or into disuse, any more than we can the powers entrusted to us, without a manifest dereliction of duty. A law cannot be made by the legislation of Congress alone; it must receive the sanction of the Executive. The Senator from Maryland supposes the case of the President withholding the nominations until the last day of the session, and puts the question to us, how is it possible for us then to act upon them. The Senator must remember that if the President were to abuse the powers given to him in the constitution, he would be censurable; but, that abuse of power on his part would not transfer the power to the Senate; his responsibility to the people is a sufficient guaranty against the abuse of his power. He is bound to communicate to us his nominations within a reasonable time, and to recommend all such measures as he believes to be of paramount importance to the public interests. What has been the constant practice of the Senate? Has it not been to keep back measures until the last moment of the session? Suppose the President, at about the middle of the session, should send in a message enquiring of the Senate, why they did not pass such and such a bill? Would we not consider it an interference with our privileges? Yet we propose to do this very thing, under the supposition that the President is bound to accommodate himself to our wishes, as a sort of appendage, or officer of the Senate.

The amendment proposed to be made by the honorable Senator, in his resolution, does not at all reconcile it to my judgment. If you have a right to demand a fact, you have a right to demand reasons. The whole thing is entirely irregular.

On motion by Mr. HANNEGAN, the resolution was passed by informally, for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of the special order.

THE YUCATAN BILL.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to enable the President of the United States to take temporary military occupation of Yucatan.

Mr. NILES.—Mr. President: Sir—Before entering upon the consideration of the merits of this bill, I have to notice the extraordinary urgency with which we are pressed for the immediate action upon it; and the reluctance which has been manifested to allow time for a full and fair discussion of the subject. No one I hope, desires any thing more than this; and certainly I wish as speedy a decision as is consistent with that discussion, which the great importance of the subject demands at our hands.

But I am the more surprised at this unusual urgency, on looking at the correspondence between Mr. Sierra and the Secretary of State, and learning the length of time which this subject has been pending before the Executive branch of the government. There it has slept for months; but the moment it is sent here, we are reminded of the urgency of the case, and called on to act immediately without taking time to debate, or consider a question involving such important principles and consequences.

Mr. Sierra has been here about six months; his first note was addressed to the Secretary of State, on the 17th of November. On the 24th he wrote the second note, and received an answer from the Secretary on the 4th of December. These notes related to our occupation of Laguna and the collection of duties. On the 15th of February he addressed another letter, and another on the 24th; these letters did not solicit assistance from the United States, but they explained the difficult and critical situation in which Yucatan was placed, and claimed certain rights on the ground that Yucatan was neutral in the war. These letters were followed by others on the 7th of March, the 3rd of April, and 18th of April, without any answer having been returned. The last was received in the absence of the Secretary, and the chief clerk, Mr. Appleton, addressed a note to Mr. Sierra, acknowledging the receipt of all these letters, and informing him that when the Secretary returned, he would call his attention to them. In his note of the 3d of April, Mr. Sierra says that he has made his note short, hoping "that from the brevity of it, the honorable Secretary would find time to read it." A pretty plain hint, certainly, that he considered that his previous letters had not been read.

The letter of the 18th of April appears to have covered a remarkable document from the governor of Yucatan, which, after depicting in dark colors the sufferings of the people and the critical condition of Yucatan, proposes to surrender up the dominion and sovereignty of the country to the nation which will save it.—

"I have, therefore, thought myself warranted to appeal to the extreme measure suggested by our great necessity—that of soliciting the direct intervention of powerful nations, offering the dominion and sovereignty of the country to the nation which will assume the charge of saving it."

Whether it was the communication of this document which produced a more favorable consideration of the pressing solicitations of Mr. Sierra for assistance, I will not undertake to say. But down to this period, the pressing and urgent appeals of Mr. Sierra appear to have received no attention. The distressed and suffering condition of Yucatan, appears to have been before the Executive department of the government for months, without any action having been taken in relation to it, or so much consideration given to the subject, as to answer the letters soliciting our assistance. But the very day the subject is laid before the Senate, we are told that the case is one of such extreme urgency that we must not take time to consider it, but must act at once. It becomes a case of life or death, and will not admit of any delay; the people of Yucatan may all be destroyed whilst we are debating the question of our interposing for their relief. Sir, if the Executive branch could take months for consideration, we may, I think, take a few days to consider a subject involving such vital principles, and which may be attended with such serious consequences. This, I believe, is due to the country, and due to ourselves.

Mr. President, to judge of the propriety of passing this bill, and to appreciate the force of the objections which stand in the way of its passage, we must first consider what the bill is—what it proposes to do. The first section authorizes and directs the President to take temporary military occupation of Yucatan, and to employ the army and navy of the United States to assist the white population of the country in the war in which they are now engaged with the Indians. This is not a very important and a very extraordinary measure. It is not exactly a declaration of war, yet it involves a war and all its responsibilities—a war which may be protracted and troublesome. But it is something more than a declaration of war; as the bill on its face looks to acquisition and conquest. War may lead to conquest, but this bill, on its face, directs the President to take possession of a foreign country and establish a military government over it. A military occupation will of course supersede the existing government, as has been the case in other parts of Mexico where we have had a military occupation. This, then, is a bill to take possession of Yucatan, and establish our authority over it. I know it is said that the occupation is to be temporary; but when will a temporary occupation cease? Not, certainly, until the causes which induced the occupation have ceased to exist, and as they will not be likely soon to disappear the occupation will become permanent.

And on what grounds is it claimed that so extraordinary a measure as this can be justified? Two have been assigned: first, on the ground of policy; and second, on the ground of humanity, our interference having been solicited by the government of Yucatan. These two grounds do not stand well together. If we interfere and take possession of the country from considerations of policy, the world will give us very little credit for our humanity. They are inconsistent with each other; one looks to our own interest, the other to the interest of the people of Yucatan. That we might interfere and assist the people of that country in a way to rest on grounds of humanity will not be denied. But the manner provided in this bill, really excludes all idea of humanity, and makes the measure strictly one of policy. And the honorable chairman [Mr. HANNEGAN,] who reported the bill had the candor to admit that this was mainly a measure of policy. His remarks were almost entirely confined to that view of the question. To justify the measure on either ground, it becomes important to see what is the political condition of Yucatan. Like every other people, Yucatan must be regarded in one of three political aspects: either as an independent State, possessing and exercising the right of sovereignty, as a dependency of Mexico, or in a state of revolution, having thrown off the yoke of Mexico, yet not having established its independence so as to be recognized as one of the family of nations.

No one claims that Yucatan is an independent State; she does not claim it herself. The most that she claims is that she has thrown off the authority of Mexico, and that she has been neutral in the war between the United States and Mexico. Our government have, in some respects, recognized her neutrality, but in others have regarded her as a part of Mexico. We have taken and still hold Laguna, one of her ports where we have collected duties as in other ports of Mexico in our possession. But in what light does Mexico regard Yucatan? She certainly regards her as one of the States of that republic. How then can we take possession of that country without giving offence to Mexico? If we establish our authority there it will exclude the authority of Mexico; we must hold the country against Mexico. If we were not now in a war with Mexico, this would be regarded by her as an invasion of her territory, and would certainly involve us in a war with Mexico. But our occupation was in pursuance of a request of Yucatan would be no justification to Mexico, as long as she regards Yucatan as a part of her territory. It would be another Texas affair, with this important difference, that Yucatan has not yet asserted her independence, and has not been recognized as an independent State by any nation, not even by the United States. Her consent, therefore, would amount to nothing. It would be no answer to the complaints of Mexico to say that we had taken possession of this department of hers for purposes of humanity, to assist the people in defending themselves against the Indian population.

But how will this measure stand in view of our present relations with Mexico. We have ratified a treaty of peace with that republic, and sent out commissioners to procure its ratification by the Mexican government; and an armistice has been entered into suspending military operations. Can we take military occupation of one of the States of that republic without violating the armistice? Can we make war on the Indian population of one of the States consistently with the armistice? The Indians are citizens, and a part of the Mexican population. To show in what light the Indians are received in Yucatan, permit me to read an extract from one of the letters of Mr. Sierra:

"[illegible] the special [illegible] Peace [illegible] who [illegible] from Yucatan, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

vernment, above all others, ought to hold sacred, because it strikes at the very foundations of free government. It is the principle which belongs to a free people; which is, that they should take care of their own affairs. Is it consistent with this principle, to take possession of a foreign state, and take part in a civil war in which it is engaged? Why, sir, a proposition of this kind needs but to be fully understood, in order to show its fallacy. It does not admit of argument, because stating it, carries with it the argument. Are we to undertake to control by force the destinies of this people, and because they are in a terrible state of tumult, and civil anarchy, are we to settle their difficulties by taking possession of the country, putting down one party and setting up another? What sort of government will you give them? Will you attempt to force your own principles of government upon them, or will you consult their wishes, and attempt to set up such a government as they may ask at your hands? Sir, this matter is beset with difficulties at every step.

I wish to say something, Mr. President, in regard to this doctrine which has been said to have been held by President Monroe; and which is very gravely spoken of as the settled and established policy of this country. We must look to the circumstances of the nations in this hemisphere and in Europe at the time the declarations of Mr. Monroe were made, and to which they were applied, to form a correct opinion of them. These were not abstract declarations of principles to govern the action of this government, but declarations applied to the then existing state of the countries in Europe and America. I have examined the two messages of 1823 and 1824 which contain his doctrines. Some years previous to that, the Spanish colonies in this hemisphere had asserted and declared their independence. But Spain refused to acknowledge them, but still asserted her dominion over them. Mr. Monroe did not deny the right of Spain to re-establish her dominion over them; much less did he assert the right of the United States to interfere between Spain and her colonies, or to set itself up as the arbitrator and guardian of all the nations in this hemisphere. What he declared was, that the political system of Europe must not be extended to America to control the destinies of these Spanish American countries. He did not mean the monarchical system of Europe as some seem to suppose, but that combination among the great powers, sometimes called the Holy Alliance, which divided and disposed of the small States of Europe according to their pleasure. This is the system to which he alludes when he says, "we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere, as dangerous to our peace and safety." It was that arbitrary system of the balance of power, maintained by the allied powers of Europe, and which virtually annihilated all the small States, which Mr. Monroe declared could not be extended to this hemisphere. This was to prevent the allied powers from assisting Spain in the re-subjugation of her revolted colonies, which he said, had assumed and were capable of maintaining their independence. When the time had arrived for acknowledging the independence of those countries, Mr. Monroe acted cautiously and prudently. A resolution was introduced in the other chamber urging and stimulating the Executive on to action. He acted in a manner which it would be well, perhaps, for us to imitate in this case. He sent out commissioners to ascertain the condition of these countries, and whether they had effectually secured and were able to maintain their independence as States. Being satisfied of this fact, he acknowledged their independence. In the meantime, a peculiar state of things had transpired in Europe. The several powers on that great continent had combined against one great power, one great man. The result of that combination, called the Holy Alliance, was the overthrow of this one great power. This Holy Alliance, or combination among the great powers of Europe, was intended to control the power and direct the destinies of all the governments of Europe. Spain was a member of this Alliance, and at this time was attempting to reclaim her possessions in this country. She refused to acknowledge the independence of these States years and years after we had acknowledged it. Mr. Monroe then looking at the state of affairs in this country, and then at the situation of things in Europe, and the allied this belonged to the United States, as the great power on this continent, so far to interfere in behalf of the Spanish American States, as to declare to the civilized world, that we would not permit this European alliance to extend its system to any portion of the American continents. It was this combined system, this assumption of power on the part of the great powers of Europe, to dispose of the nations of the earth, according to their sovereign will, that Mr. Monroe said should not be extended to this hemisphere, taking in the southern as well as the northern continent. Gentlemen may well say with propriety, that this sentiment was heartily responded to by his countrymen; though there has been no occasion to put it into practice. After a while the combination was broken up; and soon after, Spain acknowledged the independence of these States on this continent. This is one of the positions of Mr. Monroe; and has no connection whatever with the right of intervention, as now asserted, in the concerns of foreign powers; no connection with the idea which seems to be assumed, that Mr. Monroe claimed for the United States, as the principal and only great nation in this hemisphere, the right to dictate to, or control the destinies of all others, or assumed the obligation to protect them. His was not the doctrine of interference, but of resistance to the interference of others. He was a man of too much good sense to have contended for the right of intervention in the manner which is asserted. He had no such idea.

What further does Mr. Monroe say? In connection with this view, he says, in direct reference to the condition of the Spanish American states in this hemisphere, that "The American continents, by the free and independent condition assumed and maintained, are henceforth not to be considered as subjects of future colonization by any European power."

What did he mean by this? I think nothing more than what is contained in his first position, as it has direct reference to the ability of the countries on these continents to maintain their independence. He meant no more than that those countries ought not to be forcibly reduced to colonies by any European power. Did he mean that no European power could establish colonies in any unoccupied territory they might have in this country? Certainly he could not mean taat; because he admits taat the existing rights of European powers could not be disturbed. It was, then, only an elaboration of the first doctrine, that the countries here are capable of maintaining their own independence, and could not be disturbed or subjugated by any European power. What is there in all this that supports the idea that it was the purpose of Mr. Monroe to watch over all the countries of this hemisphere, and to repel interference in any one of them without regard to the idea whether it was an encroachment upon our rights, or such an invasion of the rights of other independent nations, as might endanger our own safety; but merely as being the great power on this continent, we had the right and were under obligation to regulate the affairs of all other countries, as far as regards European interference? Has Mr. Monroe ever laid down any such principles of power on our part?

Now, I might contend that, even if Mr. Monroe's ideas were so extensive and comprehensive as seems to be claimed, they were in direct conflict with the settled policy of national intervention with respect to the rights of all nations which has ever been recognized by this government since the days of Washington. I might contend that the assumption that this direction of affairs on our part has been recognized by and become the established policy of the country, has not the least support in the world. Why, if we understand Mr. Monroe as going that length, and to say there shall be no further colonization by any European power, no enlargement of their possessions in this country, I beg to ask for the proof that such doctrine has received the sanction of the other departments of the government, or the people of the country. How can it be claimed that this policy has been acted upon in any instances?—This doctrine, asserted in 1823-'24, when this message was put forth, will not harmonize very well with the recent arrangement made with Great Britain in respect to Oregon. I know that treaty was very unacceptable to my honorable friend, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations. In this case of dispute concerning Oregon, we claimed the whole, our title was clear and unquestionable—yet, in the face of this doctrine, that no European power might extend their possessions on this continent, we not only gave the country up, but allowed the principle to be applied to a territory which we zealously asserted belonged to us.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—Will my honorable friend allow me to put one question? I dislike to interrupt, but would ask, if our title was clear and unquestionable, why did my friend from Connecticut vote for the treaty which surrendered that territory to Great Britain?

Mr. NILES.—I alluded to the opinions of my honorable friend from Indiana, and others, that our title was clear and unquestionable. I certainly never so considered it; if I had, I should not have voted for the treaty.

There was another instance, that of the northeastern boundary, where there was not only a yielding to an extension of European dominion here, but in a case where we at least claimed, and in my judgment, possessed a good title. In the settlement of that important treaty, we gave away, or relinquished, about one-third of the State of Maine, to which I think our title was clear and unquestionable. I hope, however, we shall be able to sustain the principle so far as respects our own territory, and in perhaps defending territory immediately contiguous to us, where it is in imminent danger of falling into the hands of a foreign power, and thus hazarding our own security. That, I believe, is the length and breadth this principle ought to be, or can be carried. There are some other departures from this principle, that I might enumerate. Our honorable friend will remember that there was a very fair occasion to bring up this doctrine—this convenient doctrine of Mr. Monroe in regard to what was called the Panama mission. My honorable friend from Mississippi has quoted very liberally from the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts on that very occasion.

Mr. FOOTE.—The honorable Senator from Connecticut misunderstood me on this point. I expressly said, as he will discover from my printed remarks, that the extract referred to from the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts, was introduced for the edification of the whig members of this body.

Mr. NILES.—Very well; good enough authority any way. It may be used on either side. But I should have been pleased, had he quoted from another gentleman more distinguished in his position—I refer to the President of the United States. He did not, I think, sanction this doctrine. He, with others, adhered to the old doctrine. The democracy on that occasion, and but shortly after Mr. Monroe's time, stood upon the old doctrine of non-intervention. That was then, as it ever had been, the democratic doctrine, yet the policy of all parties. The proposed convention or congress at Panama, involved the same principle as the case under consideration. It was to regulate, by some system, the concerns of the different nations in this hemisphere, and to secure all against European aggression and colonization. This measure, very unwise, as subsequent events proved, was recommended and sustained by President Adams, with all his learning and ability; but as it involved a dangerous principle of foreign intervention, it was, after a warm and able debate, put down by both houses of Congress, and there the thing ended. Let us look further and see how the doctrine stands of resisting colonization in this whole hemisphere. What has this nation done in opposing British encroachments and aggressions, perhaps called so properly? Look at her acquisitions upon this continent, and below us, too! Great Britain, through some treaty in '83, acquired the right of cutting logwood at Balize—the right of establishing a factory there for trade, but no right of territorial jurisdiction; yet, through the exercise of that right, she has extended her possessions until she has acquired a large province—a province embracing the most fruitful and valuable part of Yucatan, and I will venture to say, that the trade of Balize is ten to one of the trade of Yucatan, even before these disturbances occurred. This is not all by any means. What has she acquired still further south? They have possessed themselves of a province called the Musquito Coast, through the force of a deed or will, from some Indian chief, and thus extended her dominion there. This is not all. Travel over the earth, and then you may attempt to describe the aggressive inroads of that power. I saw this very day an account of their aggressions in Venezuelan Guyana. They had some possessions in Guyana, which they have extended, until they have absorbed the whole of what was Spanish Guyana. The writer of the statement I saw, and who seems to be well informed on this subject, says that in 1841 they encroached upon Spanish Guyana to the amount of twenty thousand square miles. Since then they have swelled the amount of their possession, until now they occupy a portion of country one hundred and eighty thousand square miles in extent. These things are successfully going on, while we are engaged in carrying out the great doctrine of Mr. Monroe by a quiet acquiescence, and I believe the Executive branch of this government has not yet sent the first diplomatic note to this power, saying that these things would not do. It is too late in the day, sir, to take ground quite so high as this put forth by my honorable friend from Indiana. It is too late in the day; and it is a ground which ought never to have been taken, because it was one that we never could have maintained. It would have led to a perpetual war with the world, or at least with England, the mightiest power in it. She is the only power we have any fears of collision with. There has been a serious disturbance upon the La Plata. England and France have both been acting the part of mediators or invaders there. Were their objects and purposes inquired into by us? Did we seek to repel their interference? The difficulty was carried on in a portion of this hemisphere. We might have had reason to apprehend that the result of their combined intervention would have been the establishment of the power of one or both of these nations permanently and extensively. At least it might have been supposed that they would gain in substance the control of that portion of the country. Have we interfered in this matter? Not at all—not at all. All these things have taken place since the declaration of Mr. Monroe in 1823-'24. In a mere suppositious case we are told that our interest requires, not to interfere diplomatically, not to protest against a foreign power taking possession of Yucatan, but upon the mere assumption that she may be thus taken possession, we are called upon to seize the country and occupy it ourselves. Sir, that is one part of the doctrine.

Mr. President, I thought it proper to examine these doctrines to which such importance is attached of late, and which are assumed to be the established policy of the country, although they never seem to have been recognized by any action of the government. But if we were to admit this to be a settled policy, it is sufficient to say that there is in this case no facts to justify our interference. There is not the first fact before the Senate. There are no facts to prove any design on the part of the British or of Spain to take forcible possession of the peninsula of Yucatan. Not one. Now, sir, as far as any right of interference by one independent power with another is concerned, all writers on the laws of nations agree in saying that the case must be an extreme one, the danger must be imminent, to justify such an act, one which will admit of no other remedy. We are called upon to interfere in the civil affairs of Yucatan upon a mere supposition or suspicion that England may possibly interfere if we do not. It may be possible, as of many other things. Can a mere supposition or suspicion of this nature be any justification for our interference? It may be said further, that England has already been called upon to interfere. True; but she has been treated precisely in the same way that we have been treated; the same appeal and offer have been made to both nations. Supposing England was to interfere under this solicitation of the government at Yucatan, have we any right to complain of such a course on her part? Even if there were any interference on the part of England, it would not be prima facie a case of aggressive interference. Because her aid has already been solicited, as well as ours. Spain has interfered; she has sent two ships of war to the coast of Yucatan. I recently read an account that two ships of war from Cuba had arrived on the coast of Yucatan, and were doing what they could to aid the sufferers, taking them on board and furnishing provisions, arms and ammunition. Can we complain if any other nation, who happens to be European, do precisely what we propose to do, on precisely the same basis, that is the relief of the suffering people of this distracted State? The Senator from Indiana has the candor to admit that there might be a state of things, in which, if we take possession, we shall be forced to hold on. That would not at all favor the measure, however, in my judgment. There are difficulties enough in the way before you moot that point. Is this measure to assume the character of acquisition or annexation? If so, it becomes infinitely more important.

I have a few words, Mr. President, to submit in regard to the expediency and advantage of our interfering in this matter, and the probable consequences which may follow to ourselves. Aside from all the difficulties I have partially alluded to, if it should appear that our interference can be of no essential service to the people of that country; that it will involve great sacrifices on our part, sacrifices not only of money, but lives; that it will involve us in a war which will be as with all Indian wars, a very trouble-some one—even aside from all the great principles which impede our way at every step, I ask whether it will be wise and prudent to interfere in the extraordinary manner this bill proposes to do? Now, sir, what does my honorable friend suppose we have to do, admitting that all these difficulties did not exist? What are we to do? We must in the first place take this war upon our hands; and in order to do that, we have got to decide a question to which I have not hitherto alluded, that is, the merits of this controversy, or the causes of the civil war now prevailing in that country. We have got to decide whether this is a war precisely of the character exhibited to us by Mr. Sierra; that is, that it is not exactly a civil war, but a war of savages against a civilized people—a war of extermination, carried on by a horde of savages against the unoffending white population; a war of races. Now, have we sufficient, or the requisite information to decide this question? We are to look on both sides of the question. This is the course justice and humanity points out. Can we decide this question with our present meagre information, with that degree of confidence and justice with which it ought to be decided? Can we, with our present knowledge of the matter, take upon us the high responsibility of calling upon our own citizens to hazard their own lives, and assist in shedding the blood of others who have never injured us?

This is no trivial concern. This not a question as to the right of intervention, but whether we know enough about the merits of the controversy to justify our adopting and carrying out the extraordinary measures proposed. We are to take sides on this question. We are to become a party to this war, and are to assume that it is on the one hand a war of extermination carried on by barbarians, and on the other, a war of self-defence, a resistance to the murderous incursions of savages. It may be so. But I ask whether there is anything before us to justify our assuming such a position, attached to which are consequences so very solemn, not only to that country, but to our own citizens. Why, I have just read from this report, that these so called savages are citizens of the State of Yucatan. They have been admitted as equals into society. The white citizens of that country, says Mr. Sierra, have made great efforts to elevate, educate, instruct even to Christianize them. They are, then, according to this authority, a portion of the people of that country. To a great extent they are a civilized and a Christian people. They are Catholics, I believe, and we are to be called upon to aid in what? Why, in their utter extermination. This is, as is said, truly a war of extermination. For one, sir, I would hesitate long before I would give a vote to take the responsibility of exterminating this race, to say nothing about exposing and hazarding the lives of my own countrymen. I should like, for one, to know more upon this subject. I find that the correspondence laid before us sheds no light on the question, how this controversy begun. The statement, also, of Mr. Sierra, affirming that there were no factions existing in the state, does not seem to be entirely true. He doubtless supposed it so at the time, and there may be a total absence of the exhibition of factions to-day, and yet to-morrow they may came forth in all their evils. We know that during the short period of our war with Mexico, the condition of Yucatan has assumed three or four different phases. But there are factions. There are two parties, and dissentions among the whites as well as this controversy with the natives. No longer than the 5th of last month I find that the then governor, believing it might tend to harmonize and unite the people, and thus strengthen their hands in the struggle in which they were engaged, resigned his office, doubtless in favor of the rival leader of the other hostile party. Mendez, the then governor, resigned in favor of Barbachina. This measure seems to have been designed to unite the two parties, and to enable them more effectually to defend themselves against the assaults of their savage foe, and to strengthen their hands against their common enemy, the Indians. But such was the bitterness of feeling between the two parties, that it had a directly contrary effect, for of the eight thousand men who composed their army at the time, about one half, comprising the partisans of Mendez immediately returned to their homes, reducing the army to some four thousand men. Sir, we know nothing of the occasion of this difficulty. I believe that the report received to-day, containing the correspondence with the Navy Department, throws some light on the origin and causes of this war; but I have not had an opportunity to examine it. The correspondence in the two messages offered very little light—in fact, Mr. Sierra seems to avoid going into the orgin of these controversies. Traced to its source, I think it will be found that this war at present existing in that country, is one of the deplorable evils resulting from their divisions. Sir, is it not improbable that the degraded native population of that country, who, for three long centuries, have been in a state of complete subjugation, and whose is moral characteristic, according to Mr. Sierra, is stupidity, should, of their own accord, after having endured oppression so long, from some strange feeling newly sprung up in their breasts, unite their strength, and form an offensive league against their ancient oppressors? Sir, there are, there must have been, other causes of this difficulty, of which we at present know nothing.

Sir, when foreign intervention takes place it is supposed to be for peace. When any intervention with the the affairs of other nations is undertaken, it is assumed to be, upon the ground of humanity, and looks to the interests of both of the contending parties. Intervention looks to the great interests of peace, and is the enemy of war. It is only on this ground that it can receive the least justification. Can we do that in this case? This is a war of one portion of inhabitants against another portion, whom they regard as their oppressors; and can we by a display of force induce these people to yield? Can we dictate terms, or a treaty, compromise or settlement of their difficulty? What do they say themselves? I saw an article in a paper published at Mexico, in which the superior class are speculating upon the probabilities of receiving aid from this country. Nothing short, says the writer of annexation, will be of any use to them. He further states, that their application to be annexed to this country would be successful; that the abolitionists and the democratic party are all in their favor, and he thinks that the southern whigs will be likely to favor the proposition too. On the whole, he declares the prospects to be very favorable. The principal and most striking feature of this article however is, when the writer states that after annexation is secured they, the Yucatanese, will be saved from further trouble with the savages, as they will be immediately exterminated by us. That is what they want sir. This statement I found copied from the Mexican paper, the La Patria, in the Herald of this morning.

A few words in reference to the consequences to ourselves. We know something in regard to Indian warfare. Who, and what are these Indians that are to be exterminated? What is their number? What their prowess? What their mode of warfare? What their ability to sustain a war with the United States? Let us see what Mr. Sierra says upon the subject:

"The numerous hordes of that race fall with opposing rapidity upon the defenseless villages, massacre the inhabitants, and then withdraw to the mountainous fastnesses of the country, carrying away their booty, and dividing among them all the spoils of war. The ferocity of the want of that race, the habits with which they support all kinds of privations, the extraordinary rapidity of their movements, all these circumstances have given to this species almost invincible."

Such are the people we are called upon to assist in exterminating. They are without artificial wants, subsisting in a state of nature, living on little or nothing, and sallying forth with astonishing rapidity, falling upon hamlets and villages, devastating them with fire, and then retreating far from pursuit to their forests and fastnesses. The governor expresses his opinion of them still more strongly. He says:

"The white race—the civilized class of this State—is now attacked in an atrocious and barbarous manner by the aboriginal caste, which, rising simultaneously in insurrection, is committing every species of outrage and exterminating wherever it can. Everything is ravaged and destroyed, the towns are delivered to flames, and all, without consideration of sex or age, who fall into the bloody hands of these barbarians, are murdered without pity, and with the most cruel tortures. Their forests, their fastnesses, their customs, and other particular circumstances, render the Indians terrible enemies; and when to this is added their numbers, excessively superior to those of the other castes, it will be at once seen how difficult it is to restrain them, and how easily they may succeed in many points in which an opposite force and the difficulty becomes the greater, in consequence of the want of funds to support the expenses, and to obtain the necessaries for carrying on the war."

Here the governor says, that these Indians have become terrible enemies. Mr. Sierra states that they are vastly superior to his own people. In all the accounts which we have had of this cruel war with all its terrible devastations, I have never seen any account of the first battle that has been fought, or the first stand that has been made by the white population of that distracted country. It appears that they have a small force in the field, but whether it is that they are afraid to fight, I know not, I cannot say; as yet they appear to have had no skirmish, nor made any resistance however slight to the desolating progress this formidable people are continuing. Now, sir, if we engage in this war we assume upon our hands no small undertaking. I know our soldiers are brave, and probably one thousand of our troops would oppose a more formidable resistance to the incursions of these Indians than the whole military force of Yucatan. But, sir, from the extracts which I have just read, it will be readily perceived that these people will be the most difficult enemy to exterminate that could be encountered in any war. They are not to be found. They are not to be met on the field of battle. They retire when pursued to their almost inaccessible retreats and fastnesses. What can be accomplished even if we pass the bill and send an armed force into that country? Why suppose that we do back this people, for it will not be so easy to exterminate them, and the terrified inhabitants return to their homes, those whose homes have been suffered to remain. Can we after thus driving back the Indians, leave the whites to their own defence? Can we withdraw our forces and leave the people in security? Will they not be exposed to the same inroads the moment our troops are withdrawn? Why, sir, our possession of that country must be a perpetual one. Will not the same necessity remain for continued relief? We can afford them after all, sir, no substantial aid, unless it is given through a permanent occupation of that country, and as I have already stated, that is the aid to which they look forward, and the precise kind of relief which they desire. They are expecting and hoping that the strong arm of this government will thus be extended to their relief. And that is the question, whether we are prepared to do it? Nothing short of permanent possession, or the total extirpation of that race, will do any good; our sacrifices will otherwise be made in vain. The question as I have said, simply comes to this, whether we are prepared to take the people of that country under our care and protection through the medium of annexation, or whatever we may call it, and to afford to them the security which they seem unable to secure to themselves?

Mr. President, I think if we were to pass this bill upon any ground, either of humanity or policy, we would be subject to the charge of inconsistency by our constituents at home. The position of this country is almost identical with that of Texas before annexation. It is true Yucatan has not been recognized as an independent power, but she has thrown off the yoke of Mexico. Texas appealed to us for relief in the same way. But we could not interfere or give her aid, and was there not a desolating war raging within her borders? It is not necessary to remind Senators of the scenes of the Alamo, where the laws of war were utterly disregarded, and a war of extermination similar in kind, though not in degree to the present case, was carried on by the Mexicans. Well, sir, we refused Texas aid, and yet her inhabitants were bone of our bone, and flesh of our flesh. I might refer, sir, to other cases more remote to be sure, but perhaps more similiar in their nature to the one at present under consideration. I would not be understood as saying that it is not proper to extend any assistance to this people in their extremity, and perhaps we ought to go so far as to supply them with arms and munitions of war. But I speak of our making ourselves a party to this war. During the glorious administration of Mr. Jefferson, distinguished for a liberal and humane spirit, there were similiar scenes which occured on our borders? Who has forgotten the fate of San Domingo? We did not interfere then, sir. Was not that a case that appealed to our sympathy and humanity? Was it not a case within our borders as much so as in the present one of Yucatan? The result, as we well know, was the extermination of the white race.

Sir, let us for a moment contrast this bill with a resolution recently passed by this body, and see if there be not some little doubt existing as to the purity and consistency of our present design. I need not remind the Senate of the very interesting subject lately before us, growing out of the great movement in the old world, considered in this body, not in the form of legislation to be sure, still certainly in a form assuming to express the sentiments of this great people, thus giving it a higher character than its ordinary expression might be entitled to. We have, after much deliberation and contemplation upon the matter, adopted a resolution expressing our concurrence with, and congratulations at, the rising of the lower classes of people in one of the great nations of Europe, and upon the success of their efforts in overthrowing the higher and aristocratic classes of their society. That I take to be the character of the revolution in a great degree. And it has been called the revolution of the blouses. The men in frocks, the sons of toil with their bronzed faces and hard hands accomplished the revolution, and we have expressed our approbation at the result of their efforts. And now, sir, we are about to express our opinion of a revolutionary movement, of a civil war in another part of the world. Having congratulated the blouses in one country upon overthrowing the power and ascendancy with all their privileges, and influence enjoyed by the higher classes, we are now about to pass a law, making ourselves a party with the higher classes in another country, to overthrow and even exterminate the lower classes or more degraded portion of the population. These people have been vastly more oppressed and degraded than the lowest ranks of the French inhabitants. All will admit, I think, that these two acts would not stand very well together.

We were told, Mr. President, by the honorable chairman who has brought forward this bill, that if we did not assume the occupation and protection of this country, England will take possession of it, and then we shall be called upon, in accordance with the great doctrine of Mr. Monroe, as that Senator understands it, to displace, or expel her, and thus become involved in a war with that mighty power. If the Senator's idea is right upon this subject, it is giving to this bill a higher character than it has been supposed to possess. If this is so, we are not only to assume the responsibility of consequences, already referred to, resulting from becoming a party to this war, but we also hazard a war with the only nation capable of doing us any essential or permanent injury. But may there not be equal danger of a war with England, if we interfere with Yucatan in the first instance? But, sir, if we place the offer of our aid merely on the ground of humanity, for a suffering people, and if this is to be regarded only as a work of charity on the part of any nation that performs it, surely if we step in and take the work into our own hands, England cannot but thank us for so doing! If England interferes with a design to extend her dominion over that country, it will be immaterial to her, whether she be there first or not; she will not relinquish her object, because we get the start of her.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—I remarked, that we could not foretell the consequences if we encountered English troops there.

Mr. NILES. I believe I understand the Senator's position clearly.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—I said for my own part, I would be in favor of expelling her.
